CHAP. XXVII.

The Roman History, from the death of Julian, to the death of Valens, continued.

The following year, while Valens was passing the winter at Antioch, many of all ranks and conditions were accused of attempting to learn, by magical practices, and forbidden arts, the name of the person who was to succeed Valens in the empire. Some of them owned the crime laid to their charge, and declared, that Theodorus, the emperor’s second secretary, was the man whom the stars seemed to have destined to the empire. Theodorus was descended of an illustrious family in Gaul, or, as others will have it, in Sicily, endowed with extraordinary accomplishments, and in every respect worthy of the empire, if he had not had the ambition of aspiring at it, and endeavouring to raise himself, by unlawful means, to that high station; for all authors agree, that he was privy to the execrable practices of the magicians. Ammianus, who, it seems, was then at Antioch, or at least in that neighbourhood, gives us a very particular and distinct account of what passed on that occasion, which it would be too tedious to transcribe. Theodorus was found guilty, not only of magical practices, which were forbidden on pain of death, but of having conspired with others to take away the emperor’s life; whereupon he was beheaded, as we read in Ammianus, whose authority

authority is of more weight with us than that of Sozomen, who writes, that he was burnt alive. As Theodorus, and the others concerned in this conspiracy, were pagans, Libanius endeavours to extenuate their crime; nay, he is not ashamed to tell us, that Theodorus was condemned unjustly, though both Zosimus and Ammianus own, that he aspired at the empire; that by his own letters he was convicted of treason; and that the emperor narrowly escaped being assassinated. No one would have complained, if only Theodorus and his accomplices had suffered; but innumerable innocent persons were, on that occasion, inhumanly racked, and afterwards either executed, or sent into banishment: a diligent search was made, not only after those who had been privy to the conspiracy, but after such as was only suspected of practising magic, or using magical remedies. Such numbers were daily accused and feized, that the public prisons could no longer contain them, and few of those who were apprehended, had the good luck to escape death or banishment. Diogenes, formerly governor of Bithynia, was publicly executed; and Salia, treasurer of Thrace, fell down dead at the officer's feet who was to examine him, overcome, as was supposed, by an apprehension of the torture he was to undergo. Baffianus, whom some writers suppose to have been the son of Basianus Caesar, brother-in-law to Constantine the Great, was saved by the powerful intercession of his relations, who were all persons of great distinction; but stripped of his estate, and all his effects. The two brothers Eufeius and Hypatius, brothers-in-law to Constantius, who had been consuls in 359, were accused of having aspired at the empire; and tho' the charge could not be proved, yet they were banished, and condemned to pay a great fine, but soon after recalled with great honour. Eutropius, proconsul of Asia, was accused of having been privy to the conspiracy of Theodorus; but the philosopher Panphilus, who was brought as an evidence against him, having suffered all the torments cruelty itself could invent, without laying any thing to his charge, he was dismissed, but deprived of his employment, which was given to Festus the historian, who discharged it for the space of five years with the utmost cruelty. Alypius, formerly vicar of Britain, and employed by Julian in rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem, was accused accused with his son Hierocles, the disciple of Libanius, as a poisoner; the father was stript of his estate, and banished; and the son condemned to death, but faved, as Ammianus writes, without explaining himself any farther, by a favourable accident. But the most rigorous enquiries were made after the pagan philosophers, who were, generally speaking, addicted to the study of magic. The most considerable among them were publickly executed, viz. Hilarius, who was burnt alive, Patricius, Andronicus, and Ceranius; Maximus, the famous master of Julian, was carried to Antioch to be examined there, and afterwards sent back to Ephesus, where Feftus ordered his head to be cut off, tho' he was then so ill, that he must have ended his life in a few days, without the intervention of the executioner. Zonaras writes, that the philosopher Iamblichus, by a draught of poi-sen, prevented his falling into the emperor's hands. Valens expected and greatly desired, to find Libanius in the number of the guilty; but nothing was alleged against him, though, as to magical practices, he was, as he himself owns, not free from all guilt; but as to the conspiracy of Theodorus, he solemnly protests, that he was altogether a frager to it. A diligent search was made, not only after magicians, but after all books treating of magic, which, where-ever discovered, were committed to the flames, with those in whose possession they were found. These enquiries extended to all the provinces subject to Valens; and from the most remote parts were daily brought to Antioch numbers of people to be tried as magicians, because books of magic had been found in their custody. Ammianus tells us, that the officers themselves, out of spite or malice, often conveyed privately among the other writings, some charm or inchantment; upon which the persons, to whom they were supposed to belong, were immediately seized and condemned, and their estates confiscated. Hereupon persons of all ranks were seized with such dread and terror, that they burnt their libraries, left, among their other books, any should be found unknown to them, treating of forbidden arts. On this occasion Feftus, proconful of Asia, distinguished himself above the other ministers of the emperor's cruelty, torturing with the utmost inhumanity, and putting to death, without diinction of sex, age, or condition, such as were convicted or only suspected of having used any kind of charms or inchantments:

The Roman History. Book III.

chantments: he tortured the philosopher Coeranius till he expired, for no other crime but because in a private letter to his wife he had used a proverbial expression, which looked like a charm: he put to death a woman for pretending to cure agues by a charm, tho' she had before been sent for, with his knowledge and consent, to cure his own daughter, and had been, as we are told, attended therein with success: a young man being observed in a public bath to touch the marble with the fingers of both his hands, the one after the other, and then putting them to his breast, to repeat the seven vowels, which he fancied was a present remedy against a pain in the stomach, Festus caused him to be immediately seized, tortured, and executed. At Antioch, a person being accused of having written a book of magic, found an opportunity of throwing it into the river before he was apprehended: but this did not save him; for though the book could not be produced against him, yet he was, after a short hearing, condemned and publicly executed. A few days after, St. Chrysoftom, who relates this, and was then a youth, going with a companion to visit a church in the neighbourhood, found the book on the strand: his companion, not knowing what it contained, took it up, and, led by his curiosity, began to read it aloud, when they both perceived it was a book of magic, and at the same time observed, not without dread and horror, a soldier at a small distance, so that they neither dared tear it, nor throw it again, as they had designed at first, into the river, lest the soldier should suspect and seize them. However, Chrysoftom's companion concealing the book with great care under his garments, they had both the good luck to escape without being searched, tho' every soldier was impowered to search all he met for books of magic and charms. Had the book been discovered, they must both have inevitably perished; but they found means of throwing it again into the river, without being observed. Socrates writes, that an oracle having answered those, who came to enquire who should succeed Valens, that the first part of his name was Theod, the emperor, acquainted with that answer, caused not only Theodorus to be put to death, but all those whose names began with those letters, such as Theodulus, Theodotus, Theodosius, &c. among these was, according to that writer, one Theodosiulus or Theodosius, a Spanish lord of great distinction. Ammianus and Zosimus give us

us a very minute account of the other cruelties of Valens, without taking the least notice of this, which makes us question the truth of what Socrates writes. Be that as it will, the extraordinary severity which Valens exerted on this occasion against magicians, auripiges, astrologers, and diviners of all denominations, is highly blamed, not only by the pagan, but even by the chriftian writers. If Valens looked upon magic as a vain imagination, he ought not to have been thus alarmed; if he gave credit to their predictions, he could not, without being inconsistent with himself, strive to prevent their being accomplished: and truly, in spite of all his cruelties, he was succeeded by Theodosius, whose name began with the letters, which, if Socrates is to be credited, he so much dreaded. This fire, to use the expression of Libanius, continued raging till the emperor was diverted by another, which the Goths kindled three years after in Thrace. This year is likewise remarkable for the death of two princes, both treacherously murdered by the Romans, viz. of Gabinius, king of the Quadi, in the west; and of Paras, king of Armenia, in the east. Of the former we have spoken in the reign of Valentinian: as to the latter, he had in some degree submitted to the king of Persia, as we have observed above, but afterwards renewed, it seems, his alliance with the Romans, and was by them acknowledged king, since Ammianus gives him that title; but several persons, at the head of whom was count Terentius, having transmitted to court disadvantageous accounts of his conduct and administration, the emperor sent for him, as if he designed to advise with him about the prosecution of the Persian war. Upon his arrival at Tarsus in Cilicia, he was commanded to wait there till further orders; but being in the mean time informed, that the emperor's design was to arrest him, and send another to be king of Armenia in his stead, he resolved to make his escape, with the assistance of three hundred of his own subjects, who persuaded him to it, and privately provided horses for that purpose. They set out in the dusk of the evening; but were soon pursuaded and overtaken by a whole legion, sent on purpose to prevent their escape. At their approach, Paras faced about, and charged them with such resolution, that they made more haste to fly from him, than they had done to overtake him. After this he travelled night and day till he reached the Euphrates, which he passed upon barrels joined together.

	her, and pursued his journey with extraordinary expedition. But in the mean time the emperor, having notice of his escape, dispatched a thousand archers, under the command of two principal officers, to bring him back. These being well acquainted with the country, to which Paras was altogether stranger, getting through by-ways before him, divided their forces, and seized on two passes, three miles distant from each other, through one of which they took for granted he would pass. But being informed of his danger by a traveller, and conducted by him through by-paths and thick woods, he escaped the ambush, and got safe to his dominions, where he was received with inexpressible joy, while the Roman officers, who had long waited for him, were by all derided and ridiculed upon their disappointment. This incensed them to such a degree against Paras, that, in order to haften his ruin, they made the credulous emperor believe, that the young prince was a famous magician, and knew how to consumse and waffe by degrees a man's body, though at never so great distance. This so alarmed the emperor, that though Paras, forgetting the late affront, continued faithful to the Romans, yet his death was resolved on, and orders sent to Trajan, who commanded the Roman forces in Armenia, to dispatch him by private treachery, if he could not by open force. The manner which Trajan chose to put this base and inhuman command in execution, was no less base and inhuman, than the command itself; for he having gained the young prince's confidence, by frequenting his table, and producing counterfeit letters from Valens, filled with the most tender expressions of kindness, prevailed upon him to accept of an entertainment at his house, during which he caufed him to be barbarously murdered by a ruffian hired for that purpose. The death of Paras gave great uneafines to Sapor, who had hoped to gain him over in the end to his interest. He was therefore no sooner informed of his misfortune, than he dispatched em-bassadors to Valens with proposals for an accomodation.
The remaining part of this year was spent in negotiations, but without success, the emperor who was then at the head of a numerous and well disciplined army, being desirous of retrieving the glory of the Roman arms, and recovering the provinces given up by the treaty with Jovian. But in the mean time, Thrace being threatened with a general invasion of the Gothifh nation, he was obliged to conclude a peace with the Persians, but upon what terms we know not. The following

following year, 375, Valens was alarmed by an embassy from the Goths, who, being driven out of their own country by the Hanns, desired leave to settle in Thrace. But before we speak of that embassy, and the memorable events attending it, we must take a cursory view of what happened in the west after the death of Valentinian, who, as we have related already, died at Bregetio on the seventeenth of November of this year. He left two sons, viz. Gratian, born in 359, and by his father created emperor on the twenty-fourth of August 367, and Valentinian born in 371. As Gratian was at a great distance from the army when his father died, having been left, as we have observed above, at Treves, the great officers of the court, uncertain what such an extraordinary and unexpected accident might produce, especially among the Gauls, who served in the army, and were then ravaging the country of the Quadi beyond the Danube, dispatched a messenger with private intelligence of the emperor’s death to Merobaudes their leader, who, thereupon sent immediately out of the way, pursuant to his instructions, count Sebastian, an officer greatly beloved by the soldiery, and then marched back to the camp at Bregetio. Upon his arrival, it was resolved in a general council of all the chief officers both civil and military, that Valentinian, the second son of the deceased emperor, then a child but four or five years old, should be declared emperor. He was therefore sent for without delay from a village, named Murocintha, about an hundred miles distant from Bregetio, and upon his arrival proclaimed emperor with the usual solemnity the sixth day after the death of his father. This step they took to prevent any sudden attack from the enemy, or mutiny in the army. They hoped, that Gratian, who was then but seventeen years old, and had already given proofs of an extraordinary mild temper, and an uncommon understanding, would acquiesce to the motives, which had induced them to prefer his brother to the empire without his knowledge or consent. Gratian at first complained of their taking such an extraordinary step before they had made him privy to it, but immediately confirmed their election, and ever after treated young Valentinian more like his child than his brother. Victor and Zosimus will have Equitius and Merobaudes to have been the chief authors of this election, which by Rufinus is ascribed to Probus.

robaudes was, according to Victor, related to young Valentinian, probably by marriage; for he seems, so far as we can conjecture from his name, to have been a barbarian. The election being confirmed by Gratian, and soon after by Valens, the western provinces were divided between the two brothers: young Valentinian had for his share Italy, Illyricum, and Africa; and Gratian, Gaul, Spain, and Britain. The division was made, not by Gratian, who was yet too young, as Zosimus pretends b, but by the great officers of the court. As they did not therein consult Valens, some misunderstanding arose between that prince and his nephew c. Notwithstanding this partition, Gratian alone governed the western provinces to his death, Valentinian not having been capable of acting on account of his age, so long as Gratian lived. The first thing Gratian did, after the death of his father and the promotion of his brother, was to recall to court his mother Severa, who had been divorced and banished by Valentinian, and restored her to her former honours d.

The following year, 376, Valens was consul the fifth time, and young Valentinian the first. This year Gratian, being informed of the unheard-of cruelties practised by the famous Maximinus both in Italy and Gaul, caused him to be publicly executed; and named one Antonius, prefect of Gaul, in his room. Simplicius, who had been vicar of Rome in 374, and Doryphorianus, who had succeeded him in that office, underwent the same fate, being accused of the like crimes: the former was beheaded in Illyricum, and the latter put to a cruel death, at the instigation of Severa, says Ammianus, in Gaul, whither he was conveyed from the Tullian prison in Rome e. As thee three cruel and bloody magistrates had, with the utmost injustice, put a great number of senators to death, Gratian, by a declaration published this year, established the method of trying senators f, which was read by Symmachus in the senate on the thirteenth of August g. To the above-mentioned execution St. Jerom no doubt alluded, when he wrote, that this year several persons of distinction were executed h. Maximinus, Simplicius, and Doryphorianus, had long deserved the doom which at length overtook them, and died un lamented; but the

the death of the renowned count Theodosius, one of the greatest officers and best men of his age, is a stain on the character of Gratian never to be effaced. Of his glorious exploits in Britain and Africa, we have spoken at length in the reign of Valentinian; but notwithstanding the eminent services he had rendered the empire, he was this year by an order from court beheaded at Carthage, after he had triumphed over Firmus, and with his prudence and industry restored Africa to its former tranquillity. His death was owing, if St. Jerom, Orosius, and St. Ambrose, are to be credited, to the malicious suggestions of certain persons at court, who, envying him the mighty reputation he had deservedly acquired, filled the young prince's mind with jealousies and suspicions, and by that means compassed the ruin of a person worthy, both for his valour and unblemished conduct, of the greatest honours the emperor could confer upon him. He was, at his earnest request, baptized just before he died; so that his death was no less exemplary, than his life had been glorious. Socrates writes, as we have observed above, that, on occasion of the conspiracy of Theodorus, all those were by Valens put to death, whole names began with Theod; and among the rest of the names one Theodosiolus, who was, says he, a man of great courage, and descended from an illustrious family in Spain, meaning perhaps count Theodosius; at least Baronius, Jorhanes, who, for the most part follows Socrates, and Flechier, in his life of the emperor Theodosius, are of that opinion. But Theodosius was put to death at Carthage, and not in the east, where Valens reigned. Besides, we cannot help looking upon the whole account of Socrates as a fable, to which he too easily gave credit, since neither Ammianus nor Zosimus, who seem to take particular pleasure in displaying the cruelties of Valens, make any mention of such a remarkable piece of cruelty as his putting several persons of distinction to death merely for the fake of their names. Sozomen indeed speaks of it, but as of a thing that was reported, perhaps because he had read it in Socrates. Be that as it will, statues, and other extraordinary honours, were decreed to Theodosius some years after his death by the

the senate of Rome; and several inscriptions, setting forth his virtues and exploits, have reached our times ⁹. His son, named likewise Theodosius, who being duke of Mælia in 374, had, with a courage and conduct above his years, defended that province against the incursions of the barbarians, as we have related above, was obliged to yield to the storm, and retire to Spain, his native country, where he lived in a kind of exile, till he was recalled by Gratian, and raised to the empire. As Ammianus takes no notice of these remarkable executions, we cannot help thinking there is a chasm in this part of his history, the more because he had promised elsewhere ¹⁰ to speak in a more proper place of the death of Maximinus and his accomplices, of which, however, no mention is made in such of his books as have reached us; nay, we find nothing in them relating to the western provinces, from the death of Valentinian I. that is, from the year 375, to 378. This year Valens sent the celebrated philosopher Themistius, with the character of embassador, to Gratian, then in Gaul; but what was the subject of his embassy, we know not. The philosopher, on his return to the east, came to Rome, complying therein with the request of Gratian, deferring the Romans might have the pleasure and honour of seeing so great a man ¹¹. It was at Rome, and before the senate of that great metropolis, that Themistius pronounced an oration altogether unworthy of a philosopher, nay, of any person who pretended to the least gravity ¹². However he bestows great encomiums upon Gratian; extols his liberality and generous temper; and observes, among other things, that the avaricious and cruel exactions of the old debts due to the exchequer were in the utmost confusion, because the instruments of their malice and cruelty had by the prince’s order being consumed in the flames ¹³, alluding, no doubt, to what we read in Aufonius, viz. that Gratian remitted whatever was due to the exchequer at the time of his father’s death, and caused all the papers relating thereunto to be burnt throughout the provinces that were subject to him ¹⁴. Themistius writes, that he found Gratian not far from the ocean ¹⁵, that is, in Gaul; for he was, as appears from the dates of several laws, during the

the months of March, April, May, and September, at Treves; and we have no proof of his being elsewhere this year. By a law dated from Treves the twenty-third of May, he raises the salaries of all public professors in the metropolis cities of Gaul, especially in the most illustrious city of Treves, as it is styled. From this law some pretend to infer, that Spain and Britain were at this time governed, not by vicars, but proconsuls, independent of the prefect of Gaul. However that be, it is certain, that vicars were soon after re-established in both provinces. By another law dated the seventeenth of the same month, which was an answer to Artemius vicar of Spain and several bishops, the emperor declares, that religious matters ought to be judged and decided on the spot by a synod of the diocese. By a diocese is meant the district within the jurisdiction of a vicar. By a third law, addressed to Nitentius, Gratian forbids all heretics, especially the Donatists, to hold assemblies; and commands the places where they shall assemble to be confiscated, except the churches, which he orders to be restored to the Catholics. From several monuments of this year, it appears, that the emperor allowed more liberty to the pagans, than to the Donatists, Arians, and other heretics.

Whilst these things passed in the west, a dreadful storm was raised in the east by the Huns, a nation till this time quite unknown to the Romans. They dwelt on the east side of the Palus Mæotis, now the sea of Zabache, and were near neighbours to the Goths, as Sozomen styles them, or rather to the Alans, who inhabited the country bordering on the opposite side of that marsh, which both nations looked upon as a deep sea, and were therefore altogether unacquainted with each other, till a hind, pursued by some hunters, or, as others will have it, an ox stung by a gad-fly, having passed the marsh, some Huns followed their guide to the opposite side, where they discovered a country far more agreeable and fruitful than their own. What we find concerning the Huns in Ammianus Marcellinus, the most ancient author that speaks of them, and most worthy of credit, is, that they first broke into the country of the Alans, who dwelt on the banks of the Tanais, the boundary between Europe and Asia; and having obliged that nation to enter into into an alliance with them, they fell, thus re-inforced, upon the Goths, called by Ammianus, Greuthongi, and by Jornandes, Ostrogoths, and spread every-where such terror among them, that Ermenric, or, as Jornandes calls him, Ermanaric, their king, tho' a martial prince, laid violent hands on himself, to avoid by that means the dreadful calamities that threatened him. The Hunns were headed, according to Jornandes, by one Balamir, by him styled king, probably because he was the most powerful man of their nation; for, according to Ammianus, they had no kings, but several chiefs, whose authority was very precarious. Vithimir, created king of the Greuthongi or Ostrogoths, in the room of Ermenric, attempted to make head against the Hunns; but was killed in a battle. Alatheus and Saphrax, governors to his son Vitheric, apprehending all their efforts would prove unsuccessful against the numerous and formidable forces of the enemy, abandoned the country, and withdrew into the plains between the Borysthenes and the Danube; that is into the present Podolia. Athanaric, king or chief of the Thervingi, who had assisted Procopius in his late usurpation, resolved to stand upon his guard, and prepared for a vigorous defence; but the Hunns, falling upon him before he had the least notice of their approach, obliged him to retire in disorder, after he had lost great numbers of his men. As the enemy, overloaded with booty, pursued him but slowly, he improved the short respite they allowed him, in fortifying himself by a wall, which he carried through the country of the Taifali from the Gerasus, or the Pruth, to the Danube. The other Goths, who had the good luck to escape the dreadful havoc which the Hunns made of their nation, found no other recourse, but to abandon their country, and save themselves within the Roman dominions. They therefore approached the banks of the Danube, to the number of two hundred thousand men, most of them the subjects of king Athanaric, and those whom Jornandes calls Visigoths. From thence they dispatched embassadors to Valens, who was then at Antioch, begging, in a most submissive manner, to be admitted into Thrace, where they promised to live peaceably, and to serve, whenever called upon, in the Roman armies. At the head of this embassy was their bishop Ulphilas, who, on this occasion casion, out of complaisance to Valens, became a proselyte to the doctrine of Arius, and infected with the tenets of that heresich, not only such of his nation as already professed the christian religion, but those two who promised to embrace it, provided proper persons were sent to instruct them. The demand of the Goths occasioned great debates in a grand council held at court soon after the arrival of their embassadors; but Valens in the end resolved to grant them their request, several sycophants about him flattering him, and extolling his good fortune, which had unexpectedly brought him a perpetual supply of excellent soldiers, with which he could be furnished at his pleasure, and by that means save the expense of new levies, to the great benefit of his treasury; nay, their demand was thought so advantageous to the empire, that some Roman officers having cut off a party of Goths, who attempted to pass the Danube before the return of the embassadors, whom both their nation and the governor of Thrace had sent to Antioch, they were cashiered as good officers, but bad politicians. Valens, upon the imaginary prospect of the great advantages that would accrue to the empire from such an encrease of people, ordered them to be immediately transported, to be plentifully supplied with provisions, and lands to be assigned them to cultivate. He took, however, therein such precautions, as would perhaps have prevented the disturbances which soon followed, had they been duly observed; for, according to the instructions which he sent to his officers and ministers, the children were to pass the first, and be sent into Asia, where they were to be kept as hostages; and as for the rest, they were not to be suffered to land on the Roman side, till they had quitted their arms. But the heads of the nation, by presenting the Roman officers with sums of money, with beautiful women, and robust slaves, prevailed upon them to neglect both these orders. Thus the Goths, in this year 376, abandoned to the Hunns the country, in which they had dwelt for the space of one hundred and fifty years. We are told, that great numbers of them were drowned in their passage, the river happening to be greatly swelled at that time. Ammianus writes, that the Roman officers designed to have counted them as they passed, but could not by reason of their numbers, which that writer compares to the sparks which at that very time issued out out of mount Ætna, and to the sands of the Lybian shore: They were under the conduct of Ablavivus and Fritigern, who are styled kings. Vitheric, king of the Greuthongi, with his governors Saphrax and Alatheus, and another chief named Farnobius, being likewise driven out of their country by the Hunns and the Alans, flocked in swarms to the banks of the Danube, and, encouraged by the reception which their countrymen had met with from Valens, dispatched embassadors to him, begging, that they too might be admitted within the Roman dominions; but the emperor not thinking it consistent with the safety of the state to comply with their request, they continued for some time on the banks of the Danube, which they passed in the end, in spite of the Romans, as we shall relate hereafter. As for Athanaric, he retired with his people to a place defended by inaccessible rocks, named Caucala, having driven from thence the Sarmatians and the Taifali. The latter people followed and joined the Greuthongi. A numerous body of Goths had been admitted some time before, on what occasion we are no where told, and were at this time encamped in the neighbourhood of Adrianople, under the command of their two chiefs Suerid and Colias: perhaps Valens had sent for them on occasion of his intended expedition into Persia; for Ammianus assures us, that he hired troops of the Goths. The following year 377, when Gratian was consul the fourth time, with Merobaudes, Valens was, as appears from the dates of several laws, at Antioch on the fourth of April; at Hierapolis on the fourth of July and the ninth of August; and again at Antioch on the twenty-fourth of September. The Romans ought in policy to have immediately led the Goths away from the Danube; for by that means they would have got them into their power, and, remaining masters of the river, prevented their receiving any assistance from their countrymen, encamped in great numbers on the opposite bank; but, instead of that, Lupicinus and Maximus, who commanded in Thrace, the former with the title of count, and the latter with that of duke, suffered them to continue long in that neighbourhood, pretending scarcity of provisions, in order to impose upon them, and oblige them to buy necessaries at extravagant rates. The Goths, thus pinched with hunger, and provoked by other outrages, began to mutiny; which Lupicinus perceiving, he ordered them to begin their march, and remove from the neighbourhood of the Danube, charging the soldiers who guarded the banks of the Danube, to drive them on, and take care that they committed no disorders in the countries through which they passed. The Greuthongi, finding the banks of the river unguarded, laid hold of that opportunity to pass it, following at some distance Fritigern and Ablavivus, who were advancing at the head of the Thervingi to Marcianopolis, the capital of Lower Moesia. Upon their arrival in the neighbourhood of that city, Lupcinus, who resided there, invited the two chiefs to a banquet; but at the same time placed guards at the gates, to prevent their troops from entering the city, tho' they desired to be admitted as friends, only to buy the necessary provisions, of which they stood in great need. Hereupon the Thervingi, who were in a starving condition, falling upon the guards, cut most of them in pieces; which Lupcinus no sooner heard, than, by way of retaliation, he commanded the attendants of the two chiefs to be assassinated in the height of their mirth. The Thervingi without the walls, provoked at the treachery and cruelty of the governor, vowed revenge; but nevertheless wisely forbore for the present all hostilities, and dissembled their just resentment, lest the Romans should offer any affront to their chiefs, or detain them as hostages. This Fritigern himself apprehended, and therefore begged leave of Lupcinus to go with Ablavivus, and shew himself to his men, who were ready to mutiny, upon a false report, that they had both been killed with the rest. Lupcinus, who by this time was so intoxicated with wine, that he knew not what he did, complied with his request; and the two chiefs, being received with great joy by their countrymen, immediately mounted their horses, declared themselves enemies, and began to plunder the open country. Lupcinus marched out against them the next day, with the few troops he had with him; but the Goths, falling upon him with great resolution and intrepidity, cut most of his men in pieces, and obliged him to fly back into the city. We have observed above, that a considerable body of Goths was encamped in the neighbourhood of Adrianople. There, upon the news of the revolt, and the victory gained by Fritigern, continued quiet in their camp, without betraying the least inclination to join him; but when they received orders to pass without delay over into the Hellespont, and the chief magistrate of Adrianople, incensed against them for some damage they had done at his country-feast, instead of supplying them with the necessary provisions for their march, ordered the people of the country to fall upon them, they likewise began to mutiny, put to flight the disorderly multitude that offered to attack them, and joining Fritigern, laid siege to Adrianople; but not being able to reduce it, they left a sufficient force to block it up, and ravaged all Thrace, growing daily stronger by the accession of incredible numbers of Gothi flaves, flocking to them from all quarters; nay, many Romans, not able to pay the exorbitant taxes with which they were loaded and oppressed, took part with them, and it is not to be doubted, but Vitheric with his Greuthongi joined them soon after; for they too fought against the Romans in the memorable battle of Adria-none, of which hereafter. Valens, who was then at Antioch, watching the designs of the king of Per sia, upon the first notice of these dangerous commotions, dispatched Victor to the Persian court, with the character of embassador, charging him to conclude a peace with that king, upon the best terms he could obtain; and at the same time ordered the two generals, Trajan and Profuturus, to march with the utmoft expedition against the Goths, at the head of the legions that were quartered in Armenia. Gratian, alarmed at the danger that threatened his uncle’s dominions, sent to his afflance Richomeres, with a considerable reinforcement out of Gaul; but the soldiers deserted in great numbers, on their march, solicited to it, as was reported, by Merobaudes, who apprehended the barbarians might take advantage of their ableness to break into Gaul. As Profuturus and Trajan were commanders of more courage than conduct, instead of securing the passes, and shutting up such multitudes in the province of Thrace, where they must inevitably have soon perished with famine, they ventured to engage them at Sal-ces, a city of Lower Scythia. The battle lasted from morning to night, both armies fighting with such obstinacy and resolution, as can hardly be expressed. Victory continued doubtful to the last; but the Romans, having loft more men in proportion to the small number of their forces, thought it adviseable to retire to Marcianapolis. Thus Aminius, whom we have all along followed m. But Theodoret n, St. Jerom o, and Orosius p, write, that the Romans were defeated, and put to flight. This battle was fought in the latter end of the summer of this year 377. Trajan and Profuturus being afterwards reinforced by a considerable body of troops sent by Valens, under the command of Saturninus general of the horse, they attempted to shut up the enemy in certain narrow places, and intercept their provision; but the Alans and Hunns themselves hastening in great numbers to their relief, the Romans were obliged to retire, and suffer them to raveage and lay waste all Thrace, without daring to oppose or molest them. At a place called Dibaltum, you fell upon a tribune, who was stationed there with his own legion and some other forces. As the tribune, by name Barzimeres, was an old experienced officer, he drew his men up in a close body, and, endeavouring to make his way through the enemy's squadrons, cut great numbers of them in pieces; but was at length overpowered, and put to the sword, with all his men. Animated with this success, they went in quest of Frigerid, who commanded in Illyricum, and had been ordered by Gratian to march from thence to the assistance of Valens. The Goths, under the command of Farnobius, met him near Berea, a city in Thrace properly so called, and attacked him with great resolution. But Frig-erid, who was an officer of great experience, tho' perhaps over-cautious, and thence by some reproached with timorousness, stood his ground, and, after a long and obstinate dispute, killed their leader on the spot, and put the rest to the sword, excepting a very small number, who throwing down their arms, were spared, and sent captives into Italy, where they were employed in tilling the ground about Mutina, Rhegium, and Parma. With this battle, which was fought in the latter end of the autumn, ended the campaign of this year 377.

As for Gratian, he was on the twenty-seventh of February at Treves, where he had passed the winter, and on the twenty-eighth of July at Mayence, perhaps on some expedition against the Germans not mentioned in history; for Auonius tells us, that he took some Germans prisoners, and brought them with him into Gaul. He was returned to Treves on the seventeenth of September. By a law dated the fifth of March, and addressed to Cataphronus vicar of Italy, he grants several exemptions to the clergy, compri-ing under that name, not only bishops, priests, and deacons, but likewise sub-deacons, exorcists, readers, and janitors or door-keepers. A dreadful plague raged this year in most of the western provinces, and swept off incredible numbers of people. The following year 378, when Valens was conquered the sixth time, and young Valentinian the second, the Goths, from Thrace, advanced into Macedon and the Rhodopes, committing every-where dreadful ravages; nay, they approached Constantinople itself, plundered the suburbs, and kept the city for some time blocked up. Valens therefore, having first sent a body of Scythians to drive them from the neighbourhood of that metropolis, set out from Antioch, in order to head his army in person, and arrived at Constantinople on the thirtieth of May, where he found the people highly dissatisfied with his conduct, in admitting the Goths into Thrace, and by that means giving rise to the present war. Soon after his arrival, he discharged Trajan general of the foot, and put count Satrapian, a brave and experienced commander, in his room. Theodoret tells us, that Trajan, who was a professed enemy to the Arians, and a zealous de-defender of the Nicene faith, hearing himself reproached by the emperor with cowardice, as if the loss of the late battle had been owing to want of courage in him, answered boldly, that heaven justly provoked at his driving out the orthodox bishops, and putting the infamous followers of Arius in their room, had declared for the Goths; and consequently that he ought to blame not his generals, but himself, for the losses he had hitherto sustained, and for the far greater calamities that would soon overtake him, unless he altered his conduct.

The generals Arintheus and Victor declared, adds Theodoret, that they were of the same opinion, and begged the emperor not to refuse their speaking, as his true friends, their sentiments without disguise. The piety of Trajan is greatly commended by the ecclesiastic writers, especially by Theo-doret and St. Basil, with whom he lived in great intimacy.
But it is no easy task to reconcile his extraordinary piety the death of Pintas king of Armenia, whom, if the account of Ammianus be true, he caused to be murdered with the utmost treachery and barbarity, as we have related above.
Valens continued but a very short time at Constanti nople; for he left that city on the eleventh of June, highly exapered against the inhabitants, who had insulted him as the author of the present war, and threatening, if he came back safe, to turn their city into a desert. From Constannople he marched to Melanthias, an imperial castle, about eighteen miles distant from the city; and thence detached Sebastian with a body of chosen troops against Fritigern, who was encamped in the neighbourhood of Adrianople. Sebastian, coming upon the enemy unawares, cut off several of their parties, who were roving about the country, without the least apprehension of danger, and recovered the booty with which they were loaded. Hereupon Fritigern, having sent orders to all the parties that were dispersed about the country, to join him without delay, retired upon their arrival to the city of Catyle, of which geographers can give no account. Zosimus tells us, that Sebastian engaged to force the Goths either to quit the Roman territories, or to submit to Valens, with two thousand men only, by cutting off their parties, and intercepting their provisions; but that Valens, defirous to equal, by some memorable action, the glory acquired this year by Gratian in the famous battle of Argentaria, rejected his proposal, and leaving Melanthias, advanced to the neighbourhood of Adrianople, with a design to give the enemy battle. He was at the head of a very numerous and well-disciplined army, commanded by officers of great renown, and among the rest by Trajan, whom he had restored to his former post. While he lay at Adrianople, Richomeres arrived there with letters from Gratian, acquainting him, that he was on full march with his victorious army to join him, and earnestly entreating him, not to hazard a battle till his arrival, nor make that victory doubtful, which the conjunction of their forces would render certain and indisputable. Hereupon a council of war being immediately summoned, Victor, who commanded the horse, and was both a brave and prudent officer, advised him by all means to wait the arrival of his nephew, and the reinforcement of the Gaulish troops; but Sebastian was for giving battle without delay; and his opinion the emperor preferred to that of Victor, and almost all the other officers, being induced thereto by his flatterers, telling him, that he stood in no need of the assistance of his nephew, and therefore ought not to allow him any share in the victory, and the glory attending it. At the same time Fritigern sent deputies to him, at the head of whom was a chritian priest, offering to conclude a peace upon very reasonable terms, which most of his officers advised him by all means to embrace, remonstrating, that an honourable and certain certain peace was preferable to an uncertain victory; but he, desirous to all their remonstrances, and obstinately bent upon engaging before the arrival of his nephew, leaving the great officers of the court, with his treasures, in Adrianople, and all the baggage of the army near that city, with a strong detachment to guard it, set out with the rest in quest of the enemy, whom he discovered about noon in the neighbourhood of Nice, about fifteen miles from Adrianople. The Goths, commanded by Aleuthus and Saphrax, were encamped at a considerable distance from the rest. Messengers were therefore immediately dispatched to them; and in the mean time, to amuse the emperor till they arrived, ambassadors were sent to him, with proposals of peace, to which the emperor gave ear; but inflicting upon their delivering up to him some of their chief men as hostages. At the same time, Fritigern, further to amuse the emperor, acquainted him by a private letter, that he was ready to bring all his forces over to him, provided some persons of distinction were sent to him as hostages. Valens, overjoyed at this proposal, named first Equico his kinsman for one of the hostages; but he, as he had been taken prisoner by the Goths the preceding year, and had made his escape, begging to be excused, Richomeres offered himself of his own accord; but, before he reached the enemy's camp, Bacurius, prince of the Iberians, and one Cassus, who commanded a party of archers, falling upon the Goths, gave beginning to the battle, which was fought with great obstinacy and resolution on both sides. Ammianus gives us a long, but confused account of this memorable engagement. According to him, the foot in the left wing of the Romans, having advanced too far, and separated themselves from the main body of the army, and from the cavalry that was to support them, were surrounded by the enemy, which inspired the barbarians with great courage. St. Jerome and Socrates write, that the foot was abandoned by the cavalry; and Sozomen, that Valens, being in too great haste to engage, did not allow himself time to draw up his men as he ought. Libanius says, that he fought with more courage than prudence or conduct. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the Romans were utterly defeated.

defeated; that two thirds of their army were cut in pieces, and the rest forced to save themselves by a precipitous and disorderly flight. The Roman writers themselves own this to have been the greatest overthrow their state had ever received since the battle of Cannae. Their foot did all that men, whose native courage was emboldened by despair, could do; but were in the end overpowered with numbers, and obliged, in spite of their utmost efforts, to yield to an enemy, who was not only infinitely superior to them in numbers, but equalled them in courage and bravery. Among many other eminent persons, fell in this action the brave generals Trajan and Victor, with Valerian the tribunus stabuli, or master of the horse; Equico the emperor's kinsman, and majister palatii, or great steward of the household; and Patentius, a youth of extraordinary hopes, and by all greatly respected, in regard of his father Ursicinus, so famous in the reign of Constantius. But nothing has rendered this battle more memorable in history, than the unhappy end of Valens himself, who perished on this occasion, as all authors agree, tho' they differ in their accounts of his death; for some write, that he was killed upon the spot; and others, that being wounded in the field, and not in a condition to fly, he was carried to a countryman's house, which his attendants made good against the barbarians, till they, not suspecting the emperor to be there, set fire to it, which consumed the house, and all who were in it, except a youth, who having made his escape, first out of the flames, and afterwards from the enemy, who had taken him prisoner, gave the Romans an account of the emperor's unhappy end. Both these opinions are related by Ammianus; and the former was adopted by Libanius, as more proper for a pacygic; but the latter, which is generally thought the most probable, by Victor, St. Jerome, Rufinus, Orosius, Zosimus, and Socrates. Sozomen and Philostorgius follow the same opinion; but add some circumstances, which seem quite improbable. St. Chrysostom speaks of the death of Valens perishing in the flames, as a memorable instance of the vanity of all human grandeur. Theodoret follows the same opinion; but was certainly mistaken in supposing Valens not to have been present at the battle. Ammianus observes, that before Valens left Antioch, it was become a common curse or imprecation among the inhabitants of that metropolis, May Valens be burnt alive. The same writer pretends that unhappy end to have been pretended by several prodigies, as a punishment inflicted upon him by heaven, for having cau ted Paras king of Armenia to be inhumanly murdered, and for putting many innocent persons to death, on occasion of the conspiracy of Theodorus. The reader will find in Zosimus the description of a spectacle, which, says he, was seen by Valens and all his court, when he marched out of Constantineople against the Goths. To this perhaps Ammianus alludes in a passage, which seems to us very obscure. Theophanes takes notice of some other prodigies, and affurces us, that some of the emperor’s officers owned after his death, that he had suffered the aruspices to be consulted concerning the issue of this war. Ammianus, and other writers, tell us, that near the place where the emperor died, was discovered, agreable to a pretended prediction, the tomb of an antient Macedonian captain, by name Mirmanto. All authors agree, that neither his body, nor the least remains of it, were ever found; and that his memory was honoured by no funeral obsequies. Ecclesiastic writers look upon his death as a judgment from heaven, for his persecuting with great cruelty the catholics, and his encouraging the heresy of Arius, which flourished and encroached in his reign, more than it had done under any of his predecessors. With him perished in the flames, according to the modern Greeks, his great chamberlain, a zealous patron of the Arians, and an avowed enemy to the orthodox believers. Such was the end of Valens, after he had lived about fifty years, and reigned fifteen, four months, and some days. He was quite a stranger to every branch of literature, and no better acquainted with the military art, than with the liberal sciences. He did not so much as understand the Greek tongue, tho’ he had reigned so many years in the east among the Greeks. He found out no expedients of himself; but, when they were proposed by others, he had discernment enough to to know which was the best and most proper. He was naturally indolent and inactive, an enemy to all labour, and averse to business; which was owing to the easy life he had led, free from trouble, till he was created emperor. He was timorous to a great degree, and unwilling to expose himself to any danger. To this disposition most authors ascribe the extraordinary deference which he ever paid to his brother Valentinian. Themistius commends his chastity; and Ammianus, a writer no-ways biaffed in his favour, does not reprove him with any kind of lewdness or debauchery. He was constant and faithful in his friendship, whereof several instances are related by Ammianus. He raised such only of his relations as were persons of merit, and, generally speaking, had regard to nothing but merit in the disposal of employments. He kept a watchful eye over his ministers, exacted the military discipline with great rigour, not suffering his soldiers to do the least injury to those through whose countries they marched, and flayed himself on all occasions ready to hearken to the complaints of his injured subjects. He seems to have discharged the foreign guards, who had been employed by other princes as the ministers of their cruelty. He was thoroughly acquainted with the state of his finances, and therefore did not suffer himself to be imposed upon, as most of his predecessors had done, by those who managed them. Tho' he was quite unacquainted with the liberal sciences, yet he is said to have composed some speeches, with the assistance of one Heliodorus, a man of a mean descent, and infamous character, as we read in Ammianus, who complains of the emperor, for obliging persons of the first rank to attend his funeral. Themistius styles him the father of the provinces, by reason of the great care he took in easing them, by all possible means, of the heavy taxes with which they had been loaded by his predecessors. Ammianus owns, that he could not with more care consult the good of his own family, than he did the welfare of all his subjects; and that the eastern provinces had been under no prince happier than under him. However, all authors agree, that he had a strange bias to avarice and cruelty.

cruelty, which, joined to his jealous and suspicious temper, prompted him often to condemn innocent persons, and seize on their estates. The least suspicion of treason rendered him inexorable, says Ammianus, and his ears were open to all manner of accusations. All the ecclesiastic writers agree, that he allowed to the many facts that then prevailed, nay, even to the Jewish and pagans, the free exercise of their religion; but persecuted the catholics with the utmost cruelty, of which we have seen one remarkable instance in the history of his reign; and the reader may find many others in the above-mentioned writers. He left two daughters behind him, Carofo and Anaftatia; but all we know of them is, that Preocipius, who become famous in the latter end of the reign of Theodosius, married one of them, he being styled by Zofimus and Sozomen, the son-in-law of Valens. What become of the empress Albia Dominica, after the death of her husband, we are no-where told. St. Chrysostom, writing about the year 381, observes, that the widow of an emperor, who had been banished by another prince, was then recalled by the mediation of many persons of distinction, who with much ado obtained that favour. Most writers take the empress, of whom he speaks in that place, to have been the widow of the emperor Valens. But as to the cause of her disgrace and misfortune, we are quite in the dark. With the death of Valens, Ammianus Marcellinus ends his history; but of him, and Eutropius, who wrote his abridgment of the Roman history in the reign of Valens, and by that prince's command, we shall speak in note (K).

(K) Ammianus Marcellinus was a native of Antioch, where his family made some figure (1). He served several years in the army, from the year 350 to 359; under count Ursinus, partly in Mesopotamia, and partly in Gaul, in quality of domesticus, which was then an honourable post. He attended Julian in his Persian expedition, and was at Antioch, or in that neighbourhood, when the conspiracy of Theodosius was discovered in the reign of Valens (2). Afterwards he renounced the profession of arms, and retired to Rome, where he wrote his history, as appears both from the history itself (3), and from a letter which Libanius wrote to him from Antioch (4), while

while he was composing it. His twenty-sixth book was not ended before the year 399, and the twenty-second was written the year before (5). His work was divided into thirty-one books, and comprised the reigns of all the emperors, from Domitian, where Suetonius ends, to the death of Valens; but of his thirty-one books, only the last eighteen, beginning after the death of Magnentius in 353, have reached our times. Tho' he was a Greek, he chose to write in Latin; but his Latin, in the opinion of Vossius, speaks him both a Greek and a soldier (6). But his other good qualities make sufficient amends, says the same writer, for their faults; for he writes with great judgment, and seems to have been a great lover of truth (7). However, he plainly betrayed a great zeal for the religion of the ancient Romans, and no small partiality for those who countenanced it, especially for his hero Julian. In his history he frequently makes long and tedious digressions on the comets, and other things, which fall not within the province of an historian. In his accounts he is now-and-then somewhat confused, and often leaves out the most material circumstances of the facts he relates; which has induced some to believe, that his history is in several places maimed and imperfect. But, after all, without his history, we should have been quite in the dark with respect to the most remarkable transactions of those times. Some epigrams by one Ammianus have reached our times; but whether they were the work of the historian, is altogether uncertain. The reader will find several things relating to Ammianus have reached our times; but whether they were the work of the historian, is altogether uncertain. The reader will find several things relating to Ammianus, and his history, in the prolegomena, which Mr. Valois has prefixed to the last edition of the works of that historian at Paris in 1681. Eutropius wrote his abridgment of the Roman history in the reign of Valentinian and Valens, and inscribed it to the latter, having undertaken it at his request. He gives that prince the title of Gothicus, a plain proof that he published his work after the year 369, in which Valens defeated Athanaric, one of the kings or chiefs of the Goths. Mr. Valois styles him a polite and elegant writer; but Vinetus, who published his works in 553, concludes from his style, that he was not a Roman, but a Greek (8). Vossius too finds fault with his style; but, upon the whole, commends his work, as an abridgment of the Roman history done with great judgment (9). He is often copied by St. Jerom in his chronicle, and quoted by other Latin writers. His work seems to have been in great request among the Greeks; for two translations of it were done into that language, guage, the one by Pænius, and the other by Capito. The latter, who was by birth a Lycian, not only translated into Greek the abridgment of Livy, says Suidas, done by Eutropius, but wrote besides the history of Iasulia in eight books, and likewise that of Lycia and Pamphylia. The translation of Eutropius by Pænius, was published among the other Augustian writers by Sylburgius at Francfort in 1590. Sylburgius is of opinion, that Pænius was contemporary with Eutropius. However that be, it is certain, that he often deviates both from the meaning of the original, and the truth of history (10). As for Eutropius himself, Suidas styles him an Italian sophist; and adds, that he published several other works (11). From his works it does not appear, whether he professed the Christian religion, or no. He was present, according to Codin, at the laying the foundations of Constantinople, and left behind him an account of the origin of that city (12). If what that author writes be true, Eutropius must have been very young at that time. He attended Julian in his expedition into Persia (13). He seems to have been of the senatorial order; for, at the head of his work, he is distinguished with the title of clarissimus, which was peculiar to senators. In the reign of Valentinian, and before the year 376, died, according to St. Jerom, Aquilius, or Acilius Severus, a native of Spain, who wrote the history of his own life in prose and verse, under the title of catastrophe. He was descended from another Severus, to whom Laetantius inscribed two books of his letters. St. Jerom places him among the ecclesiastic writers (14); but his work has been long since lost.

The Roman history, from the death of Valens to the division of the empire.

GRATIAN, alarmed at the danger that threatened the eastern provinces, overrun by the barbarians, resolved to march in person to the assistance of his uncle, as soon as the season would permit; and in the mean time ordered part of the forces he had with him in Gaul to hasten into Illyricum, and, joining the troops quartered in that province, to enter Thrace, and reinforce the army which Valens had sent thither. This the Germans, called Lentienfes, whose country bordered upon Rhaetia, no sooner understood, than by an open breach of the treaty, which they had but lately concluded with Gratian, they passed the Rhine upon the ice, to the number of forty thousand men, and upwards; and entering Gaul, began to commit dreadful ravages in the neighbourhood of that river. Hereupon the emperor recalled the troops which he had ordered to march into Illyricum, and sent them reinforced with those that were left in Gaul under the conduct of count Nannianus, and Mallobaudes, king of the Franks, who served in the Roman army in quality of comes domesticorum, to drive back the Lentienfes, whose numbers increased daily, the Romans, who guarded the banks of the Rhine, having through fear of the barbarians, abandoned their stations. The two generals, though at the head of a handful of men, gave them battle in the neighbourhood of Argentaria, which most geographers take to have flood where the present city of Colmar stands. The Romans at first gave ground, being overpowered with numbers; but in the end gained a complete victory, and made such a dreadful havoc of the enemy, that, out of such a prodigious multitude, scarce five thousand had the good luck to make their escape, thirty thousand of them being killed upon the spot, and the rest either slain in the pursuit, or taken prisoners. Their king Triarius, the chief author of the war, was in the number of the slain. Orosius writes, that Gratian was present at the battle; and that, depending

ing upon the assistance of heaven, he attacked the enemy, tho' greatly superior to him in number. But Ammianus only writes, that Gratian advanced to support his generals. This battle was not fought before the month of May; for on the twenty-second of April the emperor was still at Treves, as appears from a law bearing that date. After this victory, Gratian passed the Rhine at the head of his army; and, entering the enemy's country, shut them up on all sides among the barren mountains, to which they had fled with their families; and by that means reduced them in a short time to such straits, that they were forced to submit to the terms the conqueror thought fit to prescribe; one of which was, that they should deliver up their youth to serve in the Roman army, which they did accordingly. Thus were the Romans greatly reinforced by this new accession of strength, and at the same time that inconstant and faithless nation put out of a condition of raising new disturbances in the emperor's absence. In this expedition Gratian gave signal proofs of his courage, prudence, good-nature, and generosity; which gained him the esteem and affection of all who served under him. He immediately wrote to Valens, acquainting him with his victory, and begging him not to hazard a battle till he had joined him, which he assured him would be very soon. But Valens, now jealous of the reputation of his young nephew, which he thought eclipsed his own, and desirous of equaling his exploits against the Germans, resolved to give battle before his arrival, that he might enjoy, without a rival, the glory of the victory, which he looked upon as certain. In the mean time, Gratian having sufficiently provided for the security of Gaul, began his march, and with great expedition advanced to Arbor Felix, now Arbon, on the lake of Constance, and from thence to Lauriacum, now Lorch, in Austria, on the Danube, between the Traun and the Ens. There he embarked part of his troops on the Danube, and marched by land with the rest to Bononia in Lower Dacia, and from thence to Sirmium, where he sallied but four days, tho' he was then ill of an intermitting fever. From Sirmium he pursued his march along the Danube to a fort in the same province, called Castra Martis. In his march, some of his men, who had straggled from the army, were intercepted and cut off by the Alans. From Castra Martis he dispatched Richomeres, his comes domesdomiciliorum, to acquaint Valens, that he was at hand, and earnestly entreat him in his name not to engage the numerous forces of the enemy till his arrival. But Valens, hastening the battle, that his nephew might have no share in the victory, was utterly defeated and perished, with two-thirds of his army, in the manner we have related above. The day after the battle, the Goths, informed by a deserter, that Valens had left many per sons of great distinction in Adrianople, and that the imperial treasure was lodged there, laid siege to the place; but being repulsed with great slaughter, as quite strangers to the art of besieging towns, they dropped the enterprise; and marching towards Perinthus or Heraclea, laid waste that fertile country, and then advanced to Constantinople, hoping to make themselves masters of that flatly metropolis, and of the immense wealth lodged in it. But the Saracens, whom Mavia their queen had sent to the assistance of the Romans, and who were more dextrous at sudden onsets, than regular engagements, having in several sallies cut off great numbers of the Goths, the rest thought it advisable to break up the siege, and retire from the neighbourhood of that city. The remaining part of this year they spent in ravaging, without opposition, Thrace, Scythia, Moesia, and even Illyricum, as far as the Julian Alps, which part that province from Italy. The neighbouring barbarians, namely the Quadi and Sarmatians, entered the Roman territories at the same time, putting all to fire and sword, and surpassing the Goths themselves in the un-heard-of cruelties they practised. St. Jerome gives us a pathetic account of the calamities suffered at that time by the subjects of the empire. The whole country, says he, from Constantinople to the Julian Alps, have been swimming these twenty years in Roman blood: Scythia, Thrace, Macedonia, Dardania, Dacia, Thessalonica, (or rather Theffaly) Achaia, both Epirus’s, Dalmatia, both Pannonia’s, are filled with Goths, Sarmatians, Quadians, Alans, Hunns, Vandals, Marcomans, &c. whose avarice nothing has escaped, whose cruelty has been felt by persons of all ranks, ages, and conditions. How many eminent persons of both sexes, how many sacred virgins, have been outrageously insulted, and hurried into captivity? Bishops have been inhumanly massacred, with their clergy; churches pulled down, the relics of the holy martyrs dug up, and the the sacred altars turned into mangers. The downfall of the Roman empire is at hand. The same saint, writing in the year 406, that is, eight years after the present time, tells us, that Illyricum, Thrace, and Dalmatia, his native country, looked still like deserts, and that nothing was to be seen in them but briars and thick forests. The cities of Illyricum, which suffered most on this occasion, were Petavio and Murfia; the former is said to have been betrayed to the barbarians by Valens, whom the Arians had attempted to raise to that see. As there were great numbers of Goths, who served in the Roman armies, quartered in the forts and cities of Asia, Julius, who commanded in that province, apprehending they would rise and join their countrymen, if they should move that way, by private letters sent to the governors of the cities where they were quartered, ordered them all to be massacred at the same time. This severe, but perhaps necessary, order was put in execution without the least noise or disturbance, and Asia delivered from the danger it had just reason to apprehend; for Zosimus assures us, that the Goths only wanted an opportunity to revolt, and treat the Romans as they were treated by them.

We left Gratian on the frontiers of Thrace, ready to enter that province, and join Valens; but he no sooner heard the news of his death, and of the great loss the Romans had sustained in the fatal battle of Adrianople, which was brought to him by Victor, who had had the good luck to escape the general slaughter, than he marched back to Sirmium, to deliberate there on the most proper measures to be taken in so critical a conjuncture. After a short stay at Sirmium, he marched at the head of all the forces he could assemble, to Constantinople, to secure that metropolis; and in the mean time considering with himself how many brave officers had perished in the present war, and how much he stood in need of an able and faithful general, he sent for young Theodosius, who, after having given signal proofs of his courage, conduct and experience in military affairs, had, upon the death of his father, retired to Spain, his native country, to avoid, as we have related above, the storm that threatened him. Theodosius complied with the emperor's command; and quitting his retirement, hastened into Illyricum, where he was received by Gratian with the greatest demonstrations of kindness and esteem, and soon after sent at the head of a considerable considerable army against the Sarmatians, who were in full march to join the Goths: but Theodosius, falling upon them, cut the greater part of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to repass the Danube. The victory he gained on this occasion was so complete, that the emperor could not believe the account which Theodosius himself gave him of it upon his return to court, till he was informed of the truth by persons sent on purpose to view the field of battle d. To this victory, and the other which Gratian had gained this year over the Germans before he left Gaul, Aufonius no doubt alluded, when he wrote, that the emperor in one and the same year appeased the troubles on the Rhine and the Danube e. From Constantinople the emperor returned to Sirmium, and passed the winter there. As he was a zealous catholic, he no sooner saw himself by the death of Valens, master of the east, than he recalled and restored to their sees, the orthodox bishops, who had been banished by Valens; and, by an edict, granted an entire liberty of conscience to christians of all denominations, except the Manichees, the Photinians, and the Eunomians, whom he would not suffer to have any churches f. This edict put an stop to the persecution, which the Arians had raised, and carried on with great cruelty against the catholics, during the whole reign of Valens. Gratian, notwithstanding his zeal for the orthodox faith, did not think it advisable for the present to meddle any farther with religious affairs, through fear of raising new disturbances, which, in the present distracted state of the empire, might have been attended by dangerous consequences. This law, granting liberty of conscience to all christians, seems to have taken place only in the east, where the catholics did not enjoy it before; for by another law enacted this very year, and addressed to Flavianus, vicar of Africa, he absolutely condemns the Donatists, orders their churches to be delivered up to the catholics, and declares, that he will suffer no other doctrine to be taught or held, except that which is agreeable to the gospel, to the faith of the apostles, and to the tradition of the church g. While he resided at Sirmium, surrounded on all sides by the barbarians, he named Aufonius and Olybrius consuls for the ensuing year. He wrote to Aufonius, who had been his preceptor, a most obliging letter.

ter, acquainting him with his promotion, and at the same time sent him the consular robe, that which the emperors wore when they triumphed. As Valens died without issue male, Gratian by his death, became sole master of the empire; but not thinking himself, being then only in the twentieth year of his age, equal to so great a burden, especially at so critical a conjuncture, when the Goths, Hunns, Alans, Sarmatians and Quadians had broken into the empire on one side, and the Aleman and other German nations were ready to invade it on the other, he resolved to take a colleague capable of easing him of part of his burden, and extricating the state out of the difficulties under which it laboured. Young Valentinian shared indeed with him the title, but not the authority of emperor, he being but seven or at the most eight years old. Without any regard therefore to his own relations, or rather looking upon those, to use the expression of Themistius, as his nearest relations, who were best qualified for so great a trust, he determined to assume Theodosius for his partner in the supreme power; a person of most extraordinary accomplishments, and no less admired by all on account of his exemplary piety, than for his prudence, his experience in war, and the mighty exploits he had already performed. Pursuant to this resolution, he declared him emperor at Sirmium on the nineteenth of January of the ensuing year 379, whilst Ausonius and Q. Clodius Hermogenianus Olybrius were consuls. It was with the utmost difficulty that Gratian prevailed upon him to accept, says Pacatus, what others sought with so much ambition, and employed the most unlawful means to attain. He refused, continues the same author, what others looked upon as the greatest happiness, in such manner as evidently shewed, that he accepted it in the end by mere constraint. After Gratian had to the general satisfaction both of the people and soldiery, declared him emperor with the usual solemnity, he committed to his care the east, Thrace, and the rest of the provinces, which had been governed by Valens, reserving for himself only Gaul, Spain, and Britain; for Italy, Illyricum, and Africa, were held by his brother Valentinian. Sozomen writes, that to the east Gratian added Illyricum; which, if true, must be be understood of the east part of Illyricum; for the west part was always held by the princes of the western empire, who till this time had been masters of both. West Illyricum comprised both Pannonia’s, the one and the other Noricum, Dalmatia, and Savia, which we take to be the province that was for some time known by the name of Valeria. That Gratian kept these provinces is past dispute. East Illyricum consisted of Macedon, the one and the other Epirus, Thesaly, Achaia, Crete, both Dacia’s, Upper Moesia, Dardania, and Praevalitana.

Theodosius, whom Gratian raised to the empire, was, according to most authors, a native of Cauca in Galicia, which city still retains the same name; but Marcellinus in his chronicle supposes him to have been born in Italic near Seville, the birth place of the emperor Trajan; and both that writer and Claudian reckon him among the great men of the Ulpian family, from which Trajan was sprung. Theodosius resembled that prince according to Victor, both in the features of his face, and the virtues of his mind; but was a stranger to the vices of Trajan, such as drunkenness, incontinence, and ambition. He was the son of Thef-mantia and the celebrated Theodosius, who conquered a new province in Britain, overcome Firmus in Africa, and was deservedly accounted the greatest commander of his age. But his triumphs and great reputation having raised him many enemies at court, he was executed at Carthage in the year 376, the second of Gratian’s reign, as we have related above. Victor tells us, that the name of the emperor Theodosius’s father was Honorius; but he is therein contradicted by Ammianus Marcellinus, and all the other writers. Both the emperor and his father, in most ancient coins bear the prænomen of Flavius, which, after Constantine’s time, became common to those who had none of their own: whence some authors conclude, and perhaps not improbably, that the family of Theodosius made no great figure before that prince’s reign; and that Claudian and Victor only flattered him in deriving his pedigree from Trajan. Pacatus observes, that he was a native of Spain, as well as Trajan and Adrian; but takes not the least notice of

of his being of the same family, which we can scarce believe he would have omitted, had Theodosius been allied to those two great princes. He had, according to Victor, only one brother and a sister, whose children he brought up with the same care as he did his own. St. Ambrose and Symmachus suppose him to have had several brothers. One of his brothers, by name Honorius, had by his wife Maria, whom Claudian styles one of the most illustrious women Spain ever produced, two daughters, Thermantia and Serena, of whom the latter was married to the famous Stilicho, and the former to another general, whose name is not mentioned. Eucherius, whom we shall see consul in 381, is supposed to have been another of the emperor’s brothers. The emperor himself was born in the year 346, so that he was advanced to the empire in the thirty-third year of his age. We are told that he was called Theodosius, not only because his father had been so named, but because both his parents were commanded in a dream to give him that name, signifying according to the import of the Greek word Theodosius, that the child was in a particular manner the gift of God. He served under his father in Britain, when he was yet very young; and being soon after created duke of Maecia, he gained a memorable victory over the Samaritans in 374, being then only eighteen years old. After the death of his father he withdrew to Spain, to avoid the storm which threatened him too; and there led a retired life, employing his time partly in reading, and partly in works of agriculture, till he was recalled by Gratian in 373, and declared emperor. He was then married to Flaccilla, called by most of the Greek writers Phacilla, and by some Placidia. She is thought to have been the daughter of Antonius, who, after having been prefect of Italy and Gaul in 376, and the two following years, was raised to the consulship in 382. She was a native of Spain, and sister to the mother of Nebridius, who married Salvina, the daughter of Gildo a Moorish prince, and count of Africa. Nebridius, was proconsul of Asia in 396, but died soon after; for Salvina was a widow, when St. Jerome, who had lived in great intimacy timacy with the father of Nebridius, wrote to her in 400. Theodosius had at least three children by Flaccilla, viz. Arcadius, born about the year 377, during his father's retirement; for he was thirty when he died on the first of May 408. Honorius, born in 384, and a daughter, named Pulcheria, born before the year 379, since Theodosius had then according to Claudian 1 several children. To these some add, and among the rest St. Ambrose 2, and Themistius 3, a third son, named Gratian. They do not tell us whether he was the son of Flaccilla, or Galla, the emperor's second wife, of whom hereafter; but Gregory of Nyssa writes in express terms, that the emperor had by Flaccilla only three children, viz. two sons and one daughter 4. Besides Gratian, who died before his father, the emperor had by Galla the celebrated Placidia, mother to Valentinian III. and another son; but the mother died in child-bed, and the child with her m.

The joy which the news of Theodosius's promotion gave to all the subjects of the empire, was equal to the mighty opinion they entertained of his justice, integrity, moderation, and abilities in war; and truly, tho' commendations in the mouth of a poet are of no great weight, yet we cannot help thinking with Claudian, that the empire, without the assistance of Theodosius, would never have recovered its former lustre, but rather become a prey to the barbarians n. But to return to Gratian, he seems to have continued some months at Sirmium, after the promotion of Theodosius 5; nay, Socrates, tho' in this place somewhat confused, tells us, that he gained considerable advantages over the barbarians, who surrounded him on all sides; and soon after set out for Gaul, upon intelligence, that the Germans were up in arms, and ready to break into that province 6. He was at Aquileia in the beginning of July, and in the latter end of the same month at Milan 7, where he contracted great intimacy with St. Ambrose, to whom he ever after shewed the highest respect and veneration, as appears from a letter he wrote to him with his own hand, which in our opinion deserves no less to be admired for the elegance of the style, than for the pious and truly Christian sentiments it contains. It was at his request that St. Ambrose wrote, tho' unwilling to engage in religious debates, his excellent treatise on faith, in which he proves the divinity of the Son, and another proving the divinity of the Holy Ghost. The pious emperor was so well pleased with these two pieces, that he immediately ordered a church to be delivered up to the catholics, which he had sequestrated at Milan in 380, with a design, as was thought, to give it to the Arians, out of compliance to his mother-in-law Justina. At the same time, revoking the law by which he had granted, the preceding year, liberty of conscience to all sects, he published another, forbidding all heretics, especially the rebaptizers, to preach their tenets, or to hold assemblies in any part of the empire. This law is dated from Milan the third of August of the present year 379, and was, no doubt, owing to the zeal of St. Ambrose. Gratian left Milan soon after; and passing thro' Rhetia, the province of the Sequani, and Germania Prima, repaired to Treves, where he was on the fourteenth of September, and perhaps before; for he is said to have marched with incredible expedition, and to have surprized the people of Gaul with his unexpected arrival. He passed the winter at Treves, and consequentially was in that city, when Ausonius, upon the expiring of his consulship, pronounced the oration, which has reached our times, thanking the emperor for that and the other honours he had conferred upon him. This year we find the Lombards, whom we shall see two hundred years hence masters of Italy, first mentioned in history. Prosper, who after having copied the chroniicle of St. Jerome to this time, begins now one of his own, tells us, that the Lombards, abandoning the most distant coasts of the ocean, and their native country Scandinavia, and seeking new settlements, as they were overstocked with people at home, attacked first, and overcame about this time the Vandals, a German nation. They were headed by two chiefs named I boreus and Aionus, who dying about ten years after, they created Agelmon, son to the latter, their first king, who reigned thirty-three years.

We are told, that the Lombards, and the Gepide, were for many years one and the same nation; and that they passed the Danube together about the year 400, in the reign of Honorius, who allowed them settlement about Sirmium and Singidunum. This is what Grotius writes upon the authority of Paulus Diaconus, who flourished in the ninth century. Grotius adds, that the Gepidæ, and consequently the Lombards, held the tenets of Arius, and that they were originally Vandals. Tho' we have said after Grotius, that Prosper is the first author who mentions the Lombards, yet we must own, that their name is to be met with in Ptolemy, Tacitus and Strabo. But to this Grotius answers, that by the name of Lombards in those authors are meant, not the people we are here speaking of, but other German nations, who from their long beards were called Longobarbi and Longobardi.

We left Theodosius at Sirmium, where he had been declared emperor on the nineteenth of January of this year 379. He was surrounded on all sides by numberless multitudes of barbarians, who, after the defeat and death of Valens, scoured the neighbouring countries without restraint, destroying all with fire and sword. Dacia, Thrace and Illyricum were already lost. The Goths, the Tajfali, the Alans and the Hunns, were masters of the greatest part of these provinces, and had ravaged and laid waste the rest: the Armenians, Iberians and Persians, were likewise up in arms, and ready to take advantage of the present distracted state of the empire. What evils, says Gregory Nazianzen, have we not seen or heard of? whole countries have been destroyed with fire and sword; many thousand persons of all ranks and ages have been inhumanly massacred; the rivers are still dyed with blood, and the ground covered with heaps of dead bodies. Let us not ascribe the calamities we suffer to the cowardice of our soldiers, who have conquered the world; our sins, and the Arian impiety, which has so long prevailed, are the only cause of our misfortunes. The few soldiers who had survived the late defeat, struck with terror and dismay, kept within the cities and strong-holds of Thrace, without daring so much as to look abroad, much less to make head against the victorious enemy, who moved about the country in great bodies. Gratian, in all likelihood, gave the new emperor some troops; 'tis at least certain, that he left with him two officers of great distinction, viz. count Ricomer,

The Roman History. Book III.

Ricomer, a Frank by nation, and Majorianus, who commanded the troops of Illyricum under Gratian, and was by Theodosius raised to the post of general both of the horse and foot. Both these officers distinguished themselves under Theodosius in a very eminent manner, and gained great advantages over the Goths. Theodosius, leaving Sirmium soon after the departure of Gratian, repaired to Thessalonica, the capital of East Illyricum, which Gratian had yielded to him, as we have observed above, and was still there on the seventeenth of June. During his stay in that metropolis, the chief cities of the east sent deputies to him, congratulating him upon his accession to the sovereign power, and craving his protection. At the head of the deputies from Constantinople was the celebrated orator Themistius, who, in a speech which he pronounced on that occasion, begged the emperor to confirm the privileges granted to that great metropolis by his ancestors. The emperor received them all in a most obliging manner, promising to redress, as far as in him lay, the evils of which they complained.

Having reinforced his army with new levies, and made other preparations for war, during his stay at Thessalonica, he took the field, probably about the end of June; for on the seventh of July he was at Scupi in Dardania, and on the tenth of August at a place called Vicus Augusti, the situation of which is unknown to geographers. Several battles were fought this year, of which we can scarce give any account; for our best guide, Ammianus Marcellinus, fails us here; and other authors are so obscure in their accounts, so inconsistent with each other, and often with themselves, that we can scarce depend upon any thing they relate. Idatius, Proserp, and Orofus, tell us, that many great battles were fought, and as many signal victories gained by Theodosius. On the other hand, Zosimus mentions but one battle, which he describes at length; but as he studies on all occasions to detract as much as he can from the glory of Theodosius, he ascribes the signal victory that was gained, not to him, but to one Modares, a prince of royal extraction among the Goths, who had lately taken party with the Romans. Zosimus, prompted by his blind zeal for the worship worship of the idols, omits no opportunity of vomiting his venom against a prince who completed, as we shall see, the ruin of idolatry, which other princes had suffered out of policy, or had not been able utterly to extirpate. We ought to be very cautious in giving credit to what that writer relates to the prejudice of a prince, against whom he betrays on all occasions an inveterate hatred, and unsurmountable prejudice. As to Modares, by whose conduct Thrace was delivered, according to that writer, from ruin and destruction, he was a man of great address, intrepidity and experience in war. St. Gregory Nazianzen wrote some letters to him, wherein he extols his piety, and recommends to him the peace and tranquillity of the church; whence we may conclude him to have been, not only a christian, but a catholic. Prosper tells us, that Theodosius not only overcame the Goths in several pitched battles, but forced them to repass the Danube, and by that means delivered Thrace from the insupportable yoke under which it groaned. Great numbers of them took part with the Romans, after having delivered up to the emperor some of the chief men among them as hostages. Thus Prosper, Zosimus, and Sozomen. However, it is no easy matter to determine, whither those retired who repassed the Danube, since their own country was possessed by the Huns, who had driven them out. The operations of this campaign are by some authors confusedly related, and only hinted at by others; and therefore we have not been able to give any distinct account of them. All we know for certain is, that part of the Goths submitted to Theodosius, and the rest withdrew from Thrace. In this, at least, all authors are unanimous. The emperor, having thus restored Thrace to its former tranquillity, returned in the latter end of the autumn to Thessalonica, and there took up his winter-quarters.

The following year 380, the two emperors were consul, Gratian the fifth time, and Theodosius the first. The former, after having passed the winter at Treves, from which place we find two laws dated the sixth and fifteenth of February, set out early in the spring for Italy, and was on the fourteenth of March at Aquileia and at Milan on the twenty-fourth of April. From Milan he advanced to Sirmium, and continued till the end of the summer, partly in the neighbourhood of that city, and partly in Pannonia. Theodosius dosius was seized in the month of February of this year with a dangerous malady; and this was what obliged Gratian to quit Gaul, and hasten into Illyricum, lest the neighbouring barbarians should lay hold of that opportunity to break into Thrace. As the Goths were still in arms, and threatened to pass the Danube, Gratian, during the malady of his colleague, propos'd, and concluded a treaty of peace with them, which, however advantageous to their nation, was confirmed by Theodosius upon his recovery. One of the articles of this treaty was, if Zosimus is to be credited, that the Goths, who served in the Roman armies, should be at liberty to quit the service when they pleased, provided they found others to substitute in their room. Gratian, by a law dated from Milan the twenty-fourth of April, exempts from the obligation of acting upon the stage such women as had embraced the christian religion, th'o' bound by their birth to follow that infamous profession. He renewed the same law the following year, adding this clause to it, that if such women behaved for the future more like players than christians, they should be condemned to serve the stage, and the remaining part of their lives, without remission. As for Theodosius, being seized in the beginning of this year with a dangerous malady, as we have hinted above, he demanded with great earnestness the sacrament of baptism; which he received with exemplary piety at the hands of Attalus bishop of Theßalonica, after having carefully informed himself of the faith that prelate professed. Finding him to be both orthodox in his belief, and blameless in his manners, the pious emperor immediately sent for him to court, was baptized by him, and from that instant, the violence of the malady abating, he began to recover. Soon after, the emperor gave a signal proof of his zeal for the orthodox faith, by the famous law dated from Theßalonica the twenty-eighth of February of the present year 380. In that law Theodosius declares, that he will have all his subjects, without exception, to adhere to the faith which the church of Rome had received of St. Peter, which was taught by Damasius bishop of that city, and by Peter bishop of Alexandria, a man of great sanctity; that is, that they must all acknowledge and confess the divinity of the Father, of the Son, and of

of the Holy Ghost; that those who held this doctrine, should be deemed christian catholics; but, on the contrary, such as rejected it, should be treated as heretics and infamous persons; their conventicles should not be called churches, and they themselves should undergo those punishments, which were due to their wickedness, from the imperial authority and divine justice, it being a crime and a sacrilege to depart from the true faith through contempt, nay, or out of ignorance. This is that memorable law, which was addressed to the people of Constantinople, and to the prefect Eutropius, with orders to send it into all the provinces, and cause it to be every-where observed by the subjects of the empire. To this law St. Austin, no doubt, alluded, when he wrote, that Theodosius, upon his accession to the empire, by a law full of mercy and justice, curbed the fury of the wicked, and relieved the church, long oppressed by the protection given by Valens to the Arians. Besides this, the emperor published several other laws this year, tending to the reformation of manners, viz. one dated the twenty-seventh of March forbidding all capital trials during the forty days preceding Easter; that is, during Lent; another of the eighteenth of December, prohibiting, under severe penalties, widows to marry during the time of mourning for their deceased husbands, which was by this law extended from ten months to a whole year: several laws against informers, who were to be punished with death, if they were found to have informed thrice, tho' their informations had always proved true. By a law dated the sixteenth of November, the emperor declares it unlawful for any one to beg the estate of such persons as were condemned for treason; adding, whereas the importunity of such petitioners often wrecks from the prince what he ought not to grant, his rescript in their favour shall be of no force; and such as shall by that means have obtained the confiscated estates, shall be punished as transgressors of the laws. These estates he will have the prince to grant merely of his own motion. Under other princes, the estates of persons condemned for treason were frequently granted to those who had accused them, which proved a great encouragement to informers; but this, and the other laws of Theodosius, put a stop to their vile practices. By former laws, the estates of such as had been banished, or executed, cuted, fell to the exchequer; but Theodosius, by two laws of this year, dated the seventeenth of June, orders the estates of the former to be divided between the exchequer and the criminal, or his children; and those of the latter to be left entire to their children or grand children. We are not told what induced the emperor to be more indulgent the children of those who were executed, than to the children of such as were only banished. In cases of treason, only one sixth of the criminal's estate was to be left to his children, whether he was banished or executed. The emperor published several other laws this year, which are so many instances of his good-nature, his application to business, and his care of the public welfare.

NOTWITHSTANDING the treaty which the Goths had concluded with Gratian, during the malady of Theodosius, that prince had no sooner left Illyricum, to return to Gaul, than they paffed the Danube, under the conduct of Fritigern, Alatheus, and Saphrax; and, breaking into Thrace and Pannonia, advanced as far as Macedon, destroying all with fire and sword. Zosimus writes, that they laid waste Theffaly and Epirus, and penetrated as far as Achaia, without meeting with the least opposition. Theodosius, having in the mean time drawn together his troops, took the field; and coming up with the enemy on the frontiers of Macedon, thought it advisable not to venture an engagement with forces so much superior to him in number; but to haras them, by cutting off their parties, and intercepting their convoys. The Goths, apprized of his design, attacked the Roman camp in the dead of the night, made themselves masters of it, cut most of Theodosius's men in pieces, and would have taken the emperor himself prisoner, had he not saved himself by a speedy flight, while the Goths were busied in plundering the tents. Thus Zosimus. But Idatius, Marcelinus, Gregory Nazianzen, who was then at Constantinople, and Philostorgius, an Arian writer, and consequently no-ways partial to Theodosius, assure us, that the emperor gained a complete victory over the Goths; and that, upon his return to Constantinople, which happened according to some, on the seventeenth, according to others, on the twenty-fourth, of November, entered that metropolis in triumph.

umph. Jornandes, who omits no opportunity of setting forth the exploits of his Goths, takes no notice of their pretended victory over Theodorus. Besides, Gregory Nazianzen describes his triumphal entry into Constantinople, of which he was an eye witness; and adds, that he well deserved that honour, for having checked the fury of the barbarians, who, confiding in their numbers and natural fierceness, had ventured to engage him. The emperor, soon after his arrival in that metropolis, appointed Gregory Nazianzen bishop of the place in the room of the Arian bishop Demophilus, who refused to subscribe to the doctrine of the council of Nice. The emperor in person conducted the new bishop to the great church, and put him in possession, both of that, and of all the other churches in the city, with their revenues, driving out the Arians, who had held them for the space of forty years. Thus was the orthodox faith re-established in the metropolis of the east, about the latter end of this year 380. The next consuls were Fl. Syagrius and Fl. Eucherius, uncle, as is supposed, to Theodosius. Gratian was this year, as appears from the dates of several laws, at Milan on the twenty-ninth of March; at Aquileia on the twenty-second of April and eighth of May; and at Treves on the fourteenth of October. He returned to Aquileia on the twenty-sixth of December, and seems to have passed the winter in that city. Valentinian had introduced the custom of setting yearly at liberty some criminals, on occasion of the festival of Easter. This custom Gratian confirmed by a law addressed to Anti dius, vicar of Rome; but excludes from such indulgence all criminals guilty of treason, parricide, murder, adultery, rapes, incest, magic, all false coiners, and such as had been condemned before. This law was read at Rome on the twenty-first of July of this year 381. As to the affairs in the east, Theodosius continued at Constantinople, at least to the nineteenth of July. During his stay in that metropolis, he published a law dated the tenth of January, forbidding heretics of all denominations to hold assemblies in cities, and commanding the churches throughout the empire to be immediately delivered up to the catholics. The execution of this memorable law was committed to Sapor, one of the greatest generals of his time, who was sent into the several provinces.

provinces, with orders every-where to drive out the heretics, and put the catholic pastors in possession of the churches the sectaries had usurped. Sapor met no-where with the least difficulty in the execution of his commission, except at Antioch, where the catholicks were divided among themselves. Philostratus writes, that the Arians were not only driven from the churches, but from the city of Constantinople. This year Athenaric, the most powerful of all the Gothish princes, who had maintained a three years war with Valens, as we have related above, being driven out by a faction at home, took refuge in the Roman territories, notwithstanding his pretended oath never to tread on Roman ground; and coming to Constantinople, was there received with great marks of friendship by Theodosius, who went out to meet him, and attended him, and his numerous retinue, into the city on the eleventh of January of the present year. But Athenaric died soon after, viz. on the twenty-fifth of the same month; and Theodosius caused him to be buried after the Roman manner, with such pomp and solemnity, that the Goths, who had attended him in his flight, astonished at the magnificence of the funeral, returned home, resolved never to molest the Romans; nay, out of gratitude to the emperor, who had thus honoured the memory of their deceased prince, they took upon them to guard the banks of the Danube, and prevented the Romans from being attacked on that side. Orosius writes, that the emperor's generous behaviour to Athenaric made such a deep impression on all the Gothish nations, that, charmed with his virtue and singular good-nature, they renounced all farther thoughts of war, and submitted to the laws of the empire. The same thing is confirmed by Idatius and Marcellinus; but this did not happen till the third of October of the following year, as we shall relate anon. A few days after the arrival of Athenaric at Constantinople, and before his death, the philosopher Themistius pronounced his fifteenth oration in the palace before the emperor, in which he observes, among other things, that Theodosius, who was then in the third year of his reign, had granted innumerable favours, but had not yet condemned one person to death. The pious emperor, no less desertious to heal the divisions that rent the church, than to redress dress the abuses which prevailed in the state, summoned this year, in the month of May, the second general of eccumenical council, which was held at Constantinople by all the bishops of his dominions. While the council was assembling, the emperor published a law dated the second of May, deprivingsuch as had renounced the Christian religion to embrace paganism, of the right of disposing of any thing by will. By a law dated the eighth of the same month, he extends that penalty to the Manichees, whose estates he declares confiscated, unless their children should embrace the true religion; in which case they were to enjoy the inheritance of their parents. In a council held before the emperor on the twenty-ninth of June, Theodosius declared, that the respect due to the priesthood not suffering bishops to be summoned to the public courts as witnesses, they were by the laws exempted from the obligation of appearing there. By another law dated the nineteenth of July, he forbids the Eunomians and Arians to build churches, either in the cities, or in the country, and declares the places where they shall have preached, or performed any other function, confiscated. All these laws are dated from Constantinople; but two others, of the twenty-first of July, from Heraclea in Thrace, whether the emperor had advanced against such of the barbarians as were still in arms. Zosimus tells us, that having demanded assistance of Gratian, that prince sent him a considerable body of troops commanded by Baudo, or Bauto, and Arbogastes, who were both Franks, but experienced officers, and greatly attached to the empire. The former was father to Eudoxia the wife of Arcadius, and maintained a correspondence by letters with Symmachus. Of the latter we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. Upon the arrival of these two renowned commanders, the Goths, who were ravaging Macedonia and Thessaly retired with great precipitation into Thrace; but not being able to subsist in that province, which they themselves had laid waste the preceding year, they were forced to sue for peace, and submit to Theodosius. Thus Zosimus, detracting, according to his custom, as much as he can, from the glory of Theodosius. However, he owns, that the emperor gained a complete victory over the Scyri and Carpodace, who had, jointly with the Hunns, broken broken into the empire, and that he obliged them to repay the Danube. We find the Scyri frequently mentioned amongst the northern barbarians; but of the Carpodacae no farther notice is taken in history. This campaign ended, it seems, in September; for, on the fifth of that month, the emperor was at Adrianople, and on the twenty-eighth at Constantinople, where he continued the remaining part of the year.

The following year 382, when Antonius, called also by some Antoninus, and supposed to have been father-in-law to Theodosius, was consul with Syagrius, the neighbouring barbarians broke into Italy; but were soon driven back by Gratian, who passed the greatest part of this year at Milan, or in that neighbourhood, watching their motions. From some laws published in the month of September of this year, it appears, that the emperor was forced to raise new levies, and demand extraordinary subsidies, for the defence of Raetia and Illyricum. A law dated the fifteenth of December informs us, that perfons of fortune were obliged to supply the army with horses. As Rome was infested by multitudes of beggars, Gratian by a law dated the twentieth of June, orders Severus, prefect of the city, to seize such of them as were capable of earning their livelihood by working, and to bestow them upon those who shall have informed against them, either as slaves if they were such by condition, or to be employed the remaining part of their lives, if they were free-born, in tilling their grounds, and in other works of agriculture. By another law dated the eighteenth of August, he suspends, for the space of thirty days, the execution of all criminals, reckoning from the day they received sentence. By another law, he ordered the altar of Victory, which stood in the place where the Roman senfr assembled, to be removed, and declared the revenues belonging to it confiscated. This altar had been removed by Constantius, when he came to Rome in 357, but re-established by Julian in 361, and suffered to continue there by Valentinian, who allowed to all his subjects the free exercise of what religion they liked best. At the same time, Gratian declared void and null all the privileges and exemptions granted by other emperors to the pagan pontiffs, or to the vestal virgins, ordering the officers of

of the revenue to seize on the lands, which, for the future, should be bequeathed to them or their temples. The pagan senators sent deputies, at the head of whom was Symmachus, to try whether they could prevail upon the emperor to revoke these laws; but Gratian would not so much as admit them to his presence. The heretics met with no less severe treatment in the east from Theodosius, than the pagans in the west from Gratian; for by a law dated the last of March, he declared such of the Manichees, as were then known by the names of Encratitae, Saccosori, and Hydropara斯塔e, that is, the continent, the sack-bearers, the water-drinkers, guilty of death, encouraging all to inform against them, and likewise against such as, in the celebration of Easter, differed as to the day from other christians; these he likewise pronounced guilty of death. All the laws enacted this year by Theodosius are dated from Constantinople; which gives us room to believe, that he continued in that city without taking the field, the Goths having, by their deputies, offered to submit to him, as we have related above. As they had been driven out of Macedon, and shut up in Thrace, where they could not subsist, Theodosius, not caring to drive them to despair, received their deputies in a very obliging manner; and as they could not return to their own country, which was held by the Hunns, upon their laying down their arms, he gave them leave to settle in Thrace and Moesia, which two provinces were almost quite depopulated by the frequent incursions of the neighbouring barbarians, and the late wars. The emperor exempted them from all the tributes and taxes that were paid by the other subjects of the empire. This was in all likelihood one of the articles on which they submitted. Great numbers of them entered into the Roman service; but formed a separate body, and were commanded by officers of their own nation, which proved the source of many evils; but as they were well acquainted with the avarice, injustice, and cruelty of the Roman officers, they refused to put themselves into their power, and insisted upon their continuing united, in order to secure themselves against such insults as they had reason to apprehend, when dispersed among the Roman troops. Zosimus does not forget to blame the conduct of Theodosius, and his want of foresight, in this particular; but Themistius, in a speech which he pronounced nounced before the emperor himself, tells him, that he gained by his indulgence and good-nature the barbarians, whom he was not perhaps in a condition to conquer by force of arms. The Goths therefore were not yet so far weakened, as to submit to what terms the emperor thought fit to impose upon them.

The next consuls were Fl. Merobaudes the second time, and Flavius Saturninus. Gratian was, from the twenty-ninth of January of this year 383, to the second of May, at Milan; at Padua on the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth of the same month; and at Verona on the seventeenth of June. He published several excellent laws this year, and among the rest one dated the nineteenth of January, revoking all the privileges and exemptions granted to particular persons, to the prejudice of the body to which they belonged; another dated the twenty-seventh of February, inflicting severe penalties on such as should conceal defectors or robbers; a third, condemning informers to such punishments as were due to the crimes of which they accused others, when they could not make good the charge; a fourth, forbidding any deference to be paid to such orders as tribunes, secretaries, counts, or any other persons, however dignified and distinguished, should pretend to have received from the emperor by word of mouth: the former of these two laws is dated the twenty-seventh of May, and the latter the seventeenth of June. By a law dated the twenty-second of May, he declares those incapable of disposing of their estates by will, who shall renounce the Christian religion to embrace paganism, Judaism, or the execrable tenets of the Manichees. Those by whom they shall have been seduced, are subjected to the same penalty. This year is remarkable for a dreadful famine, that raged in Rome, but more on account of the disturbances that were raised in the state by Maximus, and put an end to the life and reign of the excellent emperor Gratian. That usurer, named Magnus Clemens Maximus, was by birth a Briton, as a learned modern writer pretends to gather from Socrates; but, in our opinion, that author speaks of the place where he began to reign, and not of the place place of his nativity, as does likewise Gildas. Pacatus, who flourished in those times, affirms, that he was a stranger in Britain, and had been banished into this island. Zosimus writes, that he was a native of Spain, which is not improbable, since it is certain, that he pretended to be allied to Theodosius. He was brought up, says Pacatus, in the family of Theodosius as a servant, and employed in the meanest offices. Zosimus pretends, that he served in Britain with Theodosius, who, as we have observed above, attended his father into this island in the year 368. Be that as it will, seeing Theodosius raised to the empire, says Zosimus, while he could not attain to any creditable employment, prompted by jealousy and envy, he began to foment the avarice of the Roman soldiers to Gratian, whom they looked upon as too great an encourager of foreigners; insomuch that in the end they revolted, declared Maximus emperor, and, with the usual solemnity, gave him the purple and diadem. He gave out, that he was allied to Theodosius, and that it was with his participation and consent he had taken upon him the sovereignty. Thus Zosimus. But Sulpicius Severus, and Orosius, tell us, that the soldiers mutinying, forced him to accept the purple. The authority of these two authors, of whom the former flourished at that very time, and the other soon after, is of great weight with us. Orosius styles him a man of courage, and worthy of the empire, had he attained it by lawful means; and Sulpicius speaks of him as one, who, abating this usurpation, deserved in every other respect to be esteemed and commended. Gregory of Tours writes, that, before his usurpation, he had gained several signal victories in Britain; and some modern authors, that he drove the Scots quite out of the island. But neither is consistent with what we have related above out of Zosimus. Maximus at first was supported only by a small number of the inhabitants of this island; but others flocking to him from all parts of Britain, he found himself in a very short time at the head of a numerous army, which, without loss of time, he transported into Gaul; and landing at the mouth of the Rhine, he prevailed over into Gaul.

vailed upon the neighbouring provinces to revolt from Gratian, and join him, not so much by force of arms, as by art and address, extending, says Gildas, by lies and perjuries the empire which he had acquired by wickedness and rebellion. Gratian was then making war upon the Germans, called Juthungi; but he no sooner heard of the arrival of the usurper in Gaul, than he hastened to Treves, to put a stop to his farther progress. On his march, great numbers of his troops, gained over by the emissaries of Maximus, abandoned him, to take part with the usurper. However, thinking himself still a match for Maximus, he left Treves, went in quest of his enemy, and offered him battle. Baronius writes, that Gratian, finding himself abandoned by his own troops, had called the Hunns and Alans to his assistance, and that his army consisted chiefly of those barbarians. The learned Ufher was once of the same opinion; but afterwards retracted it. St. Ambrose, on whose authority it was grounded, speaking in the letter quoted by Baronius, not of Gratian, but of Valentinian II. Gratian’s army was commanded by Merobaudes, and count Balio, an officer of known valour and fidelity. Some authors write, that a battle was fought near Paris. But Zosimus tells us, that the two armies continued for five days together in the presence of each other, without any action, except a few skirmishes, in which no great advantage was gained on either side; but that in the end the troops of Gratian, provoked at his shewing so much favour, and giving the preference, to foreigners, as if he chiefly relied on their courage and fidelity, shamefully deserted him, and went over to Maximus. Gratian, seeing himself thus betrayed and abandoned, fled towards the Alps, attended only by three hundred horsemen; and having got into Lions, after he had been refused admittance into other cities, he was there taken prisoner, and soon after put to death. That he was put to death at Lyons, all authors agree, except Zosimus, who mistook, as is supposed, Singidunum in Mecia for Lugdunum in Gaul. Socrates and Sozomen relate his death with several circumstances unknown to other writers; for they tell us, that Andragathius, who was general of the horse under Maximus, and sent by him to pursue Gratian, coming up with the fugitive prince as he was crossing the Rhone, put himself into a close litter, and ordered his men to give out, that in the litter was the empress Læta, whom Gratian had lately married, going to her husband. The emperor, giving credit to this report, and impatient to see one whom he so tenderly loved, turned back to meet her; but while he was standing with open arms ready to receive her, Andragathius, starting out of the litter, seized him, and soon after put him to death. This account cannot be reconciled with what we read in St. Ambrose, a contemporary writer, viz. that Gratian was betrayed by a perfon whom he had trusted with entire provinces: that being by the traitor invited to a banquet, he refused at first to comply with the invitation, suspecting some treachery; but being in the end deceived by false oaths, and seigned protestations, he came to the banquet, but was murdered, as he withdrew by those who had feasted with him. These circumstances are not mentioned by historians; only Orofius and Marcellinus write, that he was surprized by the artifice of Maximus, and soon after put to death. Thus died Gratian in the flower of his age, having lived only twenty-four years, and three or four months, and reigned, from the time he had been created emperor, sixteen years, and one day, but from the death of his father, only seven years, and nine months. He married in 374 or 375 Constantin, the posthumous daughter of the emperor Constantius, and had by her a son, and other children; but they all died, it seems, before him, as did likewise his wife Constantia, whose body was brought this very year to Constantinople, according to Idatus and the chronicle of Alexandria, on the thirty-first of August, and interred on the second of December. Gratian not long before his death married to his second wife Læta, to whom, as well as to her mother, by name Pifamine, Theodofius allowed a yearly pension, to support them according to their rank, which they employed in relieving the poor of Rome, while that city was besieged by Alaric in the year 408. The death of Gratian was no sooner known at Milan, than St. Ambrose, who had lived in great intimacy with him, and was, as appears from his works, deeply affected with the loss of such an excellent and imitable prince, as he styles him, set out in great haste from that city to demand his body of Maximus in the name of Valentinian. But the usurer refused it to him, pretending, that the transporting of his ashes would serve only to renew the grief of the soldiery k. However, they were afterwards brought to Milan, and interred there near the tomb of Va-len tinian II. As for his character, all writers, whether christians or pagans, agree, that he was endowed with every good quality that can be desired in a prince, extolling with one voice his modesty, his justice, his moderation, and desire of doing good to all, in which he seemed to place his chief happiness. Ammianus Marcellinus, tho' a zealous pagan, writes, that he would have equalled the greatest princes of antiquity, had he lived longer; but at the same time blames him, as being too much addicted to hunting, and other diversions l, which may be justly imputed to his youth, and for which he would, in all likelihood, have made ample amends by applying seriously to business in his riper years.

St. Ambrose, Theodoret, Rufinus, Ausonius, and even Zo-симus himself, give us a great idea of his piety, in which he surpassed all the princes who had reigned before him, Con-fantine himself not excepted. St. Ambrose, in his answer to a letter the emperor had written to him, gives him the title of most christian m. The many laws he enacted in favour of the catholics, are so many instances of his zeal for the orthodox faith. Tho' none of the christian princes his predecessors had scrupled to assume the habit of the high pon-tiff of the pagans, yet when it was, according to custom, brought to him, he rejected it, saying, that it was not consistent with the principles of the christian religion to wear that habit. Thus Zosimus n; but it will be no easy task to prove, that either Constantine after his conversion, or any other christian prince, ever assumed the habit or title of Pontifex Maximus, though the latter was commonly given to them by the pagans, and even to Gratian himself o.
The pagan priests, adds Zosimus, finding the emperor would not accept either of the habit or title of high-pontiff, the chief man among them uttered these memorable words; If the prince will not be styled pontifex maximus, Maximus will soon become pontifex, foretelling, that Maximus would be raised to the empire. But this pretended prediction, or, as we may call it, pun, was, without all doubt, invented after the revolt of Maximus. However that be, Maximus was no sooner informed of the death of Gratian, than he took his son Flavius Victor for his colleague in the power he had usurped, and gave him, though then only an infant, the title of Augustus, as we read in Victor the historian; which is confirmed by some antient inscriptions, tho' Zosimus gives him only the title of Caesar. The usurper fixed the seat of his empire at Treves, and extended his wings, to use the expression of Gildas, over Spain and Britain, being master, according to Zosimus, of all the countries, which Gratian, in the division of the western provinces, had reserved for his own share. We do not find, that he put any of Gratian's favourites to death, except Merobaudes, the consul of this year, and Balio, or, as some style him, Vallio, one of the best officers of his age; their only crime was their inviolable attachment to Gratian, by whom they had been raised for their eminent services to the greatest offices in the state. Merobaudes received orders from the tyrant to dispatch himself, which he did accordingly, to avoid a more ignominious death. Pacatus writes, that Balio was strangled in his own house by the Britons, who served under Maximus; but from St. Ambrose it appears, that the usurper had commanded him to be conveyed to Challon on the Saone, to be there burnt alive; but that he, by a violent death, prevented the execution of so cruel a sentence. Prosper, in his chronicle, writes, that Gratian was betrayed by Merobaudes; but is therein contradicted by all other writers, and the death of that brave officer sufficiently clears him from so black an aspersion: whence in the chronicle of Prosper, some, instead of Merobaudes, read Mellobaudes; for Mellobaudes, king of the Franks, served under Gratian in quality of comes domesticorum; and treachery was in those days the peculiar character of that nation. Maximus commanded count Narces likewise, and Leucadius, governor of a province, to be put to death for their attachment to Gratian; but was prevailed upon by the famous St. Martin to spare them.

them. Paulinus Diaconus, in his life of St. Ambrose, tells us, that that prelate was sent into Gaul to propose an accommodation between Maximus and young Valentinian; on which occasion he treated the usurper as one cut off from the communion of the church, exhorting him to atone by a sincere repentance for the enormous crime he had committed in imbruing his hands in the blood of an innocent prince, his lawful sovereign: the same author adds, that other bishops, more complacent, flocking from all parts to the tyrant’s court, by their low and shameful flatteries, lulled him asleep in his wickedness. As Maximus had brought over with him into Gaul the flower of the British youth, and the Roman soldiers quartered in the island, the country remained by that means exposed to the incursions of the Scots and Picts, who meeting with little or no opposition, over-ran the northern parts, committing everywhere dreadful ravages. The Romans now-and-then sent over troops to drive them back into their own country; but they constantly returned, and continued thus harassing the Roman provinces till the arrival of the Angles and Saxons, who made themselves masters of that part of the island which is now known by the name of England, about the middle of the fifth century. Those Britons, who attended Maximus into Gaul, never returned to their native country; but are supposed to have settled in Armorica, which was allotted to them by Maximus, and from its new inhabitants called Britain, now Bretagne. Colonies are said to have been sent from this island into Bretagne at three different times, viz. in the reign of Constantius Chlorus, the father of Constantine the Great, during the usurpation of Maximus, and when the Angles made themselves masters of this island. The ancients mention the latter, but take no notice of the other two colonies; which gives us room to question the truth of what the moderns have written on that head. Constantius, who in the end of the fifth century wrote the life of St. Germain of Auxerre, calls Bretagne, Armorica; but Sidonius of Clermont, who flourished about the same time, speaks of Britons inhabiting the country that borders on the Loire; nay, amongst his letters we find one to Rhiotam their king. That the Britons, tons, who went over with Maximus, settled in Armorica among the natives of the country, is not affirmed by any antient historian, but may be looked upon as a conjecture not altogether improbable; but that they, driving out the antient proprietors, made themselves absolute masters of the country under the conduct of their leader Conon Meriodoc; and wanting women, had recourse to Dionutus, or Diodochus, king of Cornwall, who sent them his own daughter, by name Urfula, with eleven thousand young women of quality, and sixty thousand of an inferior rank, is now deemed an arrantable, even by the Roman-catholic writers. Had the Britons wanted women, they would, without all doubt, have kept those of the country, when they drove out the men. Besides, it is altogether improbable, that Cornwall was so formed with women as to spare seventy-one thousand virgins. The fleet, fraught with these unhappy virgins, is supposed to have been driven by a storm to the mouth of the Rhine, and to have failed up that river to Cologn, where they fell into the hands of the barbarians, who fought for Gratian against Maximus, and were by them either put to death, or carried into captivity. Urfula is still revered in the church of Rome as a saint; but the number of eleven thousand virgins, said to have suffered martyrdom with her, has been not many years since left out of the Roman breviary. Of Aufonius, who was preceptor to Gratian, we shall speak in note (L).

But (L) Decius, or rather Decimus Magnus Aufonius, was a native of Bourdeaux. He tells us, that he was descended of a noble family (15); however, his father, who was a native of Bazas, and lived at Bourdeaux, followed the profession of physic, till his son procured him the rank and title of honorary prefect of Illyricum. He practised gratis, and was generally esteemed a man of learning; but, what may seem strange, was better acquainted with the Greek than the Latin tongue. He died in 377, at the age of eighty eight or ninety (16). Crecilius Argicius Arborius, uncle to Aufonius by the mother, was born in Autun, and descended of an illustrious family; but his father and uncle being proscribed in the reign of Gallienus and Aurelian, he was obliged to abandon his country, and retire to Bayonne, where he married Æmilia Corinthia Maura, descended of a good family, and had by her one son, named Æmilius Magnus Arborius, and three daughters, Hiluria, Dryadina and Æonia: Arbo-

But to resume the thread of the history. Theodosius, who had never stirred this year from Constantinople, or the neighbourhood rion was a celebrated professor of eloquence; Hilaria confessed celibacy, and became famous for her virtue; Dryadia was betrothed, but died a little before the celebrations of her nuptials; Æonía was mother to Aufonius. Julia Cataphronia, the sister of Julius Aufonius, our author's father, embraced the state of virginity, and lived to a great age (17). As for Aufonius himself, he studied rhetoric under his uncle Arborius at Tolouse, where Arborius taught about the year 325, before he was invited to Constantinople by Constantine: he studied likewise at Bourdeaux under Minervius, Nepotianus, and Staphylus, professors of grammar and rhetoric (18). When he had ended his studies, he first pleaded at the bar, and afterwards taught grammar and rhetoric; which profession he followed for the space of near thirty years, till he was by Valentinian I. appointed preceptor to his son Gratian in 367, whom he attended into Germany the following year 368 (19). He had soon after some employment at court with the title of comes or count, and was by degrees raised to the first offices in the state. Valentinian made him questor, and had even promised him the consulship (20). After the death of Valentinian, Gratian raised him to the high station of praefectus praetorio, first of Italy and Africa, and afterwards of Gaul. He was prefec of Gaul, and likewise consul, in 379 (21). He was, it seems, at Treves when Gratian was killed (22); but soon after retired to Guienne (23). In a letter to Paulinus about the year 392, he describes the place where he then led a retired life (24), which is supposed to have been in Saintonge. He professed, without all doubt, the christian religion; but his writings are, even in the opinion of Scaliger, altogether unworthy of the christian name, being filled with pagan expressions, and the most bare-faced obscenities, in which he surpasses the most infamous among the pagan poets. As for his style, it is commended by some, and found fault with by others. The reader will find the different opinions of critics concerning his writings in Baillet (25). His works, which give some light to neighbourhood of that metropolis, was no sooner informed of the death of Gratian, than he drew together all his forces, with to history, are the epigrams he wrote on the professors of Bourdeaux, his verses on the chief cities of the empire, and the speech in which he returned thanks to Gratian for the honour he had done to him in raising him to the conf核ship. He wrote verses on all the emperors who had reigned till his time, and likewise confular tables, extending to the year 382 or 383 (26). But the latter work has been long since entirely lost, and of the former only a small part has reached us. His poem on the Mofelle was greatly esteemed by Symmachus (27), and is still looked upon by the best judges as his master-piece (28). Some ascribe to him, but without sufficient ground, the difficulties that pass under the name of Cato (29). The emperor Theodofius, who had a particular esteem for him, wrote to him with his own hand, demanding his works (30). Aufonius and Symmachus lived in great great intimacy, as appears from their letters to each other (31). Gratian, out of gratitude to his preceptor, not only preferred him to the greatest employments of the state, but likewise raised most of his relations. His father was by him honoured, as we have hinted above with the title of prefect of Illyricum before the year 379, for in that year he died, being then in the eighty-eighth or ninetyth year of his age (32). Sanctus, who married his wife’s sister, was made governor of Britain (33). Paulinus, son-in-law to his sister Dryadia, was raised to the government of the province of Tarraca in Spain, and the husband of his other niece by the fame Dryadia to great employments (34). Arborius, prefect of Rome in 380, is supposed to have been his nephew by the fame sister (35). Aufonius married Attusia Lucana Sabina, the daughter of Attusius Lucanus Talius, one of the chief citizens of Bourdeaux, and had by her two sons, viz. Aufonius and Hesperus, and one daughter, whose name is not mentioned in history. Aufonius died in his infancy; but Hesperus was prefect in Africa in 376, of Italy in 378, and the same year prefect of Gaul with his father. The daughter of Aufonius was married first to Vallatinus Euromius, who died when he was yet very young, tho’ he had been already governor of a province in Illyricum, and afterwards to Thalaflus, who was proconsul of Africa in 378. She had one son by Euromus or Euromius, and several children by Thalaflus, of whom the eldest was with the design to march against the usurper, and prevent him from seizing on Italy and West-Illyricum, belonging to young Valentinian. But in the mean time, Maximus having assured him by his deputies, that he had no design upon the dominions of Valentinian, but that he would suffer him peaceably to reign in Italy, Africa, and Illyricum, Theodosius thought it advisable to put off his journey into the west. Not long after, Maximus sent his great chamberlain to Theodosius, not to make an apology, says Zosimus, for the murder of Gratian, but to propose an alliance with the emperor against the common enemies of the empire; and in case he rejected that friendly offer, to denounce war against him. Theodosius not thinking the glory that might accrue to him from revenging the death of Gratian a sufficient motive for entering into a war, which he foresaw would be attended with great evils, and perhaps with the ruin of the empire, the neighbouring barbarians being ready to invade it on all sides, hearkened to the proposals of Maximus; and acknowledging him in the end for his colleague, sent Cynegius, then comes was named Auseonius (35). Symmachus mentions a son of Thalaffus, to whom the senate had at his request granted some favours (37). Auseonius had taken care to instruct his daughter in the liberal sciences (38). His wife Sabina died in the twenty eighth year of her age (39); and Auseonius composed her epitaph thirty-six years after (40). He wrote his consular tables, and some other historical pieces, for the use and instruction of his son Hesperus, whom he commends as a young man of extraordinary parts, and naturally more grave and composed than himself (41). Hesperus married the daughter of Severus Cenfor Julianus, and Pomponia Urbica, who was descended of an illustrious family, and had by her at least three children, of whom the youngest, named Paflor, died when he was but a youth: of Paulinus, his eldest son, furred the penitent, we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. From the poem he wrote on his repentance, and styled Eucharisticon, it appears, that his father was first vicar of Macedon, where Paulinus was born in 376, and afterwards procounsel of Africa, which employment he held for the space of twenty-eight months (42).

comes largitionum, and afterwards prefect of the east, into Egypt, with orders to proclaim Maximus there, and to cause his image to be set up in Alexandria. Zosimus in this place writes, that Theodotius only pretended to be reconciled with Maximus, to divert him from surprizing young Valentinian, who was not in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy; and elsewhere blames him for observing the treaty he concluded with the usurper, when he ought both in policy and honour to have made war upon him. Pacatus tells us, that when Maximus revolted, Theodotius was engaged in a war on the most distant confines of the east, perhaps with the Saracens; for he is said by Marcellinus to have overcome them about the beginning of his reign; and Libanius writes, that the news of the victory gained this year by Richomer was received with great joy by the inhabitants of Antioch. The Hunns, likewise called Euthalites or Nephalites, whose country bordered on Persia, as appears from Procopius, are said to have broken into Mesopotamia about this time, and to have even laid siege to Edessa, which obliged Theodotius to send part of his forces to the relief of that city. No wonder therefore, that the emperor at this juncture chose rather to receive Maximus for his partner in the empire, than, by rejecting his proposals, to kindle a war in the very bowels of the empire, which, in all likelihood, would have proved fatal to both parties. The wars we have mentioned were managed by his generals; for the emperor himself, as we have observed above, continued the whole year at Constantinople, or in that neighbourhood. In the very beginning of the present year 383, that is, on the sixteenth, or, as others will have it, on the nineteenth of January, he had declared his son Arcadius emperor. The ceremony was performed with extraordinary pomp at the palace of Hebdoman, distant seven miles from Constantinople. Arcadius was then about six years old; for at the time of his death, which happened on the first of May 408, he was, according to Socrates, in the thirty-first year of his age. As for Valentinian II. who possessed the western provinces of Illyricum, with Italy and Africa, while Maximus held Gaul, Spain, and Britain, he was at this time but twelve, or at most thirteen, thirteen, years old; and the great disturbances which his mother Juftina raised, by espousing with too much warmth the cause of the Arians, give us room to believe, that she reigned in her son's name. Under her Probus, who had been consul in 371, and prefect of Illyricum and Italy in 368, had the chief direction of affairs; but, in all matters of moment, the young prince had recourse to Theodosius; nay, Orofius looks upon Theodosius as sole emperor, after the death of Gratian, of the western as well as the eastern provinces.

The next consuls were Richomer and Clearchus. The former was of the royal blood of the Franks, had been comes domesticorum under Gratian, and was left by that prince with Theodosius, when created emperor. In a law of the year 391, he is styled general of the horse and foot. He was a pagan, but a man of great integrity, valour, and experience in war, as appears from the several letters which Symmachus wrote to him. He is by some called Ricimer, and by others Richimer, and Ricomer. Gregory of Tours speaks of one Richimer, the father of Theodorgir king of the Franks, whom some authors, whose opinion is not ill grounded, take to be the consul of this year 384. Clearchus, his colleague, had been proconsul of Asia in 264, and afterwards prefect of Constantinople, in which employment he was succeeded this year by the philosopher Themistius, who, on that occasion, made a short speech in commendation of Theodosius, who had raised him to that dignity. This year Proculus, count of the east, being accused of extortion, and several outrages committed by his orders at Daphne near Antioch, was ignominiously deposed, and obliged to abscond, till the rage of the multitude was appeased. Icarius, the son of Theodorus, who had conspired against Valens, was appointed count of the east in his room, which office he discharged with great rigor and severity, not sparing even the public magistrates, whom he put to the rack, in defiance of the laws, says Libanius, which had been but lately published; that is, of the laws dated the twenty-

Twenty-sixth of April 380, and thirty-first of July, 381. A famine in Syria.

This year a famine, attended as usual with a dreadful plague, raged in Antioch, and most other cities of Syria. The plague soon ceased; but the famine continuing, Libanius, in the name of the people of Antioch, had recourse to Icarius, entreaty him to relieve, by some means or other, the poor, who had flocked from all parts to that metropolis, and were daily perishing in great numbers with hunger. But Icarius, without being in the least affected with their calamity, returned no other answer, than that they were abhorred, and justly punished, by the gods. This occasioned great disturbances in Antioch, which, however, were appeased without bloodshed. The same year, Theodosius, resolving utterly to extirpate the idolatrous worship of the pagan gods, enacted several laws, forbidding all his subjects, on pain of death or perpetual banishment, to offer sacrifices to idols; to consult augurs, or diviners of what denomination soever; or to practice any of those ceremonies, which had been forbidden by his christian predecessors. Zosimus, in his usual style, better becoming a declamer than an orator, tells us, that Theodosius proclaimed war against the gods; that he attacked them in their temples; that he proceeded with such severity against those who worshipped them, that no one dared own he believed there were gods, or could with safety lift up his eyes to heaven, and adore the stars that shine there. Libanius writes, that on a certain occasion, standing in need of the assistance of the gods, he had recourse to their altars; but not daring to implore their protection, or shed a tear before their statues, he only bewailed within himself his unhappy condition. It was on occasion of the above-mentioned laws, that Libanius made his famous speech in defence of the temples, wherein he inveighs with great bitterness against the monks; blames the conduct of Constantine the Great; extols Julian; and ends his speech with threatening, that the country-people, who were more attached to the religion of their ancestors, than the inhabitants of the cities, will, if further provoked, take arms, and defend them by force. The attachment of the country-people, or inhabitants of villages, called by the Latins pagani, to their idols and temples, gave rise to the denomination of paganus or or pagan, which began about this time to be given to all who worshipped idols. Libanius, in that speech, often addresses himself to Theodosius as present; but nevertheless we cannot persuade ourselves, that he had the boldness to pronounce it before so religious and zealous a prince. It ought, in our opinion, to be looked upon only as a declamation, delivered not in the presence of the emperor, but perhaps of his own scholars, and other pagan auditors. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the pious emperor was so far from yielding to the arguments which the pagan sophist alluded in favour of his idols, that, on the contrary, having appointed Cyanegius this very year prefect of the east, he strictly enjoined him to shut up all the temples within his jurisdiction. Cyanegius executed his orders with such zeal and fidelity in the East, properly so called, that he was soon after sent by the emperor for the same purpose into Egypt, where, by breaking in pieces the idols, by prohibiting all manner of idolatrous worship, and by shutting up the temples, in such manner that no one could have access to them, he, in a short time, utterly abolished the very remains of idolatry in a country, which, for many ages, had been, above all others, addicted to superition. The zeal, which he exerted on this occasion for the true religion, procured him after his death, which happened in 388, the honour of being interred in the church of the Apostles at Constantinople, the burying-place of the emperors; whence his ashes were conveyed the ensuing year by his wife Acancia into Spain, probably the place of his nativity. He was comes largitionum from 381 to 383, when he was made prefect of the east, in which office he continued till his death; that is, to the year 388, in which he died, being then consul with the emperor Theodosius. Libanius himself, notwithstanding his zeal for idolatry, could not help commending him as a magistrate of an unblemished character; and Theodosius, in a law addressed to him in 385, says, that his justice and equity were known and applauded by all the world. It is surprising, that Baronius should confound the prefect Cyanegius with another of the same name, who, in 401, was sent by Arcadius to demolish the temple of Marnas, and other temples in the city of Gaza.

Gaza. This year the emperor published a law, forbidding the marriages of cousin-germans, which had been always deemed lawful among the Romans, and no one ever looked upon as incestuous. However, Theodosius not only prohibited such marriages, but, by the same law, commanded the contracting parties to be burnt alive, their estates to be confiscated, and their children to be deemed illegitimate. Arcadius softened the rigor of this law by another, dated the twenty-sixth of November 396, whereby he exempts the transgressors from the penalties inflicted on them by the law of Theodosius; but nevertheless declares such marriages unlawful and incestuous, and the children incapable of receiving the least legacy from their parents. In 405, he entirely revoked the law of his father, declaring the marriages of cousin-germans absolutely lawful. This revocation was not received in the west till the time of Justinian, who caused it to be put into his code; by which means it became general, and such marriages were celebrated without restraint or scruple in the west, as well as in the east. At the same time, and under the same penalties, Theodosius revived the antient law, forbidding the marrying of nieces, which he extended to the niece of a first wife. By another law of this year, dated the twenty-first of January, he ordered Cyanegius to make a diligent search after the Eunomian, Macedonian, Arian, and Apollinarian bishops and clergy in Constantinople, and to drive them all, without exception, out of the city. By a third he forbids the Jews to buy Christian slaves; and allows all Christians the liberty of setting free such slaves as they shall have purchased. Theodosius, as appears from the dates of his laws, paffed most part of this year at Constantinople, and there received a solemn embassy sent to him by the king of Persia, to solicit, or rather to buy, a peace with rich presents, and to excuse, says a pagan writer, by his submission, all the evils, which, till that time the Romans had suffered from the Persian nation. They had lost their great king Sapor II. who died about the year 379, after having lived and reigned seventy years. He was succeeded by Artaxerch, whom Eutychius supposes to have been his son, the Agathias and Abulfaragius call him his younger brother. But if Sapor himself was born after the decease of his father, as most authors write, he could not be succeeded by his younger brother. Artaxer, styled Ardashir by Abulfaragius and Eutychius, and Artaxerxes by Sca-liger and Petavius, reigned only four years, and was succe-deed in 383, by his son Sapor III. called by Theophanes, furnamed Kermafa, perhaps from some country called Ker-ma, conquered by his father. Varanes reigned eleven years, and maintained the whole time a good understanding with the Romans. The embassadors, of whom we have soken above, were sent, not by Sapor II. as Pacatus seems to suppose; but by Sapor III. who reigned in Persia this year 384, Orofius writes, that a treaty was concluded between the Persians and the Romans, in virtue of which the whole east still enjoyed a profound tranquillity at the time he was composing his history; that is, about the year 416. The articles of this treaty are not mentioned by any historian; but from a law of Theodosius, dated the fourteenth of June 387, and addressed to Gaddanes, satarpa or governor of Sophe, it appears, that the authority of the Roman emperors was acknowledged in that province, which, by most geographers, is placed in the south of Armenia, and is reckoned, by some historians, one of the five provinces which Jovian yielded to the Persians. While the Persian embassadors were still at Constantinople, a second son was born to the emperor in that city on the ninth of September. Theodosius gave him the name of Honorius, to honour in his son, says the poet Claudian, the memory of his brother, distinguished him with the title of nobilissimus, or most noble, and named him confus for the year 386.

The same year, the Sarmatians having made an irruption into the dominions of Valentinian, he dispatched one of his generals, not named in history, against them, who drove them back with great slaughter, and took many prisoners, who were all sent to Rome, to be either massacred in the shews of gladiators, or destroyed by the wild beasts. The emperor, in the letter which he wrote to the senate, acquainting them with the successes that had attended his arms,

bestowed the highest encomiums on the general who commanded on that occasion. As for Valentinian himself, he continued the whole year, as appears from his laws, in Italy; for, during the months of March and April, he was at Milan; at Aquileia in the month of September; and again at Milan in October, and the two remaining months of the year. By a law dated the twenty second of March, which was this year good-friday, he commanded all the prisoners, who were not charged with the enormous crimes mentioned in the law, to be set at liberty, in honour of the approaching great festival. This year died Vettius Agorius Prætexatus, a person greatly commended and extolled, as one of the most deserving men of his age, by Ammianus Marcellinus, who wrote his history about this time, by Zosimus, Symmachus, Libanius and in general all the pagan writers; for he was not only a pagan himself but augur, high-pontiff of Vesta and the sun, and the head, as we may style him, of the pagan superstition. He was by Julian made proconsul of Achaia in 362, by Valentinian I. prefect of Rome in 367, and afterwards prefect of Italy and Illyricum; in which employments he acquitted himself so as to be at the same time feared and beloved. Ammianus writes, that, from his youth, he excelled in every virtue becoming a man of his rank; that he revived the gravity and probity of the antient Romans. Zosimus calls him a man of an unblemished character, and proposes him as a pattern to be imitated by all governors of provinces, and other magistrates. Macrobius supposes the banquet of the learned men, which is the subject of his Saturnalia, to have been celebrated at the house of Prætextatus. Symmachus looked upon him as in every respect the best, or, at least, as one of the best men of his age. He tells us among other things, that he accepted no legacies, but constantly yielded to the children or relations of the testator, whatever was bequeathed to him; that he was no less affected with the misfortunes of others, than with his own; and that such as possessed estates adjoining to his, in the disputes which arose between him and them, concerning the limits of their lands, would admit of no other judge but himself; so great was the opinion they had of his integrity.

The many letters which Symmachus wrote to him, and after his death, to the emperors concerning him, are so many panegyrics, in which he extols his wisdom, his integrity, his modesty and moderation, his humanity and good-nature to all, not excepting even his most inveterate enemies. He came this year to Rome, and entered that metropolis in a kind of triumph, being attended by all the magistrates, by the nobility and the people, and repairing, amidst the loud acclamations of the multitude, to the capitol, pronounced there an elegant oration in praise of Valentinian. He was then consul elect; but before he entered upon that new office, he was snatched away by a natural, but sudden, death, to the inexpressible grief of the Roman people. The senate erected several statues to the honour of a person, who lived, to use the expression of Symmachus, even after his death, in the memory of all good men. St. Jerom, who was then at Rome, compares the death of Prætextatus, whom he styles a sacrilegious idolater, with that of the holy abbess Lea, who died a few days after him. Prætextatus was no friend to the christians; but used to say, by way of raillery, that he would readily embrace their religion, provided they would make him bishop of Rome. About this time, Symmachus was appointed prefect of Rome, in which employment he acquitted himself with great reputation, and procured a law from the emperor, moderating the expences of the new consuls, praetors and quaestors. The consuls used, agreeable to a custom which then obtained, to send rich presents to their friends, and to all persons of distinction; and the praetors and quaestors to expend immense sums in the public sports, which they were bound to exhibit. The value of the presents to be given by the consuls, and the sums to be laid out in the public shews by the two other magistrates, were fixed by this law, and those declared infamous, who should solicit an exemption from it. This year a famine being apprehended in Rome, by reason of the scarcity of corn, in Africa, which used of late years to supply that metropolis, Theodorus, at the request of Symmachus, delivered the Roman people from the danger that threatened them, by sending them great plenty of grain from Egypt and Macedonia.

don. For this seasonable supply Symmachus returned thanks, not only to Theodosius, but to count Ricomer, and likewise to Rufinus, who, it seems, made already some figure in the emperor's court*. The great power he afterwards acquired there, does no ways redound to the honour of Theodosius. The following year 385, when Arcadius and Bauto were consuls, St. Auguftin, then professor of rhetoric in Milan, pronounced on the first of January a panegyric on the two new consuls*. Bauto was by nation a Frank, and had been sent by Gratian in 381, to the assistance of Theodosius; but returning afterwards into the west, he served Valentinian II. with great fidelity. Valentinian passed the first six months of this year at Milan, and the rest either at Aquileia or Verona*. Tho' he enacted this year several excellent laws in favour of the church, yet he suffered his mother Justina to persecute and oppress the catholics, because they would not yield the great church at Milan to the Arians, whom he countenanced and protected#. Theodosius continued all this time at Constantinople, where a dangerous conspiracy was formed against him; but discovered a little before it was to be put in execution. Most of the conspirators were apprehended, tried, and sentenced to death; but Theodosius generously forgave them, and would not allow any enquiries to be made after their accomplices, tho' some persons, in whom he reposed great confidence, were suspected to be in that number#. Not long after died at Constantinople the emperor's daughter Pulcheria, who was soon followed by the empress Flaccilla her mother, to the great grief of Theodosius, who was no less a tender father than husband. The empress died at Scutuminum in Thrace, where she was drinking the waters for the recovery of her health, but her body was brought back to Constantinople, and interred there with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. Gregory of Nyssa, who was then at Constantinople, pronounced her funeral oration, as he had done some time before that of her daughter Pulcheria*. The fathers of the church who lived in that age, bestowed upon her the highest encomiums; and the pagan writers themselves cannot help extolling her piety, moderation, and other virtues.

The Greeks honour her as a saint, and celebrate her feast on the fourteenth of September, perhaps the day on which she died. The next consul was Honorius, styled in the fasti nobilissimus puer, and Evodius, perhaps the prefect of Gaul under Maximus. This year Theodosius continued at Constantinople till the third of September, when he is supposed to have left that metropolis, in order to march against the Greuthongi, who were ready to pass the Danube, and break into the empire, under the conduct of Odotheus, whom Claudian honours with the title of king. The barbarians were attacked, and utterly defeated by the two emperors Theodosius and Arcadius, who returned to Constantinople, leading with them an incredible number of captives, and entered that city in triumph on the twelfth of October. Thus Idatius in his fasti, and Marcellinus in his chronicle. Claudian likewise speaks of a victory gained this year by the two emperors over the Greuthongi. But Zosimus, to rob Theodosius of the glory of this, as he does of most other victories, ascribes it to Promotus, who commanded in Thrace, in quality of general of the foot. According to his account, Promotus sent to the enemy's camp some persons, who, pretending to be defectors, undertook to conduct the barbarians over the river, and to betray the Roman commander and his army into their hands. Odotheus, not suspecting any treachery, suffered himself to be conducted by them; but, in the mean time, Promotus, informed by his emissaries of the enemy's design, received them so briskly, while they expected to meet with no opposition, that great numbers of them were driven back into the Danube, and drowned, and the rest either taken prisoners, or cut in pieces. After this, Promotus attacked and made himself master of their camp, in which he found a great booty, and an incredible multitude of women and children, whom he immediately sent to Theodosius; but the emperor ordered them to be set at liberty, and having made them rich presents, gave them leave to return to their own country, hoping by that means to gain the good-will of the barbarians, says Zosimus, to entice them into his service, and to employ them in the war against Maximus, for which he was then making great preparations under-hand. All other writers suppose Theodosius to have commanded commanded his troops in person; nay, Claudian tells us, that he engaged Odotheus himself, who was killed in the battle. The emperor, soon after his return to Constantinople, married to his second wife Galla, sister to Valentinian II. and daughter to Valentinian I. by the empress Justina. He had by her a son called Gratian, who died before his father, and a daughter named Galla Placidia, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the reign of her brother Honorius, and her son Valentinian III. As for Valentinian, he was at Milan on the eighteenth of January; at Ticinum or Pavia on the fifteenth of February; at Aquileia on the twentieth of April; at Milan during the months of June and July; at Aquileia on the third of November; and again at Milan on the eighteenth of the same month, and on the third of December. Baronius produces a letter written this year by Valentinian to Salust prefect of Rome, enjoining him to rebuild the church of St. Paul in the neighbourhood of that city, and to enlarge it, by taking in, with the consent of the senate and people of Rome, part of the public road: he commands him to acquaint the senate, and the christian people, with the orders he had received, and to follow in every thing the directors of the venerable bishop of that city. Prudentius describes the church of St. Paul placed on the Oftian-way, or the way leading to Ostia, and tells us, that it was built by an emperor, which Baronius understands of the emperor who reigned in Prudentius's time, and thence concludes, that the above-mentioned church was finished by Honorius. That it was finished in the reign of Honorius, is certain, not from the words of Prudentius quoted by Baronius, but from an antient inscription, which informs us at the same time, that it was begun by Theodosius, perhaps when he came to Rome in 398, and imbellished by his daughter Placidia, in the time of Leo the Great, bishop of Rome. However, it is manifest from the code, that Valentinian issued orders this year 386, for the building of that church, tho' the work was not begun till the reign of Honorius. The next consuls where the emperor Valentinian the third time, and Eutropius, who had been proconsul of Asia, and afterwards prefect of the east. In the very beginning of this year 387, Theodosius published a law addressed by way of letter to all the cities of the east, enjoining the magistrates to honour the solemnity of Easter, by setting at liberty such as on the approach of that great festival they should find in their prisons, unless they had been confined for very enormous crimes. It was on this occasion that the emperor uttered those memorable words; I wish it were in my power to restore life to the dead. This year, Theodosius finding the exchequer quite drained, and being on the other hand obliged to celebrate, according to custom, the fifth year of the reign of his son Arcadius, to which he added, it seems, the solemnity of the tenth year of his own reign, tho' he was then only in his ninth, an extraordinary tax was laid on the people to defray that expense; for we are told, that on such occasions each soldier received five pieces of gold. Most cities submitted cheerfully to this burden; but the people of Antioch, complaining of it as an unreasonable oppression, crowded to the house of Flavianus their bishop, as soon as the edict was published, to implore his protection; but not finding him, they returned to the forum, and would have torn the governor of the city in pieces, had not the officers who attended him, with much ado, kept back the enraged multitude till he made his escape. Being thus prevented from venting their fury upon him, they fell upon the emperor's statues, broke some of them in pieces, and dragged others, with the statues of his two sons Arcadius and Honorius, of the late empress Flaccilla, and of his father Theodosius, through the chief streets of the city, uttering the whole time most injurious and abusive reflections against their persons. Having thus demolished most of the emperor's statues, they set fire to the house of one of the principal citizens, to whom they bore some grudge, and would have committed other disorders, had they not been dispersed by a body of archers, who, by wounding only two of the rabble, struck terror into all the rest. The governor, hearing the archers were come, shewed himself to the multitude, and with an air of authority commanded them to disperse, and retire to their houses. Thus was the sedition quelled at once; and the city restored by noon to its former tranquility. The two persons, who had been wounded by the archers, being taken, informed against their accomplices, who were all by different ways put to death by the governor of the city: some were beheaded; others exposed to the wild beasts in in the theatre, and some burnt alive; he did not even spare the children, who had insulted the emperor's statues; and caused several persons to be executed, who had been but bare spectators of the injuries offered them. While the cruel governor was thus proceeding with inexorable severity against the unhappy Antiochians, almost without distinction of guilty or innocent, a report was spread, that a body of troops was at hand, with orders to plunder the city, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. Hereupon that populous metropolis of Syria was at once turned into a desert, the citizens abandoning in the utmost terror and confusion their dwellings, and retiring with their wives and families to the neighbouring mountains and deserts. As that report proved groundless, some returned to their native country; but the far greater part, dreading the cruelty of the governor, and the just resentment of the emperor, kept themselves concealed in the neighbouring cities, or amongst the rocks and mountains. To those who returned, St. Chrysoftom preached some of those inimitable homilies, which have reached our times, and are wonderfully adapted to stir them up to repentance, and to make them look upon the danger that threatened them as drawn down upon them from heaven by their sins. The eloquence and zeal of the preacher, joined to the apprehension they were under of the effects of the emperor's indignation, wrought a great change in that licentious and dissolute people, as appears not only from St. Chrysoftom himself, but from Sozomen, and even from Libanius. In the mean time, Theodosius, being informed of what had passed at Antioch, and particularly of the insults offered to his statues, and to those of his father, of the late empress, and of his children, was provoked to such a degree, that in the first transports of his passion, he commanded the city to be laid in ashes, and the inhabitants, without distinction of sex or age, to be put to the sword. This shews, that he was naturally choleric, and apt, when in a passion to enter into the most violent measures. His indignation seemed to him the more just, as he had favoured that city above all the rest; for he had designed to reside some time there, as Valens had done, and had with that view built built a magnificent palace at Daphne, and another in the old city, besides several other structures, with which he had at a great expense embellished that metropolis. But nothing incensed him so much against that ungrateful city, as their having insolently insulted even the dead, that is, his father and the empress Flaccilla. However, as his wrath soon awaged, he revoked the order he had given, and contented himself for the present with causing the public baths, the theatre, and the circus, to be shut up, with degrading the city from the rank of a metropolis, and subjecting it as a common village to its rival Laodicea. A certain quantity of bread was there daily distributed among the poor, as at Rome and Constantinople; and of this largess too the emperor thought fit to deprive them. These punishments Theodosius inflicted on the Antiochians in general, but at the same time he dispatched Cæsarius, magister officiorum, and Ellebichus, magister militum, or general, with full power to try and punish such as had been concerned in the late riot. Ellebichus was a man of an unblemished character, and is said to have squared all his actions by that golden and truly christian rule, "Do as you would be done by." Gregory Nazianzen wrote a letter to him, entreatng him, by their antient friendship, to discharge a reader from the service, and assuring him, that by so doing he would draw down the bleffing of heaven upon his arms, in a war of which he had the whole management. Cæsarius, his colleague in this commission, was at this time magister officiorum, was prefect of Constantinople in 365, prefect of the east in 395, and consul in 397. He is commended by Sozomen and Libanius as a man of great integrity, and one who never promised what he did not design to perform. These two officers the emperor chose in regard of their known integrity, to try and punish, according to the laws, such of the Antiochians as should be accused and found guilty of having of been any-ways concerned in the late sedition. St. Chrysostom describes, with his usual eloquence, the dread and terror which on this occasion feized the inhabitants of Antioch: they apprehended nothing less than the utter de-

The destruction of their city; the emperor, as they were well informed, was highly offended, especially at the outrages offered to his deceased father and to the late empress, and resolved to punish them with the utmost severity; the judges were men not to be moved by entreaties, or gained over with presents; the crime they had committed was open rebellion, and, according to the laws of the empire, punishable with death and, the confiscation of their estates; even such as were barely suspected, were liable to the most rigorous enquiries, to racks and tortures. The consternation was, as St. Chrysostom informs us, so great and general, that the inhabitants were preparing to retire, all to a man, with what effects they could carry with them, to the mountains and deserts; and it was with the utmost difficulty that he and the governor diverted them from that resolution. As the two judges approached the city, the whole people went out to meet them, and were received by them, especially by Ellebichus, in a very obliging manner, which allayed in some degree their fears. The next morning the alarm was renewed; for the two commissioners, having placed guards in the several quarters of the city, to restrain the people from assembling, summoned all the members of the senate or public council to their lodging, examined them concerning the late riot, heard with great patience what they alleged in their own defence, and in defence of their fellow-citizens; and after various enquiries, dismissed them, highly satisfied with the treatment they had met with, especially from Ellebichus, who could not refrain from tears, when they, throwing themselves at his feet, implored his protection. The compassion and good-nature he shewed on this occasion revived in a manner the whole city; their fears began to abate, and joy appeared in every face. But the scene soon changed; for Ellebichus, having caused great numbers of persons of all ranks to be seized in the night-time upon private informations, repaired early next morning to the place where justice was usually administered; and ordering the prisoners to be brought in chains before his tribunal, sentenced such of them to death as owned their crime, and ordered those who denied it to be cruelly racked, without shewing the least pity or compassion, as if he had changed his nature. Those who had seen him the day before, could scarce persuade themselves he was the same man; for not satisfied with causing persons of the first quality to be racked and tortured, like so many slaves, he uttered dreadful menaces against the whole city, threatening to lay it in ashes.

ashes, and put the inhabitants, without distinction of age, sex, or condition, to the sword, unless they redeemed themselves and their children from impending ruin, by a timely discovery, not only of the authors and ringleaders of the late treasonable and wicked attempts, but of all who had been any-ways concerned in them. St. Chrysostom, who was an eye-witness of all that passed, so far as his tenderness and compassion for the unhappy sufferers would allow him, gives us a lively, but dreadful description of this scene of horror, which he compares to that of the last day, when all distinction of birth, wealth, and rank will cease, and every one be punished or rewarded according to his deserts. Multitudes were dragged in chains from every quarter of the city to the tribunal of the inexorable judges, who, unmoved with their tears, and deaf to the entreaties of their relations, after a short hearing, either sentenced them to death, or ordered them to be racked till they owned themselves guilty, and discovered their accomplices. St. Chrysostom mentions a lady of the first quality, who, seeing her son apprehended by an officer on horseback, laid hold of his bridle, and suffered herself to be dragged in that manner through the streets to the tribunal, where, with her hair dishevelled, and bathed in tears, she threw herself at the feet of Ellebichus; but he, deaf to all entreaties, pursued his enquiries with such rigor, as threw the whole city into the utmost confusion. St. Chrysostom, who, with some others of the facerdotal order, was admitted into the hall where the criminals were examined and tortured, exerted all his Eloquence to move the judges to compasion, and was therein seconded by the hermits, who were very numerous in the neighbourhood of Antioch, where they led a retired life amongst the adjacent mountains; but, quitting their solitude, they had flocked to the city on this extraordinary occasion, to comfort with their presence the disconsolate citizens, and try whether they could raise any sentiments of humanity or commiseration in the hearts of their judges. With this view they repaired to the hall, where the judges were sitting; and having exhorted them in a very pathetic manner to treat their fellow-creatures with more humanity and compassion, they prevailed upon them in the end to suspend the execution of the sentence pronounced against those who were found guilty, and all proceeding against such as were not yet convicted, till a report of the whole

whole had been made to the emperor, and his further pleasure were known. One Macedonius, an anchorite, universally esteemed and revered for his sanctity, distinguished himself above the rest; for meeting Ellebichus and Caesarius on horseback in the forum, laying hold of one of them by the garment, he commanded them both, with an air of authority, to dismount. As neither of them knew him, they were not a little surprized, that a person, in appearance so mean and contemptible, should dare to speak to them in such a style; but they were no sooner informed who he was, than dismounting from their horses, they threw themselves at his feet; when the holy anchorite, addressing them in the Syrian tongue, "The emperor, said he, however distinguished by his imperial dignity, is still a man; and therefore ought to consider his nature, as well as his rank. Those whom he commands, are of the same nature with himself, and the images of the Supreme Being; let him therefore take care not to provoke the Almighty, by destroying the living images of the divine nature, for an affront offered to the inanimate images of his body. Other statues may be easily raised to him in the room of those that have been demolished; but he, notwithstanding his boasted power, is not able to make the least preparation for a single life, which he has once taken away." We are told, that both Ellebichus and Caesarius heard these words, which were interpreted to them in Greek, with the greatest respect and veneration, and immediately acquainted the emperor with what they had heard. The judges having, at the request of the ecclesiastics and hermits, agreed to suspend the execution of the criminals, till the emperor's further pleasure was known, such as had been found guilty were conducted under a strong guard to the publick prison, and the rest dismissed. Amongst the former were all those who composed the senate or council, that is, all the chief men in the city, whose estates were immediately seized, together with their houses and effects, their wives and children being driven out by the officers of the revenue, and obliged to lie in the streets, their friends and nearest relations fearing, left, by harbouring them, they should be involved in the ruin of their husbands and fathers. The hermits, having thus obtained of the judges a reprieve for the criminals, did not doubt but they should prevail upon the emperor to pardon them. In order order to this, they resolved to repair without delay to Constantinople, and throw themselves at the prince’s feet; but Ellebichus and Cæsarius, affected with their zeal, and unwilling they should expose themselves to the fatigue and inconveniencies of so long a journey, advised them rather to draw up a memorial in behalf of the unhappy citizens, and took upon themselves to present it to the emperor. The hermits followed their advice, and leaving the memorial in their hands, returned the same day to their mountains and deserts. Upon their departure, it was agreed between Ellebichus and Cæsarius, that the former should remain at Antioch, and the latter carry the memorial to the emperor. Accordingly Cæsarius set out that very evening, and pursued his journey with such expedition, that the sixth day about noon he reached Constantinople, distant above five hundred miles from Antioch. In the mean time, Ellebichus caused those who had been condemned to be removed from the public prison to a more convenient place, allowing them the liberty of taking the air in the gardens belonging to it, and seeing their friends and relations. St. Chrysostom let no day pass without visiting them, in order to bring them, while thus kept in suspense between hope and fear, to an entire resignation to the will of the Almighty, in whom alone he daily exhorted them to place their confidence. The Antiochians, dreading the effects of the emperors resentment, had sent, a few days after the riot was committed, Flavianus, bishop of the place, to intercede with Theodosius in their behalf. Flavianus had met Ellebichus and Cæsarius on the road, who acquainted him with the commissioun they were going to execute at Antioch. The holy bishop, in hearing it, burst into tears; but nevertheless pursued his journey, still hoping he should be able to soften the good-natured emperor into compassion. The day after his arrival at Constantinople he appeared at court; but in order to move the emperor to compassion, stood at a distance from him, silent, and bathed in tears, as if he dared not look up, or approach him. But the emperor no sooner observed him, than he flew to him, not to upbraid him for undertaking the defence of the rebellious city, but to justify his own conduct, and complain to him of the ungrateful return the Antiochians had made for the many favours he had heaped upon them. Flavianus,

Vianus, bursting into tears, answered, that the severest punishment he could inflict upon them, was too mild and gentle for the enormous crimes they had committed, and their undutiful return to so indulgent a prince; but at the same time he told him, that to forgive one’s enemies was a duty incumbent upon every Christian; that from his pardoning such enormous offences, great glory would redound to the religion he professed; that the Jews, Greeks, and barbarians, would admire and extol the purity of its morals, &c. He added, that now an opportunity offered to make himself a laffing instance to all posterity of humanity and good-nature; and reasonably put him in mind of the order he had issued this very year, commanding all prisoners to be let at liberty against the solemnity of Easter, and of the memorable words he uttered on that occasion, viz. I wish it were in my power to recall the dead from their graves, and restore them to life! This admirable speech, which is related at length by St. Chrysostom, made so deep an impression on the mind of the emperor, that he could not refrain from tears, nor forbear crying out, that he pardoned the ungrateful city, and restored the inhabitants, however guilty, to his favour. Thus St. Chrysostom says. But Libanius and Theodoret tell us, that the emperor, tho’ greatly softened by the speech of Flavianus, yet did not grant a general pardon till the arrival of Caesarius, who presenting to him the memorial of the hermits, and at the same time pleading with great energy in favour of the unhappy city, which, he said, had been already sufficiently punished, prevailed upon him to grant a general pardon. He therefore wrote a letter to the citizens of Antioch, shewing, that it was not without reason he had treated them with so much severity, after they had, in such an outrageous manner, insulted his deceased father and wife. He added, that as his anger, however just, was soon appeased, he pardoned all without exception, whether condemned to death or banishment, restored to them their estates, their fiefs, baths, theatres, and territory, and to their city the privileges and rights of a metropolis. He concluded with expressions of the deepest concern for the death of those who had been condemned by the governor, and executed without his knowledge. This letter the emperor delivered to Flavianus, that he might have the honour of carrying the joyful tidings to the disconsolate city; but the holy bishop, impatient to put an end to the affliction of his people, yielded that honour to another, whom he thought capable of performing the journey with more expedition. It is more easy to conceive than express the joy, which the arrival of the messenger caused in Antioch. St. Chrysostom, to whom we refer our readers, describes at length what passed on this occasion, and concludes with these words: Let the pagans be ashamed, or rather instructed; and learning our philosophy of an emperor and a bishop, renounce their errors, and embrace a religion, which encourages and produces such eminent virtues.

While these things passed in the east the boundless ambition of Maximus raised far greater disturbances in the west; for that usurper, not satisfied with the provinces which had been held by Gratian, passed this year the Alps all on a sudden, with a design to seize on Valentianians share too; and, meeting with no opposition, marched straight to Milan, where Valentian usually resided. The young prince, not finding himself in a condition to make head against him, fled first to Aquileia, and from thence, being closely pursued by Maximus, to Thessalonica, with his mother Justina, and the prefect Probus, to implore the protection and assistance of Theodosius. That pious prince, in a letter which he wrote to Valentian, in answer to one he had received from his mother Justina, told him, that he was not at all surprized at the progress Maximus had made, nor at the bad success that attended his affairs, since the tyrant had protected and persecuted, the orthodox faith; for Valentian, as we have hinted above, had not only embraced the doctrine of Arius, but persecuted the orthodox prelates, and driven several of them from their sees, being induced therunto by his mother Justina, a most zealous Arian. Soon after, Theodosius removed from Constantinople, attended by several members of that senate, to Thessalonica, in order to comfort with his presence the young prince, who had taken refuge in his dominions. Upon his arrival, he repaired to the palace where Valentian was lodged; and after having assured him, that he was resolved to employ all the forces of the east in his defence, he prevailed upon him to renounce the Arian impiety, as the only obstacle to the success which they might expect from heaven. Suidas relates the discourse which Theodosius

Zosimus writes, that in a great council held at Theßalonika, all the counsellors to a man were of opinion, that war should be forthwith declared against Maximus; but that Theodosius, foreseeing and dreading the evils inseparable from a civil war, sent first ambassadors to the tyrant, seriously exhorting him to restore to Valentinian the usurped provinces, and content himself with Gaul, Spain and Britain, which had been yielded to him by himself and Valentinian. Maximus would not, it seems, hearken to any proposals; for this very year he laid siege to Aquileia, which he reduced, notwithstanding the vigorous resistance of the inhabitants, as he did Quaderna, Bononia, Mutina, Regium, Placentia, and several other cities in Italy; nay, he was the ensuing year acknowledged in Rome, and in all the provinces of Africa. Theodosius, therefore, finding a war inevitable, spent the remaining part of this, and the first month of the following year 388, when he was consul the second time with Cynegius, in making the necessary preparations for carrying it on with vigor. His army confounded chiefly of Goths, Hunns, Alans, and other barbarians, whom he was glad to take into the service, to prevent their raising disturbances on the frontiers. He appointed Promotus general of the horse, and Timasius of the foot; and having committed the government of the eastern provinces to such persons as, he knew, would, in his absence, consult the welfare of his subjects, and maintain the public tranquillity, he set out from Theßalonika, in the beginning of the summer, marching with great expedition through Illyricum, with a design to surprize Maximus, who had not yet taken the field, but continued, without the least apprehension of danger, in Aquileia. Andragathius, one of the usurper’s generals, a man of great courage and experience in war, had been appointed to guard the passes of the Julian Alps; but a report being spread, that Theodosius designed to pass the Ionian sea, and invade Italy, he was ordered to quit those passes, and to man with the utmost expedition what ships he could, in order to intercept the emperor in his passage. Thus was Maximus deprived of the assistance of that excellent commander, and of the flower of his troops, who were employed in manning the fleet, which Andragathius assembled, pursuant to his orders, on the coast of the Ionian sea. In the mean time, Theodosius entered tered Pannonia, and advanced to Sciscia, now Seisleg, before the enemy had the least notice of his approach. However, the general, who commanded the troops of Mxaimus in that neighbourhood, having drawn them together with incredible expedition, fell upon Theodosius as he was paffing the Save; but his army was utterly defeated, and he himself drowned in the river. From Sciscia the emperor advanced to Petovio, now Pettaw on the Drave, where he was met by Marcellinus, the brother of Maximus, at the head of an army far more numerous than his own. However, the emperor offered him battle, which he readily accepted; but was utterly defeated, tho' his men fought with extraordinary courage and resolution. We are not told, that Maximus was present at either of these battles; but he must have at least advanced to support his generals; for both Pacatus and St. Ambrose write, that after his forces were twice defeated, he fled with the troops that attended him, and with the remains of the shattered army, to Aquileia, whither Theodosius pursued him, having sent Arbogaistes before to invest the place, and prevent the tyrant from making his escape. Zosimus writes, that the emperor arriving soon after, took the town by assault; and Socrates, that it was delivered up to him by the soldiers of Maximus. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the tyrant was seized, according to some, by his own men, according to others by the soldiers of Theodosius, who had entered the city, and dragged in chains to the emperor, encamped about three miles from the city. Theodosius reproached him with the death of Gratian, and his unbounded ambition, which had prompted him to murder one brother, and drive the other out of his dominions. As Maximus was, or at least pretended to be, touched with remorse for the crimes he had committed, and publicly owned he had no claim or title to the power he had usurped, Theodosius began to look upon him with an eye of compassion; which those about him observing, and fearing he might pardon him, they removed him out of the emperor's sight, and without waiting his orders, struck off his head. He was executed at a place about three miles distance from Aquileia, on the twenty-seventh of August, according to Socrates; or on the twenty-eighth of July, as Idatius will have have it. St. Ambrose writes, that Maximus was at the same time defeated by the Saxons, the Franks, and Theodosiust. Those two nations had broken into Gaul, as appears from Gregory of Tours, under the conduct of Genobaud, Marcomir, and Surno; and having ravaged the country bordering on the Rhine, were preparing to repuls that river with an immense booty, when Nannius and Quentinus, two of Maximus's generals, falling upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces. Quentinus followed the Franks cross the Rhine, which he palled near the present city of Nuyas; but, as he was not acquainted with the country, most of his men were cut off by the enemy in the woods and marshes, and the rest obliged to save themselves by a shameful and precipitous flight. Maximus had left his son Victors, whom he had declared Augustus, in Gaul, to awe the inhabitants of that province during his absence. Against him Theodosius dispatched Arbogastes, who took him prisoner, after having dispersed the troops that attended him, and put him to death. Zosimus calls him a youth; but all other writers style him an infant. Andragathius, hearing of the defeat and death of Maximus, as he was cruising in the Ionian gulf, threw himself headlong into the sea, and was drowned, chusing that kind of death, to prevent a more ignominious one, which, as Gratian had been seized and murdered by him, he had reason to apprehend. Orosius writes, that he was overcome in battle; and St. Ambrose, that he had joined Maximus, before his defeat, and perished soon after. Thus ended a war, which at first threatened the empire with endless calamities; and the glory which Theodosius acquired by his victory, was greatly heightened by his moderation and clemency in the use of it; for immediately after the death of Maximus, he published a general amnesty, and was so far from persecuting the friends and relations of the usurper, that he would not even suffer them to be reproached with their rebellion. No man was banished, says Pacatus, no man's estate was confiscated; and those who defied, and would have suffered, the most cruel death under any other prince, were dismissed by Theodosius, without so so much as hearing from him an angry word ⁹. Those who had with most warmth espoused the tyrant’s cause, were allowed to return unhurt, continues the same author, to their wives and children, to enjoy their estates unmolested, and with them the same rank, dignity and honours, by which they had been distinguished before the rebellion ⁷. The wife and daughter of Maximus had been taken, and confined in a public prison by some of the emperor’s officers; which the good-natured prince no sooner knew than he ordered them to be set at liberty, settled a considerable pension upon them, and charged one of their kinsmen to take care, that no one injured or insulted them ⁸. But what St. Ambrose and Zosimus himself most of all admired in Theodosius, was his not only restoring to Valentinian his own share, when no one was in a condition to dispute with him the possession of the whole empire, but his generously relinquishing to him Gaul, Spain, and Britain, which, before the revolt of Maximus, had been held by his brother Gratian. He was satisfied says St. Ambrose, with the good he had done, without reaping any advantage from it himself, tho’ no one could have blamed him, had he retained some of those provinces, considering the immense charge he had been at in restoring the young prince to the quiet possession of the rest ⁷. As Julina, the mother of Valentinian, died about this time, Theodosius, during the three years he continued in the west, governed in the name of that prince, who was, at the death of his mother, scarce seventeen years old, and consequent not yet equal to so great a burden ⁴. While Theodosius was pursuing the war in Illyricum, a report was spread at Constantinople, that his army was cut off, and he himself in great danger of falling in the hands of the usurper. Hereupon the Arians, whom he had highly disobliged, by driving them from their churches in 380, as we have related above, rising in the night time, set fire to the house of Nectarius, the orthodox bishop of Constantinople, who perished in the flames, and committed several other disorders. But the news of the entire defeat of the usurper being brought soon after to that metropolis, the Arians, dreading the effects of the emperor’s indignation, had recourse to the clemency of Arcadius, whom Theodosius had left at Constantinople in setting out for the war; and the young prince not only forgave them himself, but prevailed upon his father to confirm the pardon which he had granted. ⁵

ed them. It was without all doubt, on this occasion that the Arians set fire to the church of St. Sophia, which consumed the roof of that lately edifice, as we read in Codin; but Theodosius, notwithstanding his zeal for the orthodox faith, to encourage his son to acts of clemency, at his request overlooked that, and the other enormous disorders committed by the fanatics on that occasion. The emperor was still at Aquileia on the twenty-second of September; but on the tenth of October at Milan, where he seems to have passed the winter. Being informed, while he resided in that city, that the christians had burnt a synagogue of the Jews and a temple of the pagans at Callinicum in Mesopotamia, he condemned the bishop of the place to rebuild the synagogue at his own expence, and ordered all those who had been any-ways concerned in either of these riots, to be punished with the utmost severity. But St. Ambrose, thinking a prince, who had lately overlooked far greater disorders in the Arians, ought not to exert so much rigor against an orthodox bishop and his people, wrote to him from Aquileia in their favour; and upon his return to Milan persuaded the emperor, by a speech he pronounced before him in the great church, to revoke the order he had given. About the latter end of this year, the senate of Rome dispatched deputies to Theodosius, earnestly entreating him to give them leave to restore to its former place the altar of Victory, which had been removed by Gratian. The emperor seemed at first inclined to grant them their request; but was in the end persuaded by St. Ambrose to deny it. However, Symmachus, the chief of the deputies, a man universally esteemed for his eloquence, and greatly beloved by the pagans, in regard of his zeal for the antient religion of the Romans in a pagenyrie which he pronounced soon after on Theodosius, renewed the same request in the name of the senate; which so provoked the emperor, that he immediately ordered him to come down, and to be put that instant into a chariot, in order to be conveyed into banishment, forbidding him, under the severest penalties, ever to come within an hundred miles of Rome. The emperor’s indignation seemed the more just, A deputation from the senate of Rome, for restoring the altar of Victory.

just, as Symmachus had been but very lately pardoned by him, when accused by his enemies of treason, in having pronounced a panegyric during the war on the usurper Maximus. However, as Theodosius was never more ready to pardon, than when he seemed most provoked, the friends of Symmachus no sooner spoke in his behalf, than the emperor recalled him, restored him to his former rank, and to convince the world that he retained no ill will to him, raised him two years after to the consular dignity. This year Theodosius enacted several laws against heretics, viz. one dated the second of March, forbidding them, especially the Apollinarians, to hold assemblies, to have bishops or clergy, to live in cities, to appear at court, or to present any petition to the emperor. The same prohibition was renewed by another law, dated the fourteenth of June. By another enacted two days after, all public disputes concerning religion were forbidden under the severest penalties. A law dated the twenty-ninth of February declares all marriages between Jews and christians unlawful, and subjects the contracting parties to the punishments due to adultery; another, addressed to Cynegius, forbids any one to marry his brother's wife, or his own wife's sister. The same prohibition had been made by Constans in 335. Theodosius, who was still at Milan on the twenty-second of May, left that city soon after, and repaired to Rome with young Valentinian and his son Honorius, whom he had sent for from Constantinople, after the defeat of Maximus. He entered that metropolis in triumph on the thirteenth of June; and a few days after Latinus Pacatus Drepanius, an orator of Gaul, pronounced his panegyric in the senate, the emperor himself being present. The orator takes notice of his liberality towards the people on that occasion, of his affability and condescension, not only in viewing the rarities of the city, but in entering the houses of private persons, which won him the hearts of the Roman people. The poet Claudian tells us, that at Rome he received embassadors sent by the king of Persia to treat with him about a peace between the two two empires. To Theodotius's journey to Rome was owing, according to Prudentius, the conversion of the senate and people of that city to the christian religion; not that he used any violence, says that writer, for he indifferently raised pagans and christians to the first employments in the state; but so great was the force of his example, that few, either in the senate or among the people, were so attached to their errors as to withstand it. Prudentius mentions several illustrious families converted on this occasion to the true religion, viz. the families of the Paulini, of the Baffi, of the Annii, and of the Gracchi, at that time the most antient and noble family in Rome. The people, continues that writer, flocked to the Lateran church, to receive there the sacred sign of the royal chrism, and to the Vatican, to visit the ashes of the father of the faith; meaning, we imagine, St. Peter, who was then supposed to have planted the faith in Rome. The idols, says St. Jerom, were every-where pulled down; their temples abandoned; and the gods, once so much revered, left in their nitches alone, or attended only by mice and owls: the capitol, continues the same writer, formerly so much frequented, is now turned into a desert; the other temples are covered with dust, and filled with cobwebs; the whole city crowds to the tombs of the martyrs; and the people, in passing by those antient temples, behold them with joy ready to fall, and bury the gods under their ruins. Rome forfakes Jupiter and his temples, despises his ceremonies, and is ashamed of the worship formerly paid him. Theodotius, however, would not suffer the statues of the gods, many of which were the work of the best artificers of antiquity, to be destroyed; but ordered them to be removed from the places where they had been adored, to the public squares, where they served as ornaments to the city. Theodotius laid scarcely three months at Rome, but in that short time he not only seriously applied himself to the suppression of idolatry, but with indefatigable care laboured to reform many abuses, which had long prevailed in the city, as appears from the several laws he published there. He enacted one, dated the seventeenth of June, ordering all the Manichees to be driven out of the city, and declaring them incapable of receiving legacies, or leaving any thing by will even to their children.

The Roman History.  Book III.

A few days before Theodosius left Rome, a comet is said to have appeared in the east in the shape of a sword; and moving northward, to have vanished in the middle of the Urfa Major, after having lasted forty days, as we read in Philostorgius; or only twenty-six, as Marcellinus will have it. The former writer mentions several other prodigies, among which he reckons two men equally remarkable for their size, the one being seven cubits and three inches, and the other no taller, says the author, than a partridge, though he had an agreeable voice, and an excellent understanding: the former was a native of Syria, and the latter of Egypt, and they both lived to the age of about twenty-five. Theodosius left Rome on the first of September, was at a place called Valenta on the third of the same month, and on the sixth at Forum Flaminii, now Ponte Centefimo on the Topino, not far from Fuligno in the duchy of Spoleto, where he enacted a law forbidding the execution of criminals during Lent. From thence he pursued his journey to Milan, where he enacted a law, dated the twenty-sixth of November, commanding the heretic bishops and clergy to be everywhere driven out of the cities and their suburbs. From this law, and several others of the ensuing year, it appears, that Theodosius passed the winter in that city, while Valentinian marched into Gaul, to make head against the Franks, who were preparing to invade that province; but all we know of this expedition is, that Valentinian had an interview with Marcomir and Sunno, two chiefs of the Franks; that they delivered hostages to him; and that the emperor, on the eighth of November, was at Treves, where he took up his winter quarters. This year is chiefly remarkable for the destruction of the celebrated temple of Serapis at Alexandria, which, according to the description Ammianus Marcellinus gives us of it, surpassed in grandeur and wealth all the temples in the world, that of Jupiter Capitolinus alone excepted; nay, Theodoret calls it the greatest, and without exception the most beautiful temple, in the universe. Theodosius, who had hitherto spared that stately edifice, caused it this year to be levelled with the ground on the following occasion. Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, having begged and obtained of

of the emperor an old temple, formerly consecrated to Bacchus, but at that time ruined and forsaken, with a design to convert it into a church, the workmen, in clearing it of the rubbish, found among the ruins several obscene figures, which the bishop to ridicule the superstition of the heathens, called to be exposed to public view. This provoked the pagans to such a degree, that they flew to arms; and falling upon the christians, cut great numbers of them in pieces, before they were in a condition to oppose their fury. At length the christians took arms in their own defence; and, being supported by the few soldiers who were quartered in Alexandria, began to repel force by force. Thus a civil war was kindled within the very walls of the city, and no day paused without some scuffle and bloodshed. The pagans, when tired with fighting, or overpowered with numbers, (for the christians were far more numerous) used to retire to the temple of Serapis; and thence falling out again unexpectedly, seize on such of the christians as they met, and dragging them into the temple, either force them by the most exquisite torments to sacrifice to their idol, or, if they refused, to rack them to death. As they expected to be soon attacked by the emperor's troops, they chose a philosopher, by name Olympus, for their leader, with a resolution to de-defend themselves, their temple, and their religion, to the last extremity. In the mean time, Evagrius, governor of Egypt, and Romanus, who commanded the troops there, having atttempted in vain to persuade the pagans to quit the temple, and retire to their dwellings, sent a distinct account of the whole to the emperor, who extolling and envying the happiness of such as had chosen rather to die, than renounce their religion and offer sacrifice to the idols, would not suffer their death to be revenged on those at whose hands they had obtained the crown of martyrdom, but readily forgave them. However, at the same time, he ordered the temple of Serapis, and all the other temples in Alexandria, which gave occasion to frequent disturbances, to be utterly demolished, charging Theophilus, bishop of the place, who had solicited this order, to see it put in execution, and enjoining Evagrius and Romanus to follow therein his directions. The pagans no sooner knew that the emperor had been informed of the cruelties they had committed, than they abandoned the temple and dispered, some of them retiring privately to their own houses, and others withdrawing from the town, and either concealing themselves in the neighbouring cities, or flying to more distant countries. Among the latter was their leader Olympus, who conveyed himself in the night on board a vessel which was ready to sail for Italy. Helladius and Ammonius, two grammarians, under whom Socrates, the ecclesiastic historian, had studied at Constantinople, withdrew from Egypt, and took refuge amongst the neighbouring barbarians. The former used to brag of his having killed, during that tumult, nine Christians with his own hand. The temple, thus abandoned by the pagans, was delivered up to Theophilus, who, with the assistance of the people and soldiers, reduced it in a short time to an heap of ruins, leaving nothing undemolished but the foundations, which could not be removed on account of the extraordinary weight and size of the stones. The celebrated statue of Serapis, the principal god of the Egyptians, was broken in pieces, and the limbs of that pretended divinity carried first in triumph by the Christians through the city, and then thrown into an huge fire kindled for that purpose in the amphitheatre. As the Egyptians ascribe the overflowing of the Nile, to which was owing the fertility of their country, to the benign influence of their god Serapis, they concluded, that, now he was destroyed, the river would no longer overflow, and consequently that a general famine would ensue. But when they observed, that the Nile, on the contrary, swelled to a greater height than had been known in the memory of man, and thereby produced an immense plenty of all manner of provisions, many of the pagans, renouncing the worship of the idols, adored the God of the Christians. Rufinus, Socrates, Eunapius, and Sozomen, write, that crosses were found engraved on several of the stones of the temple, which occasioned the conversion of great numbers of the Egyptian priests, the cross being in the sacred language of that nation the symbol of life; and on the other hand, a tradition having for many ages obtained among them, that their religion, and the temple of Serapis would subsist till the sign of life appeared. Not only the statue of Serapis, which was lodged in the temple, but all the other statues of that pretended deity, were by the zealous Christians carefully sought for, ignominiously dragged through the streets, and consumed in the flames; infomuch, that in the great city of Serapis, as Alexandria.

andria was frequently filled, not the least footstep was left of that idol, or of the worship which for so many ages had been paid him. In the room of the temple of Serapis was built a church, and a martyrium, says Rufinus, meaning perhaps a burying-place for those who had suffered martyrdom, during the late disturbances. Sophronius, one of St. Jerom’s friends, wrote a particular and distinct account of the demolition of the temple of Serapis; but his work has not reached our times. Theophilus, who was a prelate no less active than zealous, not satisfied with demolishing the temple of Serapis, encouraged the people, supported by the governor of the province, and the commander of the Roman troops, to pull down and level with the ground all the other temples, oratories, chapels, and places set apart for the worship of the idols throughout Egypt, causing every-where the statues of the gods to be either burnt or melted down. Of the innumerable statues, with which that superstitious province was filled, he is said to have spared but one, viz. that of an ape, in order to expose the pagan religion to ridicule. Theodosius not only approved of what Theophilus had done, but commended his zeal, and returned him public thanks for the pains he had taken in clearing that province from the abominations to which it had been so long addicted. Soon after he enacted a law, forbidding, on pain of death, the subjects of the empire to offer any kind of sacrifice to idols; and declaring the estates confiscated of such as should burn incense before them.

The following year 390, when Valentinian was consul the fourth time with Neoterius, Theodosius continued at Milan, as appears from the code, till the fifth of July; was at Verona from the twenty-third of August to the eighth of September, and again at Milan on the twenty-sixth of November, and the twenty-third of December. At Verona he published a law, dated the third of September, commanding those who professed a monastic life, to withdraw from the cities, and retire to the deserts, pursuant to their institution. But this law he revoked by another dated the seventeenth of April 392. By a law, which was published at Rome on the fourteenth of May, he commanded those who should be found found guilty of unnatural lust to be burnt alive in the sight of the whole people k. This year, an obelisk, twenty-four cubits in height, was raised in the circus at Constantinople, and a column before the church of St. Sophia, on which was a statue of Theodosius in silver, weighing seven thousand four hundred ounces l. As for Valentinian, he seems to have continued all this year at Treves, or in the neighbourhood of that city. The next consuls were Tatianus and Q. Aurelius Symmachus. Theodosius continued this year at Milan to the twenty-second of March, was at Concordia on the ninth of May, at Vicentia on the twenty-seventh of the same month, and at Aquileia from the sixteenth of June to the fourteenth of July m. By a law dated the ninth of May, he declared those who should renounce the Christian religion, after having been baptized, not only incapable of giving or receiving the least thing by will, but of being, as infamous persons, witnesses to any private or public deed; adding, that he would have confined them to the deserts, had he not believed it a greater punishment for them to live among men, without being looked upon as men n. By another law, dated the ninth of the same month, he commanded the heretics to be every-where driven out of the cities o. Some writers confine this law to the Manichees, while others extend it to heretics of all denominations. Theodosius was, as we have observed above, at Aquileia on the fourteenth of July; but soon after he set out from thence for Constantinople, leaving the entire management of affairs in the west to Valentinian, now in the twentieth year of his age. On his arrival at Thessalonica, he found the province of Macedon in great confusion; for the barbarians, who, at the instigation of Maximus, had revolted, and concealed themselves among the marshes and woods, after the defeat of the usurper, taking advantage of the emperor’s absence, began to fully cut off their felicity in the night, and seizing on whatever came in their way, they retired with their booty before day. As it was a more difficult task to find them out than to conquer them, the emperor took that province upon himself; and without discovering his design to any one, made choice of five persons, in whom he could confide, to attend him, ordering each of them to take three spare horses, that that they might shift as often as there was occasion. Thus attended and disguised, he ranged about the country, receiving from the peasants such refreshments as their cottages could afford him. At length he came to a small inn, kept by a woman stricken in years, who received him with extraordinary civility, which induced him to stay there that night. In the same inn lodged a perfon, who declining to converse with the rest, and seeming desirous to conceal himself, gave the emperor no small jealousy. Having therefore, after he was retired to his chamber, called for the mistress of the house, and asked her who that person was, she answered, that who he was the knew not; but that ever since the news of the emperor’s return out of the west, he had lodged at her house, going out in the morning, and continuing abroad all day, but returning at night to his lodging, for which he honestly paid her. Upon this information, the emperor ordered him to be seized and examined; but he refusing to declare who he was, the emperor at last discovered himself, ordered the man to be put to the rack, and by that means forced him to own the truth, viz. that he was employed as a spy by the barbarians, who lay concealed among the woods and bogs, to give them intelligence from time to time of the motions of the emperor’s army, and to inform them what places lay most convenient for their incursions. Hereupon the emperor caused his head to be struck off; and returning early the next morning to the army, led his soldiers to the place where he had learnt from the spy the barbarians were lodged; and falling upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces. Timasius, who together with Promotus commanded on this occasion under Theodosius, imagining most of the barbarians to be already cut off, advised the emperor to allow his soldiers some time to refresh themselves after so warm and fatiguing a service, that they might with more vigour pursue the rest, who could not make their escape. The emperor, following his advice, founded a retreat; but while his men were refreshing themselves without the least apprehension of danger, the barbarians, falling upon them when they were quite unprepared, and most of them overcome with wine, or asleep, made a dreadful havoc of them, and would have either killed, or taken the emperor himself, had he not been seasonably rescued by Promotus, at the danger of his own life. However, Theodosius, having rallied his dispersed forces the next day, attacked the barbarians anew with such success, that few of them them escaped the general slaughter. Thus Zosimus, on whose single authority the whole truth of this account rests; for no other writer takes the least notice of this expedition. The victory over the barbarians was, according to Zosimus, chiefly owing to the courage and conduct of Promotus; but that brave general, who had served the emperor with great fidelity, was this very year killed in an ambuscade by the barbarians in Thrace. Zosimus writes, that Rufinus, the emperor's chief favourite, having treated Promotus in a very haughty and insolent manner, the general, not able to brook such treatment, strung him; which affront Rufinus revenged, by betraying him into the hands of the barbarians, with whom he maintained for that purpose a private correspondence. But Claudian, who mentions the death of Promotus, and wrote two books filled with invectives against Rufinus, takes no notice of this black piece of treachery. Zosimus adds, that Rufinus having complained of Promotus to the emperor, the prince, who reposed an entire confidence in him, returned him this answer; If the other ministers continue thus to envy you, your good fortune, they shall soon have the mortification to see you emperor. Claudian writes, that Stilicho revenged the death of his friend Promotus on the Baftarne, by whose hands he fell; and that after having defeated them with great slaughter, he flung them up in a narrow valley, with the Goths, Hunns, and other barbarians, who had long infested Thrace, and would have cut them all off to a man, had not the emperor chosen rather to conclude a peace with them, following therein, says that poet, the evil counsels of the traitor Rufinus. Theodosius, upon his return to Constantinople, made it his chief study to suppress idolatry and Arianism, ordering such temples as were still standing to be pulled down, and the Arians to be every-where driven out of the cities, lest they should infect their fellow-citizens with their pestilent doctrine.

The next consuls were Arcadius, the second time, and Rufinus. Theodosius had, as we have observed above, during his three years stay in the west, used all possible means to extirpate idolatry; but upon his return to the east, the pagans began to conceive new hopes, and such of the senators of Rome, as continued still attached to the superstition of

of their ancestors, sent a deputation to Valentinian, at the head of which was the celebrated Symmachus, entreated him to restore to their priests and temples, the privileges which they had enjoyed till the reign of Gratian. Valentinian, who was then in Gaul, received the deputies in a very obliging manner; but could not be prevailed on, either by them, or by the many pagan ministers who were in his court, to grant them their request. Not long after, the barbarians threatening to pass the Alps towards Rhaetia, and invade Italy, the emperor resolved to quit Gaul, and hasten to Milan, in order to make head against them. As he was desirous of being baptized before he engaged in war, he dispatched from Vienne, where he then was, an express to St. Ambrose bishop of Milan, for whom he had an extraordinary esteem and veneration, inviting him into Gaul, to administer to him that sacrament. The prelate, upon the receipt of the emperor's letter, set out without delay; but before he reached Vienne, he received the melancholy news of the death of that unfortunate prince, inhumanly murdered, as most authors agree, by Arbogastes. He was a Frank by nation, and owed his preferment to Gratian. After that prince's death, the soldiery, by whom he was highly esteemed, and not undeservedly, for his experience in military affairs, his liberality and disinterestedness, raised him, without the consent either of Valentinian, who was then a child, or of his mother Juffina, to the post of general; in which command he acquitted himself with great fidelity and moderation, while Theodosius continued in the west; but, upon the departure of that prince for Constantinople, he began to act more like a sovereign than a minister or officer, arrogating to himself the power of controlling the young prince, and governing the court with an absolute sway. Such of the officers in the army as seemed attached to Valentinian, he discharged, and put Franks, in whom he could confide, in their room, disposing at the same time of all the civil employments, without the emperor's consent or knowledge, and bestowing them upon persons of his own faction. Valentinian, no longer able to brook such a shameful servitude, resolved to discharge Arbogastes; and accordingly seeing him one day at court, he threw him a paper, containing an abrogation of his command. But Arbogastes, having perused it, tore it in pieces with great contempt, and threw it on the ground, telling the emperor with with the utmost arrogance, that as he had not received his authority of him, it was not in his power to devised him of it. After this, Arbogastes, well apprized that Valentinian would not suffer such an outrage to pass unrevened, resolved to be before-hand with him, and accordingly dispatched him a few days after w. Authors disagree as to the manner of his death: Zosimus writes, that while Valentinian, attended by a small guard, was diverting himself in the neighbourhood of Vienne, Arbogastes, assaulted him unexpectedly, stabb'd him with his sword x. According to Philostorgius, he was strangled, while he was taking his diversion on the banks of the Rhone, by assassins, whom Arbogastes had hired for that purpose. The same author adds, that, after they had strangled him, they tied his own handkerchief about his neck, and hung him upon a tree, that the world might be induced to believe, he had laid violent hands on himself; for his guards were at some distance, and out of sight y. St. Jerom z, Orosius a, Rufinus b, Epiphanius c, Socrates d, and Sozomen e, agree, that he was strangled; but the two latter writers suppose this to have happened in the palace, and the eunuchs of the court, gained over by Arbogastes, to have been the authors of his death. Idatus and Tiro Prosper only write, that he was murdered by the treachery of Arbogastes. The report which Arbogastes, and those of his faction, spread abroad, viz. that the prince had laid violent hands on himself, was credited by many, and among the rest by Prosper, who relates it in his chronicle as an event not to be questioned; but we can hardly believe, that St. Ambrose would have exalted, as he does, his piety and religious sentiments, had he ended his life by the enormous crime of self-murder. He died in 392, on the fifteenth of May, that year the eve of Pentecost, after having lived only twenty years and some months, and borne the title of emperor sixteen years and about six months, tho' he cannot be said to have reigned till the death of Gratian, who died eight years and nine months before him f. St. Ambrose tells us, that when he saw himself unexpectedly attacked by the assassins, the only words he uttered were, Alas! my poor sisters! The funeral ceremonies

Monies were performed the next day, the sixteenth of May, with great solemnity; and his body was sent to Milan, and interred there near that of his brother Gratian, on which occasion St. Ambrose pronounced an oration in praise of the deceased prince, who, according to him, and most other writers, would have equalled, if not eclipsed, the glory of the best emperors, had he been suffered to live longer, being of a lively genius, valiant, sober, liberal, sincere in his friendship, entirely unbiased in the administration of justice, and in the disposing of employments partial to merit alone. Zosimus, tho' highly prejudiced against all Christian princes, owns, that his death was a public loss. He had persecuted the catholics in his mother's lifetime, or rather, she had persecuted them in his name; but, after her death, he proved a most zealous patron of the orthodox faith, discountenancing the Arian and other sectaries, as much as he had favoured them before he was capable of distinguishing truth from falsehood. His two sisters, Jutta and Grata, continued at Milan, and there embraced, after his death, the state of virginity. His sister Galla, who was married to Theodosius, died two years after in child-bed.

After the death of Valentinian, Arbogastes might have easily seized on the sovereignty; but not caring to appear guilty of such a treacherous and inhuman murder, he chose to confer it on Eugenius, and to reign in his name. Eugenius had formerly taught grammar, and afterwards rhetoric, and was generally esteemed on account of his eloquence. Ricomer, at the request of Symmachus, had taken him under his protection, and upon his returning into the east with Theodosius, recommended him to Arbogastes, by whose interest he was raised to the post of secretary. Zosimus tells us, that Arbogastes, reposing an entire confidence in Eugenius, and judging him capable of the most daring resolutions, imparted to him the design he had formed of murdering Valentinian, and raising him to the empire in his room; that Eugenius rejected at first the proposal with horror; but was in the end prevailed upon to fall in with the measures of his patron; whereupon he was, by his interest, after the death of the young prince, proclaimed emperor, as a person well qualified qualified for that high station. He soon made himself master of all the western provinces, says Socrates; which must be understood of West Illyricum, Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Britain; but not of Africa, which, after the death of Valentinian, submitted to Theodosius, as appears from two laws of that prince, the one dated from Constantinople the thirtieth of December, 393, and addressed to Gildo count of Africa, and the other dated from the same place the twenty-seventh of March, and addressed to Silvanus duke of the province Tripolitana. It is likewise manifest from Claudian, that Gildo acknowledged Theodosius, and not Eugenius. The new usurer, tho' a christian, was greatly favour'd by the pagans, who were well appris'd, that he only bore the title of emperor, while the whole power was lodged in Arbo-gastes, who pretended a great attachment to their religion. The aruspices, who began to appear anew, assured him, that he was destined to the empire of the whole world; that he would soon gain a complete victory over Theodosius, who was as much hated, as he was beloved, by the gods; and that his power and authority would have no other bounds, but those of the Roman empire. Tho' Eugenius seemed to favour the pagans, yet, in the very beginning of his reign he wrote to St. Ambrose, who did not answer his letter, till he was press'd by some of his friends to recommend them to the new prince, and then he treated him in his letters with all the respect due to an emperor. While these things pass'd in the west, some disturbances happened in the court of Theodosius at Constantinople: Rufinus, not satisfied with the confalar dignity to which he was rais'd this year, notwithstanding the report of his having been the author of the death of Promotus, killed by the barbarians, began to aspire at the prefecture of the east, which was held by Tatianus, whom he caused to be accused of oppression in his government. Zosimus will have him to have been altogether innocent, and only hated by Rufinus, on account of his integrity. Procclus, the son of Tatianus, and prefect of Constantinople, was accused of the same crime, Rufinus hating him, says Zosimus, for the sake of his father. Theodosius appointed several judges to try them; but as Rufinus was at the head of that commission, and the other judges dreaded his resentment, they were both declared guilty: the father was depo-

ed, and confined to Lycia, his native country; and the son sentenced to death; which Theodosius no sooner knew, than he sent him his pardon: but the messenger, gained over by Rufinus, took care not to acquaint the proper officers with the emperor's order, till the execution was over. Thus Zosimus. But Libanius charges both Tatianus, and his son Proculus, with cruelty and oppression; and the laws enacted on this occasion by Theodosius, give us room to believe, that the charge brought against Tatianus, was not altogether groundless, as Zosimus styles it; for by one law he took off a tax which had been levied by Tatianus, without his knowledge; by another he commanded the estates and effects of such persons as had been proscribed by him, to be restored to them or their children; and by a third addressed to Rufinus, he declared those guilty of death, who, for the future, should be convicted of having plundered the people committed to their care; whereas, by former laws, they were only to pay four times the value of what they had taken. As for Proculus, he must have been guilty of greater crimes than his father, since he was punished with more severity. But however just was the punishment inflicted on Tatianus, his countrymen the Lycians, who had no share in his crimes, ought not to have had any in his disgrace and misfortunes; nevertheless Theodosius, at the instigation of Rufinus, a declared enemy to the Lycians, enacted a law, declaring their whole nation infamous, depriving them of the employments they held at that time, and rendering them for ever incapable of any preferment. This unjust law was afterwards revoked by Arcadius, who restored the Lycians to their former condition, ascribing the base treatment they had met with, not to their demerit, but to the hatred of an execrable man, meaning Rufinus. As Tatianus is highly commended by Zosimus, and persecuted with great cruelty the catholics, while he was governor of Egypt under Valens in 367, some writers from thence conclude him to have been a pagan. He had been comes larginonum to Valens in 374, three times prefect of the eait, and twice confus. He is supposed to have died soon after his disgrace. When he was deposed, Rufinus was appointed prefect of the eait in his room. The affair of Tatianus and Proculus was not yet ended, when news of the death of Valentinian, and the usurpation of Eugenius, was brought to Constantinople. A few days after, embassadors arrived from the usurper, who, without so much as mentioning the name of Arbogastes, demanded an audience in the name of Eugenius; and being admitted to the emperor's presence, proposed an alliance between him and their master. Theodosius received them in a very obliging manner, amused them, says Zosimus, with fair words, and dismissed them loaded with rich presents. At the head of this embassy was one Rufinus, an Athenian, who was attended by several bishops sent by Eugenius to divert the emperor from engaging in a civil war. As Theodosius charged Arbogastes with the murder of Valentinian, the bishops did all that lay in their power to clear him from that false, as they styled it, and groundless asperfion. Rufinus, Theodoret, and Sozomen, tell us, that, upon the departure of the embassadors, Theodosius dispatched the eunuch Eutropius, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the reign of Arcadius, to consult an holy hermit, by name John, by nation an Egyptian, whom the emperor looked upon as an oracle. Eutropius was enjoined to bring him, if possible, to court; but, if he could not prevail upon him to quit his solitude, to ask him, whether he approved of the emperor's attacking Eugenius first? or, if he should wait till the usurper attacked him? The hermit declined going to court, but advised the emperor to begin the war without delay, alluring him, that he would overcome the tyrant, but not without bloodshed; that he would die in Italy, after his victory, and in dying leave his son emperor of the west. Thus the above-mentioned writers. Theodosius, upon the return of the messenger, began his military preparations; but as he confided more in the assistance of Heaven, than the number of his troops, or the bravery of his generals, he visited in the first place all the churches of his capital, attended by several bishops, and a great crowd of people, imploring with them the favour and protection of the Almighty, who disposes of kingdoms as he thinks fit, and bestows victory on whom he pleases. The military preparations, to which Theodosius applied himself with indefatigable pains, did not divert him from publishing several laws this year, among the rest one condemning such heretics.

Heretics as should confer or receive holy orders, to pay, by way of fine, ten pounds weight of gold, and declaring the places where they should perform any religious ceremony, confiscated. By another law of this year, dated the eighteenth of July, he commands those who should raise disturbances in the church, or impugn the orthodox faith, to be banished, and confined to some desert, if they had been guilty of the same fault before. The law of the eighteenth of October of this year, commands such criminals as should have purloined the public money, and taken sanctuary in churches, to be dragged from thence, and punished, or the bishops who protected them, to pay what they owed. From this law it appears, that the custom of taking sanctuary in churches had already prevailed. Before this time, St. Austin, being solicited either to deliver up a debtor, by name Faccius, who had fled to his church as to an asylum, or to satisfy his creditors, chose the latter. By a law dated the eighth of November, the emperor revived all the antient laws against paganism, forbidding, under the severest penalties, every ceremony of the pagan religion.

The following year Theodosius was consul the third time, with Abundantius, who was, as appears from a law of the preceding year, general both of the horde and foot. In his room Eugenius was acknowledged consul in the west, as we learn from an antient epitaph of this year, in which that usurper is styled the collegue of Theodosius in the consulsip. This year Theodosius published many excellent laws, and among the rest one abrogating an antient law, which punished those with death, who uttered seditious words against the prince. If such words says Theodosius in his law of this year, proceed from levy, they are to be despised; if from folly, to be pitied; if from malice, they are to be forgiven. In the beginning, or, as some will have it, in the end of this year, that is, on the fifteenth of January, or the twentieth of November, the emperor declared his second son Honorius, Augustus. The ceremony was performed with great solemnity in the palace of Hebdon near Constantinople. The poet Claudian introduces on this occasion casion Theodosius instructing the young prince in the art of governing. This year was ended at Constantinople a square, which bore the name of Theodosius; and the following year a wreathed column erected in it, on which were engraven the victories of that prince over the Goths and other barbarians. On the top of the column was an equestrian statue of Theodosius, which was thrown down by an earthquake in the reign of the emperor Zeno; but the column was still standing in the thirteenth century, and is frequently mentioned in history. Theodosius passed this whole year at Constantinople, making the necessary preparations for the dangerous war which he was resolved to undertake. As for Eugenius, he had gained the preceding year considerable advantages over the Franks, being induced to make war upon them by Arbogastes, who bore an old grudge to Marcomir and Sunno, two princes of that nation. This war was managed by Arbogastes, who passing the Rhine near Cologne in the depth of winter, laid waste the countries of the Bructerians and Chamavians, without meeting with the least opposition, Marcomir shewing himself only at a distance on the hills, with some parties of the Angirvari and Chatti. Hence it appears, that these antient nations of Germany were at this time comprised under the name of Franks. Eugenius himself approached the Rhine, at the head of a very numerous and powerful army; and having, upon the return of Arbogastes, renewed the antient alliance between the Romans and Franks, he left Gaul, and repaired to Italy; which he had scarce entered, when he was met by a deputation from the Roman senate, entreating him to restore to the temples the revenues, of which they had been deprived by Gratian, and to re-establish the celebrated altar of Victory. Eugenius received them in a very obliging manner; but could not be prevailed upon to comply with their request. The senate soon after sent a second deputation to solicit the same favour; which was denied them a second time. But when by a third embassy they renewed their request, Eugenius yielded at length to their importunity, restoring the pagan religion and temples to their former lustre, and suffering the antient ceremonies and sacrifices to be renewed in the senate of the metropolis of his empire. The following year year 394, Arcadius being confin the third time, and Honorius the second, Theodosius was still at Constantinople on the fifteenth of May; but he left that metropolis soon after; for he was on the thirtieth of the same month, at Heraclea; and on the fifteenth of June at Adrianople. He bent his march through Dacia, and the other provinces between Thrace and the Julian Alps, which separate Italy, from Noricum, with a design to force the passes of those mountains, and break into Italy, before the army of Eugenius was in a condition to oppose him. Upon his arrival at the Alps, he found the passes guarded by Flavius prefect of Italy, at the head of a considerable body of Roman troops, who, after a short resistance, betook themselves to flight. Flavius was killed at the first onset. Theodosius, having thus opened himself a passage over the Alps, was met, as he came down from those mountains, by Eugenius, at the head of a very numerous army, drawn up in battle-array on the banks of the river Frigidum; which Sanfon and others take to be the river Vipao or Wiback in the county of Gorice, about thirty-six miles from Aquileia. The army of Theodosius was no less numerous than that of the enemy, being reinforced by several bodies of Armenians, Iberians, Arabians, Goths, and other barbarians, who dwelt beyond the Danube. The Roman troops were commanded by Timasius and Stilicho, who had married the emperor’s niece; and the foreign auxiliaries by Gainas, Saul, Bacurius, and Alaric the Goth, whose name is famous in history. Of Gainas, who was of the same nation, and Saul, who was likewise a barbarian, we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the reigns of Arcadius and Honorius. Bacurius was a native of Armenia, or, as Rufinus will have it, of Iberia; nay, he is styled by that writer king of Iberia. Among the Romans he was comes domesticorum, that is, captain of the guards, and universally esteemed, not only for his courage and experience in war, but for the mildness of his temper, his affability and good-nature to all, even to his enemies. Rufinus, the ecclesiastic historian, who lived in great intimacy with him while he was duke of Palestine, calls him a man of great integrity, a pious and zealous christian, a worthy companion of Theodosius, a man endowed with every good quality of the mind, and by few equalled in the perfections of his body. these leaders, the army of Theodorus advanced into the plain; but the emperor, unwilling to expose the Romans, ordered the foreign auxiliaries to begin the action, which they did with great vigour and resolution; but were soon put in disorder by the regular and well disciplined troops of Eugenius, headed by Arbogastes, who signalized himself in a very eminent manner. Bacurus however, having rallied the barbarians, led them back to the charge; and being supported by Timasius and Stilicho, renewed the combat, which lasted till night coming on, both armies retired to their respective camps. Bacurus on this occasion distinguished himself above all the other commanders, killed great numbers of the enemy with his own hand; but being in the end surrounded on all sides, he was cut in pieces, after having defended himself for a long time with incredible bravery. Of the Goths and other auxiliaries above ten thousand were killed; but of the Romans, who supported them, only a small number. Eugenius, concluding that he had gained the day, and that the army of Theodorus was utterly defeated, gave his men leave to retire to their tents, and refresh themselves, that they might be the better able to pursue the enemy next morning. In the mean time Theodorus was advised by his generals not to hazard a second engagement, but to retire in the night, repass the Alps, and put off the decision of the war till another campaign; against which time he might with great ease recruit his army, and renew the war with fresh vigour. But the emperor, without giving ear to their remonstrances, having assembled his troops by break of day, led them in person against the enemy; and entering their camp when least expected, put great numbers of them to the sword, and obliged the rest to save themselves by a precipitous and disorderly flight. Thus Zosimus. But the ecclesiastic historians ascribe the victory gained by Theodorus, not to any surprize, but to the prayers of the emperor, and to the miraculous assistance of St. John the evangelist, and the apostle St. Philip, who appearing to him in the night, encouraged him to renew the fight early next morning, and assured him of victory. The same writers add, that Theodosius no sooner attacked Eugenius's numerous forces, than a violent storm arising, and blowing full in the enemy's faces, turned their arrows and javelins back upon themselves, and raised such clouds of dust, as quite deprived them of their sight; so that having two enemies to encounter at once, they

they were quickly overcome. Of this storm mention is made by Theodoret, Orosius, Sozomen, St. Ambrose, Rufinus, St. Auffin, and the poet Claudian, who describes it with great elegance in some verses which he wrote eighteen months after; but to flatter Honorius, will have it to have been owing to his deity. Arbogastes behaved on this occasion with great intrepidity; but, in spite of his utmost efforts, his men, quite disheartened, and concluding, from the extraordinary violence of the storm, that Heaven fought against them, either betook themselves to flight, or, throwing down their arms, submitted to Theodosius, who readily received them into favour; but at the same time commanded them to apprehend, and deliver up to him, the usurper. They no sooner received this order, than they flew to the rising ground where Eugenius had posted himself to behold the battle, and was still waiting the event of it. When he observed them coming in great haste towards him, he concluded they brought him news of the victory. As they approached, he asked them, whether they had, pursuant to his orders, secured Theodosius. They answered, that they despised the commands of a tyrant and usurper, whom they were come to seize, and deliver up to their lawful sovereign; and loading him that instant with irons, dragged him, stripped of all the ensigns of majesty, to the emperor, who reproached him with the murder of Valentinian, with the calamities he had brought upon the empire by his unjust usurpation, and with putting his confidence in Hercules, in defiance of the only true God; for on his chief standard he had displayed the image of that fabulous deity. Eugenius begged earnestly for his life; but while he lay prostrate at the emperor’s feet, his own soldiers struck off his head, and carrying it about on the point of a spear, showed it to those who, remaining in his camp, had not yet submitted to Theodosius. At that fight they were all thunderstruck; but being at the same time informed, that Theodosius was ready to receive them into favour, they threw down their arms and submitted. Arbogastes, the chief author of the death of Valentinian, and the evils attending it, despairing of pardon, fled to the mountains; but being apprised that diligent search was made after him, he laid violent hands on himself. The children of Eugenius and Arbogastes, who had attended their parents in this war, having great reason to expect the same treatment, took sanctuary in different churches; but the pious emperor, not satisfied with pardoning them, laid hold of that opportunity to convert them from paganism, which they professed, to the Christian religion, appointing proper persons to instruct them, and convince them of their errors; which they had no sooner renounced, than he took them under his protection, put them in possession of their paternal estates, and raised them to considerable employments. Great numbers of the partizans of Eugenius having fled for refuge to the great church of Milan, St. Ambrose repaired to Aquileia, where the emperor then was, to solicit their pardon; which was immediately granted, and a general amnesty proclaimed; nay, the emperor is said to have been so concerned for the blood that was shed in the battle, as to abstain for some time from the holy eucharist. He probably followed therein the directions of St. Ambrose, at least his conduct was agreeable to the sentiments of that prelate, who, in speaking of judges, says, That thou does not deny them, as many have done, the holy eucharist, after they have sentenced criminals to death, yet he approves of their abstaining for some time of their own accord from the holy mysteries. The emperor, immediately after his victory over Eugenius, sent for his son Honorius, whom he had left at Constantinople, under the care of Rufinus, who was thereby vested with almost an unlimited power. Before the arrival of the young prince, Theodosius had removed from Aquileia to Milan, where he received him and Serena, who came with him, in the great church, and committed them both to the care of St. Ambrose. Serena was daughter to Honorius, the emperor’s brother. A few days after he declared his son Honorius emperor of the west, assigning him for his share, Italy, Gaul, Spain, Britain, Africa, and West Illyricum, and appointing Stilicho his first general and prime prime minister. With this declaration he sent Stilicho to Rome; on which occasion Serena, whom Theodosius had married to that general, and who accompanied her husband to Rome, shewed a great desire, says Zosimus, to see the statue of Cybele; but she was no sooner admitted into the temple, than she snatched from the goddess a necklace of inestimable value, saying it became better the niece of an emperor, than a faneless statue. An old vestal, who was present, transported with a blind zeal, could not forbear uttering dreadful imprecations against Serena, her husband, and her children; but Serena caused her to be driven out of the temple, and punished for her arrogance. At the same time her husband Stilicho commanded the thick plate of gold, with which the gates of Jupiter Capitoline were covered, to be taken off, and conveyed to his lodging. Under the plate were found engraved on the wood these words: This is reserved for an unhappy king. Thus Zosimus, who ridiculously ascribes to these two actions, the misfortunes which afterwards befell Stilicho and Serena. The Roman senate sent deputies to congratulate Theodosius on his late victory, and to beg the confuslship of the ensuing year for the two brothers Olybrius and Probinus. The emperor granted them their request, exhorting them at the same time with great zeal to renounce the errors in which they had been brought up, and yield to the force of that truth, which now generally prevailed. Zosimus, who seldom agrees with other writers, supposes Theodosius to have gone in person to Rome, to have summoned to the imperial palace all the senators, who still continued attached to the antient ceremonies of the Romans, and to have exhorted them to get the better of the prejudice of their education, and renouncing the superstitious worship of the gods, to embrace the christian religion, which alone could deliver them from their sins. But not one, continues that writer, could be prevailed upon to abandon the religion and ceremonies with which Rome had been founded, and had subsisted near twelve hundred years. Hereupon the emperor declared, that as the exchequer had been drained by the late war, he could spare no money for the ceremonies of their religion; which he therefore declared unlawful, and utterly suppressed. He had before enacted several laws for the suppression of idolatry; but Eugenius had revoked them, and restored to the temples their privileges and revenues. This year is remarkable for dreadful earthquakes, which were felt almost almost every day in most provinces of the empire, from the beginning of September to the end of November; for excessive and incessant rains, which laid whole countries under water; and such a darkness as had not happened in the memory of man: all which the writers of those times seem to have looked upon as prognostics of the great loss the Roman empire was to sustain in the approaching death of the great Theodosius.

The next consuls were the two brothers Anicius Hermogenianus Olybrius and Anicius Probinus, the sons of Petronius Probus and Anicia Proba, on whose consulate Claudian wrote a poem. Theodosius, having restored the west to its former tranquillity, was preparing to return to Constantinople, when he was seized with a dropsy, occasioned by the great fatigues he had undergone in the late war. As soon as he perceived himself to be in danger, he made his will, by which he divided the empire, bequeathing the east to his eldest son Arcadius, and the west to Honorius. He likewise confirmed the pardon which he had granted to all those who had borne arms against him, and remitted a tribute, which had proved very burdensome to the people, charging his sons and successors to see his will duly executed as to these two points.

Socrates and Sozomen write, that finding himself in great measure eased of his pain, he assisted at a chariot-race; but his distemper returning with great violence, he appointed one of his sons to preside at the sports in his room; and withdrawing to his chamber, died the following night. He was heard a few minutes before he expired to utter the name of St. Ambrose. He died at Milan on the seventeenth of January of this year 395, two days before he had ended the sixteenth year of his reign, being then at most in the fiftieth year of his age. St. Ambrose pronounced his funeral oration, in which he supposes him to enjoy the rewards promised in the gospel to a religious and virtuous life. His body was embalmed, and conveyed from Milan to Constantinople, where it was interred by Arcadius with extraordinary pomp and magnificence on the ninth of November of the present year. A tomb of porphyry was to be seen many ages after.
ter, supposed to be that of Theodosius. It stood in the mausoleum of Constantine the Great, near the church of the apostles

As for the character of Theodosius, all authors, whether pagan or Christian, Zosimus alone excepted, agree that he was endowed in an eminent degree with every virtue becoming a prince, without the allay of one single vice. Not to mention the ecclesiastical historians, and the two great luminaries of the church, St. Ambrose and St. Austin, who may perhaps be thought prejudiced in his favour, as he was a most zealous patron of the orthodox faith, Themistius, Symmachus, Pacatus, and Victor the younger, though greatly attached to the ancient religion of the Romans, which Theodosius discountenanced above all his predecessors, and made it his chief study utterly to suppress, propose him as the pattern of an excellent prince, the eminent virtues that shone in him overcoming the prejudice, which his zeal for the Christian religion, and aversion to the superstitious ceremonies, of the pagans, raised against him among those, who, in spite of his utmost endeavours, continued obstinate in their errors. The testimony of those writers, who had no less reason to be prejudiced against Theodosius than Zosimus, and who lived in those times, must be of far greater weight with every impartial reader, than the invectives of that historian, who lived an hundred years after. Theodosius was, as we have hinted above out of Aurelius Victor, naturally choleric, and apt in the first transports of his passion, to issue such orders as favoured of cruelty. But as he was soon appeased, we have but one instance of their being put in execution before he had time to revoke them; namely, the famous massacre of the inhabitants of Thessalonica, who had murdered in an insurrection Botericus, the emperor's lieutenant in Illyricum, because he refused to set at liberty a chariot-driver, who had been imprisoned for offering violence to a woman of some distinction. When this came to the emperor's ears, he ordered all those who had been anyways concerned in the murder or riot, to be put to death; but at the intercession of St. Ambrose, and other bishops assembled in a synod at Milan, where the emperor then was, he revoked his orders, and pardoned them. Some time after, his ministers representing to him, that the Thessalonians had been encouraged to this sedition by the too great indulgence he had shewn to the inhabitants of Antioch; and that if he suffered the murder of his lieutenant to go unpunished,

punished, his officers for the future would be in continual danger of their lives, and he himself disturbed and alarmed with daily insurrections; his wrath was kindled anew to such a degree, that forgetful of the promise he had made to St. Ambrose, he immediately ordered a body of troops to march to Thessalonica, and revenge on the inhabitants the death of his lieutenant. The soldiery, entering the city, pursuant to their orders, surrounded the people, while they were assembled to behold the Circenian games; and falling upon them sword in hand, without regard to sex, age, or condition, without distinction of guilty or innocent, cruelly massacred in the space of three hours above seven thousand persons, many of whom were strangers come to Thessalonica on occasion of the sports. When news of this massacre was brought to Milan, St. Ambrose wrote to the emperor, who had left that city some time before, upbraiding him with his cruelty, representing to him the enormity of his crime, and exhorting him to atone for it by a sincere submission and repentance. This the emperor took in good part; and returning a few days after to Milan, repaired, according to his custom, to the great church, to perform his devotions there. But St. Ambrose, meeting him at the door, denied him entrance, telling him, that he was cut off from the communion of the faithful, and unworthy to appear amongst them, till he had expiated so public a crime by as public a repentance. To this the emperor readily submitted; and returning to the palace with tears in his eyes, performed with great humility all the duties of an open penance, as enjoined by the canons of the church, and the custom of those times. He continued in that state for the space of eight months, that is, from the latter end of April to Christmas, when, to make some amends for his crime, and to prevent both himself and his succours from being guilty of the like cruelty for the future, he enacted a law, or rather enforced the observance of an antient law, by which all criminals were to have a respite of thirty days allowed them between the pronouncing of the sentence of death and their execution. It is surprising, that Zosimus, who omits no opportunity of railing at Theodosius, and often censures even the most commendable actions of that prince, should take no notice of the above mentioned massacre. The reader will find in the

the ecclesiastic writers other instances of the emperor's entire submission to the ordinances of the church, of his piety, self-denial, and other Christian virtues, in which he far excelled all the princes who had reigned before him. Of the writers who flourished in his reign, we shall speak in note (M).

C H A P. 28.

(M) Among the writers, who flourished under Theodosius, the celebrated orator Symmachus deserves, both on account of his birth and eloquence, to be mentioned in the first place. He was the son of L. Aurelius Avianus Symmachus, prefect of Rome in 364 (1). He is styled at the head of his letters, by Macrobius (2), and in an antient inscription, Q. Aurelius Symmachus (3). He had at least three brothers, who were all dead before the year 389 (4). Of these Celsinus Ticianus, whom in all his letters he styles brother (5), seems to have been one. He distinguishes Flavianus, who was prefect of Italy, and joined Eugenius, in whose cause he lost his life, with the same title (6); but most writers are of opinion, that he was no ways allied to him. Symmachus married Rufliciana, the daughter of Orfites, who was for many years prefect of Rome under Constanctius, and had by her one son, named Q. Fabius Memmius Symmachus (7). Orfites, his father-in-law was accused in 364, and convicted of having embezzled the public money; for which crime his estate was confiscated, and he banished; but he was recalled in 366, when part of his estate was restored to him, but nevertheless he died very poor about the year 370, leaving two daughters behind him, viz. Rufliciana, and another, who was married to a peron of distinction in Hetruria (8). Though Symmachus had no fortune with his wife, yet he was reckoned among the wealthy senators (9). He was high pontiff of the pagans, questor, praetor, corrector or governor of Lucania and Bruttium in 365, and 368, proconsul of Africa in 370, and 373, prefect of Rome in 384, and consul in 391 (10). He is styled in an antient inscription count of the third order (11). He was a most zealous patron of idolatry, and on that account banished by Theodosius, but soon after recalled, as we have observed already. He brought up his son with

with extraordinary care, and seems to have taken upon himself to instruct him (12). Being invited by Theodosius, with whom he lived in great intimacy, to come to Milan, and assent at the solemnity of his confuslhip in 399, he excused himself, alledgeing, that he could not leave his son (13). His son was made by his interest, first quaestor and afterwards praetor (14), quaestor about the year 392, and praetor in 397. The latter dignity cost him two thousand pounds weight of gold (15), and he would have spent on that occasion a far greater sum, had he not been restrained by Stilicho, who at that time ruled under Honorius (16). Young Symmachus was proconsul of Africa in 415, and prefect of Rome in 419 (17). In the date of a law of the year 424, he is marked consulf (18); but most writers take that to be a mistake. He married, after the year 394, the grand-daughter of Flavianus, and had by her a son before the death of his father (19). He wrote some epigrams on illustrious men, and several letters, which are to be found among those of his father, who submitted his own compositions to the censure and judgment of his son (20). Symmachus, the father, was esteemed the most eloquent orator of his time; but his speeches not meeting with the applause he expected, he applied himself entirely to the writing of letters (21). His speeches have been long since lost; but his letters have reached our times, and are divided into ten books. They were carefully preserved by his amanuensis, and one of his friends, named Elpidius, and published after his death by his son (22). Prudentius, who wrote against him, while he was still living, on occasion of his endeavouring to persuade the emperor to restore the altar of victory, extols his eloquence, and compares it to a golden spade made use of to dig up ordure (23). Macrobius compares his elegant and florid style, as he terms it, to that of Pliny the younger, and equals him in that respect to the best writers of antiquity (24). Apollinaris Sidonius and Cassiodorus admire his eloquence, and the purity of his style (25). Both these writers quote some passages out of him, which are not to be found in any of his works that have reached our times (26). Socrates (27), Photius (28), and Jornandes (29), mention him.

him with great encomiums. And truly the turn and brevity of his letters is not without some elegance; but the same thoughts, tho', generally speaking, common and obvious, are often repeated; and his style favours much of the barbarity of the age in which he lived. Jornandes quotes the fifth book of the history of Symmachus; but as it does not appear, that either Symmachus the orator, or his son, ever wrote any history, most authors take the historian quoted by Jornandes to be different from both (30).

The Latin poet Rufus Feslus Avienus is supposed to have flourished under Theodosius, because he inscribed a work to Probus, a confidant man, whom most writers take to be the celebrated Probus, who died not long before the year 395 (31). St Jerom, in his comments on the epistle to Titus, writes, that the phenomena of Aratus had been lately translated by Avienus (32); which work, together with his translation of Dionysius's description of the world, and a third poem by the same author on the sea coats, has reached our times. To the same Avienus or Avianus are generally ascribed the fables of Æsop in Latin verse, and the whole history of Livy in Iambics; but the latter laborious performance which is mentioned by Servius, has been long since lost (33). Some other poetical pieces done by the same author are still extant. He writes with more taste and elegance than could be expected from one of the age he lived in; but his fables are not to compare to those of Phaedrus (34). Rufus Feslus, who was proconsul of Achaia under Valens, is thought to have been his son (35). Victor the historian, who closes his history with a kind of panegyric on Theodosius, is thought to have lived in his time, and to have wrote soon after the death of that prince (36). The name of Sextus Aurelius Victor is common to him with another historian, who flourished in the reign of the emperor Valens; but from him he is distinguished by the surname of junior or the younger: in several manuscripts he is styled Victorious or Victorius, and under both these names he is quoted by Paulus Diaconus (37). He wrote the Roman history; but what has reached our times is but an abridgment of his work, and hence called Victor's epitome (38). Gregory of Tours quotes several things concerning the Franks out of an historian named Sulpicius Alexander (39), whom Gothsredus commends as an excellent writer, and supposes to be the same fame Alexander to whom Symmachus wrote several letters; from which it appears, that he was governor of a province, and was raised by Valentinian II about the year 387, to the post of tribune and secretary (40). Some writers are of opinion, that the Latin poet Manilus, who wrote on astrology, flourished under Theodosius, or his son Honorius; but from several passages in that poem, especially from the last verses of the first book, Extremas modo per gentes, &c. most critics conclude him to have lived in the time of Augustus, and to have written soon after the defeat of Varus (41). The notitia, or state of the provinces of the empire, published by Surita with the itinerary of Antoninus, is supposed to have been written in the time of Theodosius; for mention is made there of the provinces of Arcania in Egypt, and Honorius in Pontus, so styled from that prince's two sons, and no notice is taken of several other provinces formed by Arcadius after the death of his father (42). The five books of Flavius Vegetius Renatus on the military art, are addressed to the emperor, by whose order the author undertook that work (43). But that prince is sometimes named Valentinian, and sometimes Theodosius (44). All we know for certain is, that he wrote after the death of Gratian, and not long after the ravages committed by the Goths in that prince's reign, which he ascribes to his having suffered the infantry to lay aside their cuirasses and helmets (45). Vegetius is distinguished with the title of comes or count, and even with the epithet of illustrious. He is commonly blamed for confounding the customs and regulations of the antients with those of his time.

The Philosopher Themistius flourished under Theodosius, and was no less esteemed by the Greeks than Symmachus by the Latins. He was sprung from a noble family, and one of his ancestors, a philosopher by profession, had been distinguished with several honours by Diocletian (46); perhaps his father Eugenius, who was no less famous for the profession of philosophy than for his eloquence and learning (47). Amongst the letters of the emperor Julian, there is one to a philosopher by name Eugenius (48); whom some take to have been the father of Themistius; if so, he must have been too young in Diocletian's time to be raised to any public employment. From his elogium, written by his son soon after his death, it appears, that he preferred Aristotle to all other philosophers, and that in his old age he used to unbend his mind from the study of philosophy with cultivating tivating his garden (49). Themistius was of the same age with the emperor Constantius (50), born in 317. He was a native of Paphlagonia, and not of Constantinople, tho' he spent almost his whole life in that city (51). He studied rhetoric at a place on the most distant borders of Pontus and Colchis, near Phasis, a city of Colchis, on a river of the same name, his father having recommended him to a celebrated professor, who taught in that country (52), and under whom he made such progress, that he was surnamed Euphradus or the fine speaker (53). Gregory Nazianzen styles him the king of eloquence and adds, that he ex-celed in every thing, but most of all in the art of speaking (54).

When he was yet very young, he wrote comments on Aristotle for his own private use; but nevertheless they were published and met with great applause (55). His comments on Aristotle, and his notes on Plato, were still extant in the time of Photius, who styles them an useful work (56). The author of the book on the categories or predicaments, falsely ascribed to St. Austin, owns, that, in compiling that work, he had often recourse to Themistus, a great and wise philosopher of his time (57). Some fragments of the comments of Themistius on Aristotle are still extant (58); and Stobaeus quotes a passage out of that work concerning the immortality of the soul. When he had ended his studies, he went to Constantinople, and resided there for the space of at least forty years (60). He first taught philosophy, viz. that of Pythagoras, of Plato, and of Aristotle; but made most account of the latter (61). He had an incredible number of disciples, and a philosopher of Sicyon in Peloponnesus, who had studied under lamblichsus, sent him all his at once (62). He taught gratis; nay, he assisted his disciples with money so far as his small estate would allow him; and thence he rejected the name of sophist, pretending it ought to be given only to mercenary teachers (63). After he had taught some time at Constantinople, he went first to the court of Constantius, before whom he pronounced his first oration at Ancyræ in 347, having been introduced to that prince by Saturnius who was confid in 383 (64). Not long after, that is, before the year 350, he saw Constans in the west (65). In the year 355, Constans created him senator of Constanti-ople, and wrote a letter in his commendation to the senate of that city (66). Two years after, that prince caused a statue to be esrected to his honour (67). Julian wrote frequently to him in the time of his disgrace; and being created Caesar, answered by a long letter that which Themistius had wrote to him from Constantinople, encouraging him to answer the mighty expectations the world entertained of him (68). Upon the accession of Jovian to the empire, Themistius was sent to the new prince by the senate of Constantinople, to congratulate him in their name; on which occasion he pronounced, or design'd to pronounce, the or-eration which has reached our times (69), with several discourses pronounced by him before Valens, who would hear him at least once every year (70). He was with that prince in 369, when he concluded a peace with the Goths, to which the philosopher pretends to have greatly contributed (71). He attended Valens into the east, and in the Persian war in 372 (72). Socrates and Sozomen write, that he reconciled in some degree that prince to the catholics by a speech, which he pronounced before him, shew-ing, he ought not to be surpris'd at the different opinions of men in points of religion, but on the contrary allow them great liberty (73). In the year 376, he was sent by Valens to Gratia-, and in Gaul. As on his return he passed through Rome, the inhabitants of that metropolis earnestly pressed him to continue there and teach philosophy, but could not by any offers prevail upon him to accept that office; so that after a short stay in their city, he returned to Constantinople (74). Theodosius raised him in 384, to the dignity of prefect of Constantinople, and once had some thoughts of committing to his care the education of his son Arcadius (75). He wrote several discourses in praise of that prince before the year 385, but as none of his orations are thought to be posterior to that year, he is supposed to have died soon after.

All the emperors who reigned in his time, shewed him great res-pct, and distinguished him above all the other philosophers. Of his orations thirty three have reached our times, comprising one in the Latin tongue, which several critics suppose not to be his.
In Photius's time they were in all thirty six, and among them one addressed to Valentinian II. which since his time has been lost (76). Photius commends his style as grave, and at the same time florid and elegant (77). He declares himself in many places an enemy to flattery; but nevertheless commends all the emperors alike, and bestows as great encomiums upon Valens, as upon Theodosius. A poet, by name Palladius, charges him with ambitiously aspiring at the dignity of prefect, notwithstanding his pretended contempt of grandeur and honours (78). When Palladius lived we know not. Themistius’s thirteenth oration is altogether unworthy of a man of his character. Some writers will have him to have been an heretic, confounding him with one Eutychianus, who lived in the sixth century; but it is evident from his writings, that he professed paganism, tho’ he was not perhaps such a fanatic as Libanius or Eunapius. Gregory Nazianzen, who admired his eloquence, wrote two letters to him recommending several persons to his protection (79).

Eunapius, who wrote the lives of the foppists of the fourth century, was a native of Sardes, the metropolis of Lydia; but studied at Athens for the space of five years, under Procratus, of whom we have spoken elsewhere, professor of eloquence in that city. He returned afterwards to Lydia, and there taught rhetoric. He applied himself likewise to the study of physic, and to that of magic, under Chrysanthus, who had married his cousin. He was initiated in the mysteries of Eleusinia, and blindly attached to all the ceremonies of the pagan superstitition (80). By Chrysanthus he was induced to write the lives of the foppists; which work he begins with the life of Plotinus, who flourished in the middle of the third century. From Plotinus he proceeds to the lives of Porphyrius, of Iamblichus, and his disciples, who were all addicted to the study of magic, as evidently appears from the account he gives us of them (81). He mentions the ravages committed in Greece by Alaric in 395 and 396, whence it is plain, that he did not put the last hand to his work till the latter end of the fourth century. He wrote the history of the emperors, which consisted of fourteen books and extended from the beginning of the reign of Claudius, the successor of Gallienus, where the history of Dexippus ended, to the death of Eudoxia, the wife of Arcadius; that is, from the year 258, to 404 (82). His life of the emperor Julian was rather a panegyrick, than a history (83). Some fragments of this history are still to be found in Suidas (84), and in the abridgments of Constantine Porphyrogenitus on embassies. Vossius writes, that the entire history of Eunapius is lodged in the public library of Venice (85). The history of Zosimus is but an abridgment of that of Eunapius (86). They were both declared enemies to all christian princes, especially to Confantine the Great, tho' Eunapius retrenched, in the second edition of his work, most of the invectives against the christians, which he had inferred in the first (87). In his lives of the sophists, he betrays the same prejudice against the christian religion, and in several places in-weighs with great bitterness against the monks. Photius commends his style as elegant, concise, and expressive; but finds fault with his endleis metaphors, which better suit an orator than an histori-arian (88). In the lives of the sophists, his style is often obscure, and not easily understood, which has led severable writers into gross mistakes (89). He frequently disagrees with the historians of his own time; nay with those who were eye-witnesses of the events they relate. The two philosophers, Pappus and Theo, flourished at Alexandria, in the reign of Theodosius, the former wrote a general description of the earth, a treatise on the rivers of Lydia, and some other books on different subjects (90). Theo, or Theon, belonged to the musem, says Suidas (91); that is, to the society of learned men who composed the academy of Alex-andria. He wrote a book on the overflowing of the Nile, and others on mathematics, arithmetic, astrology, on Ptolemy's can-non and on other subjects (92). Dodwel publified a fragment of Theo of Alexandria on Ptolemy's canon, with a book of fatti, which he supposes to have been done by the same writer (93).

C H A P. XXIX.

The Roman history from the death of Theodosius the Great, to the taking of Rome the first time by the Goths.

THEODOSIUS divided, as we have observed a-bove, the empire at his death between his two sons Arcadius and Honorius; but as they were too young to govern of themselves, Arcadius being but eighteen years old, and Honorius not yet eleven, he committed the former to the care of Rufinus, and the latter to that of Stilicho, Stilicho. Rufinus was a native of Eause in Gascony, and not of Eusa in Bosphorus, as some have imagined, misled by the authority of Tiro Prosper. He appeared first at court in the reign of Theodosius, who, being taken with his uncommon address, and extraordinary qualities, raised him, about the year 390, to the post of magister officiorum, to the consular dignity in 392, and the same year to that of prefect of the east, leaving him at Constantinople vested with almost an absolute and unlimited power, when he set out for the west in 394, to make war on Eugenius. Rufinus was well-shaped in his person, tall, of a graceful mien, and sprightly genius. He professed the Christian religion, and was baptized in 394, on occasion of the solemn consecration of a church, which he had built, together with a palace, near Chalcedon. He could never have gained the esteem and confidence of Theodosius, without the appearance, at least, of piety, joined to his uncommon talents. St. Ambrose ranked him among his friends, and was glad to see him preferred. He lived in great intimacy with Symmachus, if the last letters of that writer's third book are, as they are commonly thought, addressed to him. In those letters Symmachus commends his lively genius, his eloquence, and the delicacy of his raillery. He likewise extols his virtue, his sincerity, and disinterestedness, and the penetration of Theodosius in choosing so worthy a minister. But the same writer blames him more after his death, than he had flattered him in his life-time. Claudian charges him with avarice, ambition, cruelty, perfidiousness, and all the crimes and evil qualities, of which human nature is capable. Suidas and Zosimus speak of him as a great dissimulor, and one who trampled under foot all laws, both human and divine, when they stood in the way of his unbounded ambition and insatiable avarice. St Jerom likewise charges him with avarice; Orosius, Philostorgius, and Marcellinus in his chronicle, with having stirred up the barbarians against the empire, in order to raise himself, in that confusion of affairs, to the sovereignty. St. Ambrose reproaches him in Theodoret as the author of the massacre of the inhabitants of Thessalonica. Zosimus ascribes to his treachery the death of Promotus, killed by the barbarians in 391, and the downfall and misfortunes of Tatinus and his son Proculus, in 392. But other writers question the innocence both of the father and son, as we have already observed. Stilicho, who ruled with no less absolute sway in the west under Honorius, than Rufinus did in the east under Arcadius, was originally a Vandal, whence he is styled by St. Jerome a demi-barbarian. Claudian, who was no less baffled in his favour, than prejudiced against his rival Rufinus, mentions none of his ancestors, besides his father, who had a considerable command in the army under Valens. Stilicho himself bore arms from his childhood, and rose by degrees to the post of magister utriusque militiae, that is, of general both of the horse and foot. He commanded the Roman troops, according to Zosimus, for the space of twenty-three years; that is, from 385, to 408; and attended Theodosius in all his wars. That prince must have entertained a great opinion of him, since he preferred him to all those who courted his niece Serena, whom he had adopted after the death of her father Honorius. By her Stilicho had a son, named Eucherius, born at Rome in 389, while Theodosius was in that city, and two daughters, Maria and Thermantia, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the sequel of our history. Theodosius would not have honoured Stilicho with his alliance, had he not professed the christian religion; but as he is more commended by the pagan than christian writers, and his son Eucherius openly declared himself against christianity, we cannot, upon the bare testimony of Baronius, believe him to have been, not only a zealous, but a pious, christian. Zosimus writes, that, during the twenty-three years he commanded the Roman armies, he never sold any military employments, or deprived the soldiers, as others had done to enrich themselves, of the least share of their pay. The same writer extols his moderation, in not preferring his son Eucherius to any considerable employments, tho' he had a just title to the first in the state.

Chap. 29. The Roman History.

But other writers charge him even with a design of raising his son to the empire, and deposing his lawful sovereign Honorius, his ward and his son-in-law; for that prince married successively both Stilicho's daughters. Zosimus endeavours to clear him from this charge; but at the same time owns him to have been in the highest degree corrupt and partial in the administration of justice; to have countenanced those who plundered the provinces, provided they shared with him the spoils; and to have in a short time acquired, by the most unlawful means, immense riches. We read the same thing in Suidas, who seems to have copied it from Eunapius.

To resume now the thread of our history: Upon the death of Theodosius, Arcadius, to whom the eastern provinces had been allotted, repaired immediately to Constantinople, while Honorius continued at Milan, to awe with his presence the barbarians inhabiting the countries bordering on Rhätia, who were said to be in arms, and ready to break into the empire. As Honorius was but a child, and Arcadius a youth, without either parts or experience, both princes bore the bare name of emperors, the whole power being lodged in Rufinus and Stilicho, of whom the former ruled with an absolute sway in the east, and the other in the west. These two ministers agreed, says Zosimus, in plundering the provinces, and impoverishing whole nations, to enrich themselves; but at the same time, jealous of each other's grandeur, neither of them thought himself safe, while his rival continued in power. Stilicho pretended, that Theodosius in dying had committed to his care both princes, and the management of the affairs of both empires; hence looking upon the power which Rufinus enjoyed in the east as a mere usurpation, he was constantly meditating with himself in what manner he might compass his ruin, and engross the whole authority to himself. On the other hand, Rufinus, not satisfied to rule with an absolute sway under Arcadius, began to aspire at the sovereignty; and thinking the readiest way to attain it, was to marry his daughter to the young prince, who, he imagined, would not look upon it as any disparagement to assume his father-in-law for his colleague, he caused overtures concerning this match to be made to him with the utmost secrecy; which, however, soon became the public talk, and heightened the aversion which the people had already con-

ceived against him, on account of his arrogance, avarice, and arbitrary proceedings. While this affair was on foot, Eucherius, the emperor's uncle, thinking himself ill-used by Lucianus, count of the east, complained of him to Arcadius, who cast the whole blame upon Rufinus, by whose interest he had been raised to that post. Lucianus was the son of Florentius, prefect of Gaul in the latter end of the reign of Constantius; and having purchased the favour of Rufinus, by presenting him with rich possessions, had been recommended by him to the emperor, who thereupon made him count of the east, in which office he is said to have acquitted himself with the greatest justice, moderation, and integrity; insomuch, that he refused even to comply with a request of the emperor's uncle, which appeared to him inconsistent with equity. This being misrepresented to Arcadius, Rufinus, instead of protecting one who had purchased his favour at so great a price, left Constantinople, without imparting his design to any one; and hastening to Antioch with a small retinue, entered that city in the dead of the night, caused Lucianus to be apprehended, and when he was brought before his tribunal, commanded him, tho' no one appeared against him, to be beaten with leaden balls fastened to cords, till he expired. This barbarous proceeding highly provoked the inhabitants of Antioch, and Rufinus, to appease them, ordered a magnificent portico to be built, which was deemed the most stately edifice in all Syria. From Antioch Rufinus returned in great haste to Constantinople, pleading himself with the thoughts of his future affinity with the emperor; but, upon his arrival, he found Arcadius immovably determined to marry Eudoxia, who had been proposed to him by the eunuch Eutropius; and accordingly the nuptials were celebrated on the twenty-seventh of April of this year 395, to the great disappointment of Rufinus. Eudoxia was a Frank by nation, the daughter of the famous count and general Bautio, who had been consul in 387, and not of the emperor Gratian, or of the famous general Promotus, as some have advanced without sufficient grounds. As she was a woman of great address, of an haughty and imperious temper, she soon gained an absolute sway over the weak prince her husband.

husband; Some writers have questioned her modesty; but from that charge she is cleared by others, tho' all agree in accusing her of an infatiable avarice, which often prompted her to most flagrant acts of injustice. However, she had some outward appearance of piety, favoured the catholics, shewed great respect to prelates and clergy; and having prevailed upon the emperor in 401, to demolish the temple of Marnas, and other temples at Gaza, the built in that city a most stately and magnificent church, which from her was called Eudoxiana. Hence St. Chrysoftom publicly commended her as the mother of the church, the patroness of the saints, the support of the poor, &c. But the cruel persecution she afterwards raised against her paneysrit, has rendered her name infamous in the history of the church. But to return to Rufinus: That minister found himself disappointed as to the marriage of his daughter, and his alliance with the imperial family; and at the same time dreaded the credit of the eunuch Eutropius, but more the arms of Stilicho, who pretended to have been by Theodosius appointed guardian to both his children, and was preparing to march into the east, to dispossess his rival of the authority he had usurped. In order therefore to defeat the designs of Stilicho, and to have an opportunity of getting rid of Eutropius, and even of seizing the sovereign power, he resolved to set all in a flame, and involve the whole empire in the utmost confusion. With this view he privately stirred up by his emissaries the Hunns, who penetrated as far as Antioch, destroying all with fire and sword, and committing every-where unheard of cruelties. At the same time he encouraged the famous Alaric to put himself at the head of his country-men the Goths, and drawing together as many barbarians of other nations as were willing to follow his standard, to break into Greece, assuring him, that he should meet with no opposition. Alaric at that time commanded a body of Goths in the Roman service; but being dissatisfied that he had been rewarded with no better preferment, since he had distinguished himself in the late war with Eugenius, he readily closed with the proposal of Rufinus; and being by him supplied with large sums, he assembled an incredible number of barbarians of different nations; and putting himself at their head, he ravaged vaged all Thrace, Pannonia, Macedon, and Thessaly. As he drew near the famous straights of Thermopylae, Geron-tius, who guarded them, and was privy to the wicked designs of his patron Rufinus, immediately withdrew, and opened a free passage for the barbarians into Greece, where they raged with incredible fury, putting those to the sword who offered to oppose them, and sending into their respective countries all the women and children that fell into their hands, together with the whole wealth of that opulent province. As Antiochus, at that time proconsul of Achaia, and another of Rufinus's creatures, did not offer to make head against them, they over-ran the whole country, rifling the temples, pillaging the cities, and committing such ravages and devastations, as were felt by the unhappy inhabitants for many years after. The whole country between Dalmatia, the Adriatic gulf, and the Euxine sea, was laid waste, and turned into a desart, the inhabitants concealing themselves in dens and caves, through fear of being either inhumanly murdered, or carried into captivity. The city of Constantinople itself was in a manner besieged, parties of the barbarians advancing with great boldness to the very gates of that metropolis. Rufinus, attired after the Gothic manner, went out, as he said, to treat with them, and was received by the barbarians with extraordinary marks of esteem; which confirmed the suspicion most people entertained of his treachery.

While these things passed in the east, Stilicho was busied on the bank of the Rhine, in renewing the ancient alliances of the Roman people with the Franks, and other German nations. This he accomplished, says Claudian, in less than fourteen days; which Mr. Valois maintains to be absolutely impossible. That writer speaks much at length of Marcomir and Sunno, two princes or chiefs of the Franks in those days, as does likewise Gregory of Tours. Claudian who distinguishes them with the title of kings, and informs us, that they were brothers, says, that they endeavoured to raise new disturbances after the peace concluded with Stilicho; but that one of them, after having been kept some time in prison, was banished into Tuscany; that the other, attempting to revenge the affront offered to his brother, was killed by his own people; and that Honorius appointed other kings kings over the Franks in their room. This seems to have happened, according to Claudian, before the revolt of Gil-do; that is, before the end of the year 397. Valesius writes, that Marcomir outlived Sunno; and consequently that it was he who was banished into Tuscy. He is thought to have been the father of Faramond, supposed to have been the first king of France. Stilicho, having thus renewed the antient treaties with the Franks and Germans, resolved to march to the succour of Greece; in which undertaking he embarqued the more readily, as he hoped to have an opportunity of ruining Rufinus, and getting the whole power of both empires into his own hands. Leaving therefore Gaul about the latter end of the spring, he set forward with all the western troops, and those likewise of the east, that had been left in the west after the defeat of Eugenius. He marched, according to Claudian, over the Alps, no doubt, the Julian-Alps, and consequently through Dalmatia. The barbarians, hearing of his arrival in those parts, resolved to make a stand in Thessaly, and with this view assembled into one body all their troops, that were in several parties dispersed about the country. Stilicho was already within a small distance of the enemy’s army, and his men shewed a great forwardness to engage them, when Rufinus, concluding, that, if the barbarians were overcome and repressed, the storm would fall upon his own head, prevailed upon Arcadius to send for the oriental troops. Accordingly an officer was dispatched to Stilicho, with a peremptory order from the emperor to send them forthwith, and return with the rest into the west. Stilicho was greatly surprized at this order, which, he thought, snatched out of his hands a certain victory, and exposed the empire to imminent danger. However, not daring to dif-obey, he not only sent the troops, but half the treasure which Theodosius had left. In dismissing the forces, he appointed one Gainas, by nation a Goth, and his intimate friend, to conducct them to Constantinople, after having imparted to him his design of dispatching Rufinus, and, no doubt, encouraged him to lay hold of the first opportunity that offered to put it in execution. Under his conduct the army arrived in the neighbourhood of Constantinople on the twenty-seventh of November; and the emperor, according to custom, went out.

out in person to meet them, attended by Rufinus, who, as he had gained over some of the chief officers to proclaim him emperor on this occasion, had already prepared the purple, the diadem, and the donative for the soldiery. The army received the emperor with all the respect due to the son of Theodosius the Great; but at the same time, upon a signal given by Gainas, they fell upon Rufinus, and cut him in pieces, while he was pressing Arcadius to declare him his colleague. This happened, according to Claudian, at the palace of Hebdomon, where the emperors of the east were usually crowned. After his death, they cut off his head, and putting a stone in his mouth to keep it open, they carried it on the point of a spear to Constantinople, where it was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy. They likewise cut off his right hand, and carrying it about the streets of Constantinople, asked alms for the infatigable Rufinus, reduced to beggary. By this invention they collected considerable sums, every one being glad to reward with some small acknowledgement those who had contributed to the death of a person so much abhorred. His estate and all his effects were confiscated; and the decree issued on that occasion was sent to Rome, where the people expressed the greatest joy at the death and deferred end of that infatigable robber, to use the expression of Symmachus, who had plundered the world. His wife and daughter, fearing they should fall a sacrifice to the fury of the people, took sanctuary in a church, whence they were suffered to retire to Jerusalem, where they spent the rest of their days. Palladius bestows great encomiums on Salvia or Silvia, the sister of Rufinus, who had embraced the state of virginity. From a law dated the fifth of August of the ensuing year 396, it appears, that his wife’s fortune was restored to her. Neither Stilicho nor the empire gained any thing by the death of Rufinus, he being succeeded, not only in his power and employments, but in his cruelty, avarice, and other detestable qualities, by the eunuch Eutropius, who had concurred with Stilicho in all his measures against their common rival. Eutropius was by birth an Armenian, by condition a slave, slave, and had been made an eunuch soon after his birth, eunuchs being then more in request, and consequently more advantageous to the seller, than common slaves. He had frequently changed masters, having been often bought and sold. When he was already stricken in years, a soldier, named Ptolemy, gave him as a present to his general Arintheus, who was famous under Valens: Arintheus presented his daughter with him when she was married, to comb her hair, and perform such-like mean offices about her; which when he could no longer discharge on account of his age, he gave him his liberty. Being now his own master, he found means to get into the court, where he was employed in the lowest offices, till he was raised by the interest of Abundantius, who was consul in 392, to a more creditable post. Theodosius sent him in 392, as we read in Sozomen, to consult the holy hermit John in the wilderness of Thebais. That prince seems to have reposed some confidence in him. After the marriage of Arcadius with Eudoxia, he was made, no doubt at her recommendation great chamberlain, and upon the death of Rufinus, vested with the same power and authority which that minister had enjoyed. Rufinus seemed to survive in this wicked eunuch, who was, according to Eunapius, a declared enemy to virtue, and every virtuous man. That writer, after having drawn his portrait in the blackest colours, concludes, that he has not painted him such as he really was, there being no crime with which he might not deservedly charge him. He surpassed in avarice Rufinus himself, exposing to public sale the chief employments, and entertaining an incredible number of informers to accuse such persons as were possessed of estates; by that means he conveyed the whole wealth of the empire into his own coffers: the prisons, and places of banishment, were all filled with unhappy exiles, and stripped their wealth, the only crime for which they had been condemned. As for Arcadius, who was a prince of very slender parts, he suffered himself to be entirely governed by this wicked minister, not daring in a manner to enquire into his conduct, or give ear to those who had the boldness to complain of his arbitrary proceedings. However, by several laws of this year, he confirmed those that had been enacted by by his father against heretics \(^m\); and by one addressed to Marcellus, then magister officiorum, he commanded that officer to enquire with great care whether any employments at court were held by heretics, and not only to dismiss, but to banish such as he should discover in the palace, with those who had recommended them \(^n\). Honorius continued all this year at Milan, or in the neighbourhood of that city, as appears from the dates of his laws.

The next consuls were, Arcadius the fourth time, and Honorius the third. This year Stilicho, who was returned to Italy with the western troops, set out anew with a design to succour Greece, reduced to a most deplorable condition by Alaric, and the barbarians under his command. He embarked on the Adriatic sea; and landing without opposition in Peloponnesus, cut off great numbers of the enemy in various successful encounters; and in the end obliged them to retire to a mountain in Arcadia, named Pholoe, at a small distance from Pisa. There he shut them up on all sides, cut off their communication with the neighbouring country, and even turned the course of the river that supplied them with water \(^o\). But when he had them thus in his power, he suffered them to escape, to retire out of Peloponnesus, and to pillage Epirus in their retreat \(^p\). Orosius supposes him to have connived at their escape, and therefore thinks him no less guilty than Rufinus, who first stirred them up against the empire \(^q\). Zosimus writes, that they owed their safety to the negligence and misconduct of Stilicho \(^r\). But Claudian tells us, that Eutropius, looking upon Stilicho as a more dangerous enemy than Alaric, persuaded Arcadius to conclude a peace with the latter, to take him and the barbarians, who had ravaged the best provinces of the empire, under his protection, and to order Stilicho to withdraw his troops forthwith out of Greece, which belonged to Arcadius. Thus was Stilicho robbed the second time by a jealous rival of the glory of delivering the empire, and triumphing over the barbarians \(^s\). Soon after, Alaric was by Arcadius, or rather by his governor Eutropius, appointed commander of the troops in East-Illyricum, which comprised Greece, as we read in Claudian Claudian (N). As for Stilicho, though he immediately retired with his troops out of Greece, pursuant to the orders of Arcadius, yet that prince, in obedience to the commands of Eutropius, as Zosimus expresses it, caused him to be declared a public enemy by a solemn decree of the senate of Constantinople, ordering at the same time all the lands and palaces he had in the east to be seized and confiscated. Claudian adds, that Stilicho discovered an assassin, who had been hired to murder him, and several letters dispersed among his troops, in order to debauch them, and stir them up against him. Eutropius, not satisfied with having thus defeated all the measures of Stilicho, aspiring at the same post in the court of Arcadius which he held in that of Honorius, resolved to remove all those out of the way, in whom Arcadius seemed to repose any confidence. He began with Abundantius, by whose means he had been first raised at court, and who on that account deferred, according to Claudian, tho' not at his hands, the treatment he met with. Abundantius had served in the army with great reputation in the time of Gratian, and had been raised by Theodosius to the post of general both of the horse and foot, to the praetorship, and in 393, to the consulship of Gratian. But Eutropius, jealous of the authority and credit which his experience, and known integrity, procured him at court, and panting after the immense wealth with which his eminent services had been rewarded, prevailed on the weak prince with his crafty and malicious insinuations, to banish him to Pityus, a city of Bosporus, to the north of the Euxine sea, and beyond Colchis; where he led a miserable life. Eutropius causes Abundantius to be banished.

miserable life, stripped of all his effects, till the death of Eutropius, when he was removed from thence, and confined to Sidon in Phoenicia, in which city he died a. The credit which Timafius had at court, and with the army, gave the wicked minister, who could bear no competitor, more jealously than that of Ambaudianus. He had been long one of the chief commanders of the army, had served Valens and Theodosius in all their wars with great honour and integrity, and been rewarded by the latter in 389, with the consular dignity b. Eutropius, resolving to procure by some means or other the ruin of so powerful a rival, had recourse to one Bargus, who lived in great intimacy with Timafius. Bargus was a person of a mean descent, and had been obliged for some notorious crime to fly from Laodicea in Syria, his native city, and retire to Sardes in Lydia. There Timafius accidentally met him; and being pleased with his facetious conversation, without enquiring farther into his character, admitted him to his confidence, gave him the command of a cohort, and took him with him to Constantinople; at which the magistrates were highly displeased, because he had been formerly banished that city c. To this man, as a proper instrument for his villainous purpose, Eutropius applied, and easily prevailed upon him to betray his friend and benefactor, by accusing him of treason, and producing against him a counterfeit writing, upon which he was without delay brought to his trial. Eutropius persuaded the emperor to judge him in person; but perceiving the people were highly provoked to see a person of Timafius’s dignity and character arraigned upon the deposition of such an infamous and mercenary wretch as Bargus, he advised the prince, whom he managed as he pleased, to withdraw, and substitute Saturninus and Procopius in his room. Of these the former had discharged the chief employments in the state, and the confusilship in 383, but is said to have dishonoured his old age by a general and mean compliance with the will of the ruling minister d. Procopius was son-in-law to the emperor Valens, of a rough and savage temper, but not easily prevailed upon to swerve from what he thought just and equitable, as appeared in this case; for he boldly maintained, that such an infamous wretch as Bargus ought not to be admitted as evidence against a perfon of Timafius’s rank, against against his friend and benefactor. But Saturnius prevailing, the unhappy Timafius was stripped of all his wealth, and banished to Oaasis, a barren and inhospitable place in Libya, from which there was no possible means of escape, it being surrounded by a vast desert, full of sand, which moving to and fro with the wind, suffered no track or footsteps of any former traveller to be seen. Of this place, to which criminals began to be confined about this time, Zosimus gives us, on occasion of the exile of Timafius, a most frightful description. The same historian adds, that a report was spread, that Syagrius, the son of Timafius, accused as privy to the crime of his father, having escaped from those who had been sent to seize him, rescued his father, with the assistance of some robbers, out of the hands of the soldiers, who were conducting him to the place of his exile; and that neither the father nor the son were ever after heard of. Others write, that Timafius was found dead in the sand that surrounded Oaasis, having perhaps attempted to make his escape. St. Jerom, writing in this year 396, says, that Timafius lived then an exile at Asius a city of Aphia. But as Sozomen, Zosimus, and Asterius agree, that he was confined to Oaasis, some, instead of Asius, read, in the text of St. Jerom, Oaasis; while others, to reconcile that writer with the other three, pretend, that he was first banished to Asius, and afterwards, by Eutropius's orders, conveyed to Oaasis. Bargus did not long enjoy the price of his treachery and wickedness; for Eutropius, who was a man of too great discernment to trust a traitor, and well knew, that one who had betrayed his friend and benefactor, would not prove faithful to him, resolved to get rid of him as soon as possible; and accordingly having sent him upon some advantageous commission out of Constantinople, during his absence, he induced his wife, who was then at variance with her husband, to present to the emperor some treasonable papers, which the pretended to have found in his custody. Hereupon Bargus was upon his return arraigned, sentenced to death, and executed. Thus was the crime of that treacherous wretch punished, as it deserved, by the very person who had induced him to commit it. Pentadia, the wife of Timafius, was deaconess. deaconesses of the church of Constantinople in 404, when St. Chrysostom was banished that city: he wrote, while in his exile, several letters to her, in one of which he enquires after her family and relations, and calls her house an house of blessing. It was according to Sozomen, in order to apprehend Pentadia, and some others who had taken sanctuary in the church, that Eutropius persuaded the emperor to enact a law, forbidding any one to fly to the churches for refuge; and commanding those who should, to be dragged from the altars, and punished the more severely. This law raised a general odium against Eutropius: Socrates pretends, that it drew down from heaven all the misfortunes that afterwards befell him: Sozomen and Chrysostom exclaim loudly against it, and observe, that, in a few years after, Eutropius himself was forced to fly to that asylum from which he had excluded others, owning, says Chrysostom, more by his actions than by his words, the injustice of his law. It was revoked immediately after the disgrace and downfall of Eutropius, and erased out of all the public registers. Churches are still held as asylums in Italy, and the two kingdoms of Spain and Portugal, which, not to mention other crimes, is the true cause of many murders committed in those countries. This year, dreadful earthquakes were felt in most provinces of the caft, and the sky, appearing all in a flame over the city of Constantinople, terrified the inhabitants and the emperor himself to such a degree, that abandoning the city, they retired to the fields. It was revealed, as St. Auffin writes to a pious person, that the city of Constantinople was on a certain day to be consumed by fire sent from heaven: when the day came the above-mentioned phenomenon appeared over the city, but vanished some time after, leaving it unhurt, the inhabitants, who had given credit to the prediction, having by a sincere and timely repentance prevented the execution of the sentence pronounced against them. Thus St. Auffin, in a sermon which he preached a few years after, From the several laws of this year, most of which tend to the utter suppression of idolatry, and the curbing of heresies, it appears, that Arcadius continued the whole time at Constantinople, or in the neighbourhood of that city. The law of the twenty-second of March is dated from Regium, which is supposed to have been an imperial palace about fifteen miles from the metropolis. Nothing happened this year in the west worthy worthy of notice, except the conversion of Fritigil, queen of the Marcomans, to the christian religion. At the request of St. Ambrose, who wrote several letters to her, instructing her in the holy mysteries, she is said by Paulinus Diaconus to have introduced the king her husband to enter into an alliance with the Romans: it is certain, that amongst the barbarous nations that in the present reign broke into the empire, no mention is made of the Marcomans. Some misunderstanding arose this year between St. Ambrose and Stilicho, the latter having caused a criminal by name Crefconius, to be apprehended in a church, to which he had fled for refuge: but Stilicho in the end acknowledged his fault, and attoned for it. Honorius continued all this year at Milan, as is evident from the dates of his laws.

The next consuls were Caesarius and Atticus; the for-er had succeeded Rufinus in the prefecture of the east, Eutropius being, as an eunuch, excluded from that office; and the latter had been governor of West Illyricum under Valentinian II, in 384; Caesarius seems to have entered upon his consulship at Constantinople, and Atticus at Rome.
This year 397, Arcadius, leaving Constantinople in the month of July, went to Ancyea, and said there till the latter end of September, when he returned to the metropolis, with as much pomp and show as if he had conquered the Persians, says Claudian, who supposes him to have constantly paused the summer at Ancya, Eutropius diverting him by that progress from applying his mind to affairs of state.
Stilicho still claimed the administration of affairs in the east, and was preparing to march anew into the dominions of Arcadius, in order to make good his claim by force of arms, and revenge on Eutropius the injurious decree issued against him by the senate of Constantinople. But that wicked and crafty minister, not scrupling, for the support of his own power, to kindle a war between the two brothers, privately persuaded Gildo, who commanded the Roman troops in Africa, to revolt from Honorius, and submit to Arcadius, hoping by that means to divert Stilicho from pursuing his intended expedition into the east. Gildo was brother to the famous Firmus, who made war upon the Romans in 373, but was overcome by count Theodosius, the father of the K 2 emperor

emperor of that name. In that war Gildo sired with the Romans, and was afterwards, that is about the year 387, by Valentinian II. or rather by Theodofius, who governed in his name, appointed count of Africa, and commander of all the troops of that province. Theodofius, that he might have, as it were, some pledge of his fidelity, in conferring that dignity upon him, married Salvina, the daughter of Gildo, to Nebridius, nephew by the mother to the empress Flaccilla. St. Jerom, in a letter which he wrote to Salvina about the year 400, styles her a virtuous and truly Christian widow; and at the same time commends the piety of her mother, and her father’s sister, who had embraced the state of virginity. As for Gildo himself, he was, if not by religion, as Marcellinus will have it, at least in his manners, a pagan. Claudian charges him with avarice, cruelty, luxury, and all manner of lewdness, the more shameful and scandalous, as he was already stricken in years. St. Austin speaks of him as one famous for wickedness and debauchery; and in one of his sermons styles him, thou without naming him, a wicked wretch. When Eugenius usurped the empire of the west, Gildo acknowledged Theodofius; but when that prince marched against the usurper in 394, he declined sending him any succours, as other governors of provinces had done in obedience to the emperor’s orders, expecting the issue of the war, as was supposed, in order to join the party that should prevail; insomuch, that Theodofius would have treated him as an open enemy, according to Claudian, had he not been prevented by death. Eutropius having induced him to revolt from Honorius, as we have related above, he obliged most of the cities of Africa and Carthage itself to acknowledge Arcadius, placing such governors in them as he knew were attached to his own interest, with a design of seizing, when an opportunity offered, the provinces for himself, as he had but a very mean opinion of both princes. When news of his revolt was brought to Honorius, he acquainted the senate of Rome with it, who immediately declared Gildo a public enemy, and dispatched a solemn embassy to Arcadius, entreat-

...turing him to restore Africa to its lawful sovereign. Symmachus at the same time wrote to Arcadius, probably by order and in the name of the senate, exhorting him not to quarrel, but to live in friendship and amity, with his brother. In the mean time, a famine began to rage in Rome, Gildo not suffering any corn to be conveyed thither from Africa. Two fleets were therefore equipped with great expedition, the one to be employed against Gildo, and the other in bringing corn and other provisions to Rome from Gaul and Spain. The former failed this year, and, with a seasonable supply, quieted the populace, ready to rise; but the latter could not be equipped till the following year. During these warlike preparations, died the celebrated bishop of Milan St. Ambrose, by no one more regretted than by Stilicho, who, looking upon the death of that prelate as the greatest misfortune that could befall Italy, had, upon the first news of his illness, caused public prayers to be offered for him in all the churches of Milan. Honorius continued this whole year at Milan. Some of his laws are indeed dated from Rome; but that is generally thought to be a mistake. By one of these set up in the square of Trajan on the ninth of March, he forbids the Romans to follow in their dress foreign fashions, for it is to be observed, that the Romans, by conversing familiarly with the Goths, grew, by degrees, fond of their fashions, and began to adopt them; which was looked upon as a fatal prelude to what happened soon after. A blind submission to the modes and fashions of a foreign nation, has but too often been the forerunner of a more dreadful slavery: may it not prove such in our days! By another law, he confirms all the privileges and exemptions, which his predecessors, moved by a due respect for religion, had granted to the churches, to the ecclesiastics, and particularly to the bishop of Rome. In the east, Arcadius, by a law dated the first of April, commanded all the Appolinarian teachers to be banished Constantinople, and the houses where they had held their private assemblies to be confiscated. That of the seventeenth of June forbids any one to insult the Jews, or... their patriarch, whom he had honoured the preceding year with the title of illustrious, which was given to the first officers of the empire. The law dated the first of July, exempting the ministers of their religion from the same burdens, from which the bishops, priests, and deacons were exempted. By a law dated the eighth of November, Arcadius commanded all domestics, whether free-born or slaves, to be sentenced to death, who should inform against their masters, except in cases of treason. This year, on the seventeenth of June, the empress Eudoxia was delivered of a daughter, named Flaccilla from the emperor's mother, and distinguished with the title of nobilissima, or most noble.

The following year 398, when Honorius was consul the fourth time, with Eutychianus, who entered upon that dignity at Constantinople, Stilicho pursued with the utmost vigor his warlike preparations against Gildo; but was greatly at a loss how to manage that expedition with success, and whom to trust with the command of the troops. But from this perplexity he was soon delivered by the seasonable arrival in Italy of Maseczel, brother to Gildo, who gave him a true account of the state of affairs in Africa, and suggested to him the most proper means for suppressing the rebellion. Maseczel was not only a Christian, but a person of extraordinary piety; and therefore could not by any means be prevailed upon to join his brother in the rebellion, who thereupon resolved to murder him; but he, by a timely flight, defeated his wicked design. Gildo, however, vented his rage on the two sons Maseczel had left behind him, causing them both to be put to death, and leaving their mangled bodies to be devoured by the wild beasts. Stilicho, not doubting but, to revenge the death of his children, and the attempt upon his own life, he would carry on the war with vigor, and serve the republic with unshaken fidelity, committed to him the whole management of the intended expedition against his brother. Zosimus writes, that Maseczel was attended by a very numerous army; but Orosius and the chronicle of Alexandria assure us, that it was but five thousand strong. Their authority is confirmed by Claudian.
dian, who says, that Stilicho made small preparations for this first expedition, but had in readiness another fleet, and a more renowned general, to be employed, in case any misfortune should befall the first. That poet names the several corps, or, as we may now call them, regiments, of which Mascezel's army was composed. It embarked at Pisa, and putting to sea, tho' a storm, if we may depend upon a poet, was then apprehended, steered along the east coast of Sardinia, and landed safe in Africa. Mascezel, without loss of time, led his troops against Gildo; and falling upon him before he could draw up his army, gained, after a bloody and obstinate fight, a complete victory. Thus Zosimus. But Orufius, Marcellinus, and Paulus Diaconus, ascribe this success to the miraculous assistance of St. Ambrose, who, appearing to Mascezel, assured him, that in three days' time he should gain a complete victory, in the very place where he was then encamped. Hereupon he continued, say they, in the same post; and the third day, after having spent the preceding night in praying, and singing hymns with some holy hermits, whom he had brought with him from the island Capraia, now Capraia, he saw himself surrounded on all sides by the numerous forces of the enemy; but not in the least daunted, he marched against them with his small army in battle-array. His piety prompted him to try first, whether he could by fair means bring them back to their duty; but one of the standard-bearers answering him with great arrogance, he drew his sword, and wounded him in the arm; which obliged him to lower the ensign. The other standard-bearers, imagining he had submitted, strove who should be the first in following his example, and lowering their ensigns threw themselves at the feet of Mascezel. Some of the barbarians, however, encouraged by Gildo, attempted to make a stand; but were soon put to the rout. Thus were seventy thousand men, says Orufius, defeated by five thousand, without any stratagem or treachery, nay, and almost without bloodshed. This miraculous success, continues that writer, would hardly be credited, were there not many persons still living, who were eye-witnesses of it. Paulinus assures us, that he had this account from Mascezel's own mouth, after his return to Milan. However, we will not take take upon us to prefer it to that of Zosimus. Gildo made his escape, and reaching the sea, went on board the first vessel he found; but being by a contrary wind driven into the harbour of Tabraca near Hippo in Africa, he was there apprehended, exposed to the insults of the populace, and then thrown into prison, where he strangled himself, to avoid a more cruel and ignominious death. Upon the defeat and death of Gildo, all Africa submitted anew to Honorius. Claudian, who omits no opportunity of flattering his great hero Stilicho, ascribes the whole success of this expedition to the prudence and vigilance of that minister. He wrote a poem on the war with Gildo; but that piece is imperfect, since the poet leaves the Roman fleet on the coast of Sardinia in their way to Africa. The leading men of Gildo's faction were sent to Rome, to be tried there; and some of them were publicly executed. Optatus, bishop of the Donatists at Tamugadi in Numidia one of Gildo's most zealous partisans, died in prison. As several innocent persons were, as it frequently happens on such occasions, accused, and dragged to prison, Honorius, by a law addressed to Victor proconsul of Africa, put a stop to such unjust prosecutions, ordering false informers and witnesses to be punished, according to the rigor of the several laws enacted against them.

Gildo's estate fell to the exchequer, and proved so large, that a particular treasurer was appointed to manage it, with the title of comes Gildoniaci patrimonii, or count of Gildo's patrimony. Africa being thus restored to its former tranquillity, Maeccezel returned to Italy, and was received at Milan by Stilicho, in appearance with the greatest demonstrations of friendship and esteem; but the glory he had acquired by putting to speedy an end to a war, which the minister had so much apprehended, giving him no small jealousy, he resolved to dispatch without delay this new rival. Accordingly, as he was one day passing a bridge in the neighbourhood of Milan, Maeccezel, who attended him, with many other persons of distinction, was, by his private orders, pushed into the river, and drowned. Orosius writes, that Maeccezel, elated with his success, had fallen from his former piety, and even dragged from the altars.

altars several criminals, who had fled to them for refuge; which that writer looks upon as an enormous crime, and the true cause of his unfortunate end. About the time of the defeat of Gildo, Honorius married at Milan, Maria the daughter of Stilicho by Serena, cousin-german to that prince. He was then but thirteen, and Maria not yet marriageable; whence some authors pretend that the marriage was never consummated, since Maria died very young long before the year 408. Claudian wrote several poems on this marriage, which, according to him, was first proposed, nay, and commanded by Theodofius. But his predictions concerning the kings who were to proceed from it, shew he was a poet, and not a prophet. By the defeat of Gildo, an entire harmony was re-established between the two brothers, as that poet tells us; but the same misunderstanding continued between the two ministers, who nevertheless agreed in plundering the unhappy people, and conveying into their private coffers the whole wealth of the two empires. Eutropius persuaded Arcadius to name him, Eutropius theo' an eunuch, for the consulship of the ensuing year; but Stilicho would not suffer him to be acknowledged in the west. Claudian writes, that when news of the consulate of Eutropius was brought to the court of Honorius, that prince was buffeted with Stilicho in receiving the submissions of the Alemans, Suevians, and Sicambrians; in giving kings to some; and commanding others to raise levies for recruiting his armies. Whether this may be founded on truth, or ought to be looked upon only as a poetical fiction, we will not take upon us to determine. The same poet, in enumerating the great things Stilicho had performed by himself or others before his consulship, that is, before the year 400, says, that he succoured Britain, attacked by the neighbouring nations, namely by the Scots, who, arming all Ierne or Ireland against it, had covered the sea with their fleets; that he put it in a condition not to fear their arrows, nor the efforts of the Picts; and that he had secured the British coast against the descents of the Saxons, which the inhabitants apprehending before were constantly on their guard; through

through fear of a surprize. He adds elsewhere, that the Saxons being overcome, the sea was quiet; that the Picts having lost their strength, Britain was delivered from her fears. The learned Uther ascribes to Stilicho the establishing of a legion in Britain, to defend it against the Picts, the Scots, and the Saxons. This legion is mentioned by Claudian. About the same time, a proper officer was appointed to guard the coast against the attempts of the Saxons, with the title of comes limitis Saxonic; or count of the Saxon coast, that is, of the coast over against the country of the Saxons.

In the east, the cities of Constantinople and Chalcidon were shaken with violent earthquakes; several buildings were consumed with lightning; and the sea, breaking in upon the land, laid whole countries under water. Claudian mentions several other prodigies, which were all the forerunners, says the poet, of a prodigy never before heard of, viz. an eunuch confus. For the following year, Eutropius prevailed upon Arcadius to create him a patrician, to honour him with the title of father to the emperor; and to raise him to the confular dignity. He was the first and the last eunuch that ever held, or rather disgraced, the fasces. His image, with the ensigns of his dignity, was carried as it were in triumph, through all the cities of the east; but Stilicho refusing to acknowledge him in the west, Manlius Theodorus alone is named confus in some fasti, and in the laws of Honorius. Some writers, mistaking his two names for the names of two different persons, mark Manlius or Mallius, and Theodorus, as consuls of this year. Manlius Theodorus is famous from the praises bestowed upon him by Claudian, in a poem which he wrote on his consulship; and by St. Austin, who, having known him at Milan in 384, inscribed to him in 384, his book de beata vita, of a happy life, which he published soon after his conversion. Claudian does not commend him on account of his family, but for his learning, his eloquence, and his virtues. After he had pleaded some time at the bar, he governed, first part of Libya, in quality of proconsul of Africa, and afterwards Macedonia; whence he was called to court, and created quaestor, whole province it was to draw draw up the laws that were enacted by the emperor. To this dignity he was raised by Gratian in 380. Upon the death of that prince, he withdrew from public affairs, and led a retired life, till he was recalled to court by Honorius, or rather by Stilicho, who appointed him prefect of Gaul in 395, and prefect of Italy in 397. Symmachus beffows great encomiums upon him; and St. Austin, who informs us that he was a christian, extols his modesty, his learning, his eloquence, and generosity. Claudian, in the poem he wrote on his consulship, admires his integrity, moderation, affability, and other virtues; but elsewhere, devoing himself of the character of a panegyrist, he owns, that Italy would have reaped greater advantages from the prefecture of Theodorus, had he lasted less.

During the consulship of Theodorus in the west and Eutropius in the east, died Varanes, or Vararanes IV. king of Peršia, who during the eleven years of his reign, had lived in friendship with the Romans. He was killed, we know not upon what provocation, by his own subjects, and succeeded by his brother Iklegerdes, or, as Abulfaragiustyles him, Yafdejird. Eutychius, who calls him Al Aitham, supposes him to have been the son of his predecessor. He reigned twenty-one years, ever maintaining a friendly correspondence with the Romans; but was, according to Eutychius, a prince of great severity, or rather cruelty; whence he was surnamed Al Aitham, or Athim, that is, the bad. Procopius gives him a quite different character, describing him as a generous-spirited prince. He is famous in the history of the church, on account of the persecution which he raised about the end of his reign against the christians in his dominions. The most remarkable event that happened in the east during the consulship of Eutropius, was the downfall of that famous and powerful minister, which Zosimus ascribes chiefly to Gainas. He had commanded the Goths, and other barbarians, under Theodosius; and, after the defeat of Eugenius, reconducted the eastern army to Arcadius, on which occasion he caused Ruffinus to be cut in pieces, in the manner we have related above. For this eminent time a private correspondence with the rebels, instead of defining Thrace, advised Tribigild to march his forces without delay to the sea-side, and, crossing the Hellespont, to enter that province. Had his advice been followed, the rebels would have made themselves masters of Constantinople without opposition; but Tribigild, bending his march towards Pisidia, was met there by one Valentine, a citizen of Selga, at the head of a small body of slaves and peasants. Tri-bigild disfitted them at first; but as they were well acquainted with that mountainous country, and had, by their frequent disputes with the robbers in those parts, learnt to make suddden onsets, and lay ambushes, they cut off great numbers of his men, and at length shut him up on all sides, in such manner, that no room being left for him to escape, he must inevitably have perished, had he not, by a large sum, prevailed upon one Florentius, who guarded a narrow pass called Coghilea, to withdraw, and suffer him to retire. However, his men, by the ambuscades, frequent skirmishes, and sudden onsets of the Pisidians, were now reduced to three hundred.

With these he marched into the plain, where he was again shut up between the two rivers Melane and Eurymedon. In this extremity, he found means to acquaint Gainas with the desperate posture of his affairs, who thereupon, under colour of reinforcing Leo's army, detached a strong body of barbar ians, with private orders to join Tribigild; which they did accordingly. With their assistance Tribigild opened himself a passage out of Pisidia, and falling unexpectedly upon Leo, cut most of his men in pieces. Leo himself, attempting to make his escape, perished among the marches. From Pisidia, Tribigild returned into Phrygia, where Gainas, who had advanced into that province, as if he designed to attack him, suffered him to rage with greater fury than ever, magnifying, in all the letters he wrote to the emperor, his conduct, his exploits, and the number of his troops, and sug-gestingly, that the only means to save the empire from immient ruin, was to comply with his demands, the chief of which was, that Eutropius, the author of all the present calamities, should be delivered up into his hands. At the same time, news was brought to court of the death of Va-ranes king of Persia, and a report spread, that his successor was preparing to invade Syria. Upon this fall's alarm, and the accounts that were by Gainas daily transmitted to Constantine of the progress made by Tribigild, some were for recurring to Stilicho, and others for satisfying the rebels, by sacrificing the minister to the welfare of the state. Arcadius, who was under the greatest perplexity, chose the latter; and sending for Eutropius, caused him to be stripp'd of the consular ensigns, and discharged him. Thus Zosimus. But Socrates, Philostorgius, Sozomen, and Chrysoftom, relate the downfal of Eutropius, without mentioning either Gainas or Trigild. Socrates only says, that he had offended Arcadius; Sozomen, that he had affronted the empress; and Chrysoftom, who was then at Constantinople, that he had injured the emperor. Philostorgius writes, that Eutropius having insolently threatened to drive the empress out of the palace, she went, with her two little daughters, Flaccilla and Pulcheria, in her arms, to throw herself at the emperor's feet, and demand satisfaction. Arcadius, moved with the tears of his wife and children, remembered at length, that he was emperor; and sending for Eutropius, discharged him, and commanded him that infant to quit the palace; which he did accordingly, without being attended by a single person, tho' he had been hitherto constantly surrounded with crowds of pretended friends and adorers. Claudian seems to favour the opinion of Zosimus; for in the second book against Eutropius, he describes at length the war of Tribigild, which would have been quite foreign to his purpose, had it not had any connection with the downfal of Eutropius, which he mentions in his preface to that book. However, the poet, after having expatiated on that war, only describes the confection it occasioned at Constantinople, and introduces the east recurring to his hero Stilicho. Perhaps he wrote, or intended to write, a third book. Eutropius, thus disgraced, and apprehending his life to be in danger, took sanctuary in a church. But the people exclaiming against him in the theatre, and Gainas with the soldiery, pressIng the emperor to restore the state to its former tranquillity, by either putting to death or banishing the abhorred minister, a band of soldiers was sent to drag him from his asylum, some of those who

who had appeared all that time most zealously attached to him, taking upon them that province. But Chrysostom, then bishop of Constantinople, presenting himself before them, and resolutely declaring, that he would not suffer them to profane the church, they seized him, and carried him to the emperor, who was by him prevailed upon to grant that protection to Eutropius, from which many guilty of smaller crimes had, by his means, been excluded. The next day, incredible multitudes of people flocked to the church, to have the satisfaction of seeing Eutropius, whom they all hated, deposed of his power, and, by a just retaliation, brought to that deplorable condition, to which he had reduced many of their friends and relations. On this occasion Chrysostom made a speech to the assembled multitude, on the vanity of all human grandeur, endeavouring at the same time to awake in the hearts of his auditors sentiments of compassion for the unhappy criminal. When he saw them begin to relent, he ended his speech, by exhorting them to go all in a body to the imperial palace, and, throwing themselves at the prince’s feet, to beg his life. Whether they complied with this exhortation, we are nowhere told. All we know is, that a few days after, Eutropius, having privately left his asylum, in order to make his escape, was taken, and banished to the island of Cyprus. Zosimus writes, that when he was banished, he was assured, that his life should not be taken from him; and Claudian, who wrote at the time they were conducting him to Cyprus, says, that though he had caused an eunuch to be beheaded, yet he should not undergo the same punishment. The law has reached our times, by which Arcadius confiscated his estate, stripped him of the dignity of great chamberlain, degraded him from the rank of patrician, and ordered his name to be erased where-ever he was styled consul, his statues to be pulled down, and his images to be removed. By the same law Aurelian, the praefectus praetorio, is enjoined to cause him to be conducted under a guard to the island of Cyprus, and to be there narrowly watched, lest he should raise new disturbances. This law is dated the seventeenth of January of the present year; which must certainly be a mistake, since all historians agree, that he was banished after the sofom gives us room to believe, that several other persons were banished with Eutropius; and truly a favourite fallen. However, his sister, tho' very rich, was suffered to continue at Constantinople. Gainas, not yet exhausted, caused several charges to be brought against him; upon which he was conducted from the island of Cyprus to a place called Pantychium, between Chalcod and Nicomedia, where he was tried by the prefect Aurelian and several other persons of distinction, who, upon his being convicted of having in his consulship made use of ornaments peculiar to the imperial dignity, condemned him, and he was beheaded on the last day of the present year. Zosimus, who pretends he had been promised his life upon oath, says, that, to cover that perjury, they gave out, that the oath was only with respect to Constantinople, and caused him to be beheaded at Chalcod. This year is remarkable in the history of the church, for the many temples that were destroyed both in the east and west, and the severe laws that were enacted by the two princes against all manner of idolatrous worship; which may be said to have given the last blow to the pagan superstitition. The temples, says Tiro Proper in his chronicle, were this year demolished throughout the Roman world. By a law dated the thirteenth of July, Arcadius commanded all the temples throughout his domiions to be pulled down, not only in the cities, but likewise in the country; and by another dated the first of November, the materials were to be employed in repairing the bridges, highways, aqueducts, and the walls of the cities. By other laws, all manner of superstitious worship was forbidden, both in public and private, under the severest penalties, and the priests and ministers of the idols deprived of all the privileges granted them by former princes. In the west Honorius acted a law, dated the twenty-ninth of January of this year 399, forbidding heathenish sacrifices on pain of death, and commanding the temples to be every-where pulled down, and the statues of the idols to be broken in pieces, that no footsteps might remain of the antient superstitition. Notwithstanding this law, several temples were spared.

spared at the request of the bishops, who begged them, and consecrated them to the worship of the true God. Among these was the famous temple of the goddess Cœlestinis, the chief deity of Carthage, one of the most stately edifices in the whole empire; for it is said, with the buildings belonging to it, to have taken up the space of two miles, the whole being inclosed by a wall of an extraordinary height and beauty. This temple was with great pomp and solemnity consecrated on Easter-day by Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, attended by several other bishops, and an incredible multitude of christians, who had flocked from all parts to assist at that ceremony w. Besides the destruction of several temples recorded by the ecclesiastical writers, nothing happened this year in the west, which historians have thought worth transmitting to posterity. Honorius was, as appears from the dates of his laws, on the twenty-ninth of January at Ravenna, from the sixteenth of February to the fourth of June at Milan, at Brixio or Brescia on the sixth of June, at Verona in July, in August at Padua, and at Altini in September; whence he returned to Milan, and there passed the winter x.

The next confuls were Stilicho and Aurelianus; the latter entered upon this new dignity at Constantinople, and the former at Milan, with the greatest pomp that had ever been seen in that city y. In the east no advantage accrued to the public from the death of Eutropius, the empress Eudoxia, a bold, enterprising, and avaricious woman, as Zosimus styles her, having, upon the downfall of that minister, gained an absolute ascendant over her husband. She was constantly befried by women, eunuchs, and informers, who prompted her to such crying acts of violence and injustice, that every good man wished for death, to avoid seeing such enormous disorders z. In the mean time, Gainas, having concluded a pretended peace with the rebels, began to march back to Constantinople, followed by Tribigild, whom he joined at Thyatira, where they both agreed to march to Sardis in Lydia, and plunder that metropolis; but not being able to pass the rivers that were swelled by the heavy rains, they parted once more; and bending their march to the sea, Tribigild took his route towards Lampsis on the Hellespont, and Gainas towards Chalcedon, allowing their soldiers to plunder all the countries.

countries through which they passed. Their approach caused a general conformation at Constantinople; nay, the whole empire seemed to be in imminent danger. As Arcadius had no troops to make head against them, and prevent their entering Thrace, he was advised to send deputies to Gainas, and to save the empire from utter ruin, by granting him whatever he demanded. Gainas, with great insolence, required three of the most eminent men in the state, whom he thought capable of thwarting his ambitious designs, to be delivered up to him, in order to be put to death. These were Saturninus, who had been consul in 383, and employed for the space of thirty years in public affairs; Aurelianus, this year's consul, who had been prefect of Constantinople in 393, and the preceding year the praefectus praetorio; and John, secretary to the emperor, and in whom the prince reposed great trust a. The emperor complied, tho' much against his will, with this arrogant and tyrannical demand, those three illustrious persons requesting him of their own accord to sacrifice them to the public welfare b. With the emperor's content they left Constantinople, and presented themselves before Gainas, encamped in the neighbourhood of Chalcedon, who immediately ordered them to be beheaded, but changed the sentence of death into that of perpetual banishment, when the executioner had already lifted up his arm to discharge the fatal blow c. They were chiefly indebted to Chrysostom for their lives, which were granted them at his intercession d. They were all three sent under a guard towards Epirus; but having, either by corrupting the Goths that guarded them, or by some other means, made their escape, they appeared, when least expected, at the court of Constantinople, to the great joy of the emperor and the whole city e. Zosimus is the only writer who mentions John among those whom Gainas demanded; all other writers speak only of Aurelianus and Saturninus. Gainas, not yet satisfied, demanded a conference with the emperor in person; and with this demand too the emperor was obliged to comply, passing for that purpose over to Chalcedon, in the neighbourhood of which city he had an interview with Gainas, in the church of St. Euphemia, where it was agreed, that both Gainas and Tribigild should lay down their arms, and return, if they pleased, to Constantinople;

Antinpo; and that the former, besides the command of all the Goths in the Roman service, should have that of the Roman horse and foot, with the consular ornaments, and an authority almost unbounded. We find nothing henceforth in history relating to Tribigild, except that he perished in Thrace soon after. As for Gainas, upon his return to Constantinople, he demanded a church in that city for the Arians, whose doctrine was held by him, and most of the Goths his countrymen. The timorous emperor, not daring to give him an absolute denial, referred him to Chrysostom, bishop of the city, who shewed him the edict of the emperor Theodosius, forbidding all heretics and sectaries to hold any assemblies in the city. Gainas replied, that the services he had rendered the empire deserved at least one church, in which he and those of his persuasion might have the free exercise of their religion. To this the prelate replied boldly, that his rewards had already exceeded his deserts; that from the mean condition of a common soldier, he had been raised to the high station of commander in chief of all the Roman forces; and ought to be satisfied with the honours he enjoyed, without demanding what could not be granted without a notorious breach of the laws. Gainas, finding he had not to deal with an Arcadius, but a Chrysostom, thought it adviseable to drop his demand. Socrates and Sozomen mention a church in Constantinople belonging to the Goths; but they must be understood not of the Arian, but the orthodox Goths, since Marcellinus, a zealous catholic, styles it in his chronicle "our church." However the Arians were, it seems, at this time allowed to assemble without the walls of the city. About this time appeared over Constantinople a comet of unusual magnitude, portending, as was said, the great danger the city was in from the perfidiousness of Gainas. For that barbarian, who commanded in chief the armies of Arcadius, having filled Constantinople with his Goths, and removed from thence all the Roman troops, formed a design of seizing first the wealth of the bankers, and then setting fire to the palace. But this wicked project being frustrated by a miracle, which the reader will find related at length by Socrates, Sozomen, and Philostorgius, he withdrew from the city on on the tenth of July, as it were to take the air, says Zosimus, or to perform his devotions, as we read in Socrates, in the church of St. John Baptist, seven miles from the city, pretending to be possessed, say Sozomen and Socrates, with an evil spirit. He left in the city the greater part of the Goths, with private orders to fall upon the inhabitants immediately after his departure, and to give him a signal, that he might return and join them with those who attended him. Gainas defeated his own design, according to Zosimus, by returning to force the gate before the signal agreed on; which alarmed the city. Socrates and Sozomen write, that the soldiers who guarded the gates, observing those, who went out with Gainas, loaded with arms, which they endeavoured to conceal, attempted to stop them. Hereupon the Goths, having killed several of the guards, opened themselves a way sword in hand; but the citizens, in the mean time, taking the alarm, flew to arms; and Arcadius, acquainted with what had happened, declared Gainas a public enemy, and ordered all the Goths in the city to be put to the sword. Upon this Gainas returned in great haste; but not being able to force the gate, which he found barricaded, and defended by a numerous body of citizens, he was obliged to drop the enterprise, and retire. Philostorgius supposes him to have been still in the city, and to have retired in the night. What happened the day following, we are nowhere told; but the day after, the twelfth of July, the citizens fell upon the Goths, who were still remaining in the city to the number of seven thousand, and cut most of them in pieces; the rest, overpowered with numbers, took sanctuary in the church of their nation, which stood close to the palace; but the citizens having obtained leave of the emperor to attack them even in their asylum, they first uncovered the roof; and after having for some time plied them warmly with showers of darts and arrows, they set fire at last to the church, which was reduced to ashes, with all who were in it. This was looked upon, says Zosimus, by every good Christian as an enormous crime. Gainas, highly provoked at the massacre of his friends and countrymen, pulled off the masque; and making open war upon the state, ravaged all Thrace; but not being able to make himself self master of a single city there, the inhabitants, who were accustomed to such incursions, having learned how to defend their walls, how to sally out, and distress the enemy, he left that province, and marched into the Chersonesus, with a design to cross the straights of the Hellespont, and enrich himself and his army with the spoil of Asia. But Fravitus, who commanded in those parts, having assembled in great haste a considerable number of vessels, attacked him in his passage; and being favoured by the wind, obliged him to return to the coast whence he had failed, with the loss of many thousands of his men, either killed or drowned. Fravitus was himself a Goth, and a pagan, according to Zosimus, but greatly attached to the Roman interest, having married a Roman of distinction in 380, and ever since that time served the empire with great fidelity. He was one of the chiefs of those Goths, who, being driven out of their own country by the Hunns, were allowed by Theodosius to settle in Thrace. Eunapius writes, that soon after he killed with his own hand Eriulphus, another of their chiefs, because he was for taking arms against Theodosius, purposing to an oath, by which they had all bound themselves, before they left their own country in 376, to do the Romans, however kindly by them received, all the mischief that lay in their power. As he was a man of great courage, a strict observer of military discipline, vigilant, and indefatigable, he had been employed on several occasions, and acquitted himself in every command with great reputation: he had lately cleared the east of the robbers who had long infested it, roving up and down the country in great bodies. However, he was suspected of having suffered Gainas and the rest of his countrymen to escape, when he might have easily cut them all off. But Zosimus, and most historians, clear him from this charge, which seems the more groundless, as he was for his conduct on that occasion rewarded the following year with the consulship. From the Chersonesus, Gainas returned to Thrace, and was there, according to Socrates and Sozomen, cut in pieces, with all his men, by the Romans, who pursued him. Zosimus writes, that after he had massacred all the Romans whom he found in his army, left they should betray him, he passed the Danube, being desirous to end his days in the ancient country of the Goths. But Uldes or Uldin, king king of the Hunns, then masters of those countries, thinking it highly impolitic to receive into his dominions so renowned a commander, with an army of his own nation, met him with all his forces on the frontiers, gave him battle, and, after a sharp dispute, put him and all his men to the sword. His body being found, Uldes caused his head to be cut off, and sent it to Arcadius, who received it at Constantinople on the third of January of the ensuing year 401. During these troubles, Eudoxia, who had been hitherto distinguished only with the title of Nobilissima, received that of Augusta on the ninth of January; on which occasion she caused her image to be carried through all the provinces of the empire, to receive the same honours that were paid to the images of the emperors. This no empress before her had presumed to do; whence many complained of it as an innovation, and among the rest Honorius, in a letter which he wrote to his brother. But not many years after, the empresses claimed the same honours; nay, and assumed the same titles of pious, happy, most pious, perpetual, victorious, &c. that were given to the princes their husbands. On the third of April of this year, Eudoxia was delivered of Arcadia, her third daughter. In the beginning of this year, the city of Constantinople was shaken with violent earthquakes, which lasted three days; on which occasion great numbers of pagans demanded and received the sacrament of baptism.

During the above-mentioned disturbances raised by Gaius in the east, the western provinces, especially Italy, were alarmed by a sudden irruption of the barbarians, under the conduct of the celebrated Alaric, and Radagaisus king of the Hunns. Of the former we have already made frequent mention; but as he is to act a chief part in the history of Honorius’s reign, we shall here acquaint our readers with what we have copied from the best writers concerning a man so famous in the records of those times. Alaric was by nation a Goth, born in the island of Paece at the mouth of the Danube, whence Claudian calls that river his paternal god. He was not sprung from the family of the Amali, the most illustrious of the Gothith nation, but from that of the Balthi, which held the second rank; and to him, in particular, his countrymen had given the name of Balt, which in their language language signified bold and enterprising. Though Claudian introduces him speaking in the language of a pagan, yet it is certain he was a Christian, but an Arian, the doctrine of that heresifh being prevailed among the Goths ever since the year 375. Long before the year 410, in which he took Rome, he used to brag, that he would one day extend his conquests to that great metropolis, pursuant to the prediction of an oracle. This we learn of the poet Claudian, who little imagined then, that the prediction would ever be fulfilled. Prudentius likewise, who wrote some years before Alaric took Rome, tells us, that he was often heard to say, he should one day set fire to that city. He passed the Danube in 376, with his countrymen, driven out of their own country by the Hunns. Claudian says, that he often engaged the imperial troops, and once shut up the emperor Theodosius in the windings of the Hebrus in Thrace. However, in 382, he submitted to him with the other Goths, and received lands in Thrace, where they were allowed to settle, upon condition of their serving, when wanted, in the Roman armies. Pursuant to this agreement, they attended Theodosius in his last expedition against the usurper Eugenius in 364, on which occasion Alaric commanded a body of his countrymen. He had no other rank in the beginning of the reign of Arcadius and Honorius; whence Rufinus, finding him dissatisfied, easily prevailed upon him to revolt, and plunder Greece in 395. Stilicho gained several advantages over him in Peloponnesus; but suffered him to escape in 396, as we have related elsewhere. Arcadius entered into a treaty with him, and appointed him general of the Roman troops in East-Illyricum, which post he held when Tribigild revolted, that is, in 399. The Goths, who were subject to the empire, created him about the same time, if Jornandes is to be credited, their chief and general, with the title of king of the Visigoths. The same writer adds, that the Goths, defying both Arcadius and Honorius, and discontented because they had not sent them the usual presents, began to mutiny, and resolved to make war upon the empire.

in order to enrich themselves with the spoils of so many wealthy provinces. Whatever was the motive that prompted them to take arms, it is certain, that this year 400, the Goths, under the conduct of Alaric, and Radagaisus king of the Hunns, entered Italy in an hostile manner on the side of Pannonia, leaving Sirmium on their right. Jornandes writes, that they met with no opposition: according to St. Jerom, they besieged Aquileia; and after having opened themselves a way into Italy, they laid the country waste far and near. This happened the present year; but they were still in Italy in the beginning of the following year 401, for Paulinus, in his annual poem on the birth-day of Felix of Nola, the fourteenth of January, writes in 401, that the Goths and other foreign nations were still pursuing their ravages in Italy. As we have no distinct account of this first irruption of Alaric into Italy, we know not how it ended; but as it seems altogether improbable, that he continued in that country till the battle of Pollentia, fought two years after, in which no mention is made of Radagaisus, we are inclined to believe, that Stilicho induced them both, by some means or other, to retire, and that Alaric returned about the end of the year 402.

The next consuls were Vicentius prefect of Gaul, and Fravitus or Fravita, of whom we have spoken above. This year is remarkable for the birth of Theodosius, the son and successor of Arcadius, born, according to Socrates and the chronicle of Alexandria, on the tenth, according to Marcellinus, on the eleventh, of April, and, soon after his birth, declared Cæsar, and baptized with extraordinary pomp and solemnity. This year Arcadius published a law forbidding any one to beg the estates of condemned persons, till two years after they had been confiscated. The Euxine sea was this year frozen over for the space of twenty days. A band of slaves and defectors pillaged part of Thrace, pretending to be Hunns: but Fravitas marching against them, put most of them to the sword, and dispersed the rest. In the west, Honorius, by a law dated the twenty-first of June, forgave all the debts owing to the exchequer before his first consulship.

confusion; that is, before the month of September 386. By the same law, he ordered all prosecutions and suits for what was owing from that time, to the year 395, that is to his accession to the empire, to be suspended, till he had enquired into the circumstances of the debtors. The following year, when Arcadius and Honorius were both consuls the fifth time, nothing remarkable happened in the east, except the promoting of young Theodosius to the imperial dignity; which ceremony was performed with extraordinary magnificence in the palace of Hebdomon, on the tenth or eleventh of January. In the west, Alaric entered Italy anew. Claudian who wrote a poem on this war, supposes, that he set out from Thessaly; but Socrates tells us in a very confused manner, that not presuming to take upon him the title of emperor, he left Constantinople, and upon his arrival in Illyricum, put all to fire and sword; but as he was pushing out of Thessaly into Epirus, he was attacked in the narrow passes of mount Pindus by the Thessalians, who killed three thousand of his men in the neighbourhood of Nicopolis. Notwithstanding this loss, he pursued his march, carrying all before him. What prompted him to these acts of hostility, we are no-where told. Claudian lays the whole blame on Alaric, charging him with treachery. On the other hand Orosius accuses Stilicho, as if he had been the chief author of this war, and had provoked the Goths, by refusing to grant them certain lands, which they demanded upon terms very advantageous to the empire. He hoped, says that writer, when a war was once kindled in the bowels of the empire, to improve it to his own advantage, and settle the sovereignty on his son Eucherius. Be that as it will, Alaric entered Italy in the latter end of the autumn, the winter being more favourable to his men, enured to a cold climate, than to the Romans, not accustomed to bear the hardships of war in that season. He passed the Alps without opposition, the Roman troops being then employed in driving out a body of barbarians, who had made an irruption into Rhetia. As there was then no army in Italy to oppose him, he ravaged without control the provinces of Venetia and Liguria which threw Rome itself into the utmost consternation.

confration: the walls of that metropolis were repaired with great expedition by Flavius Macrobius Longianus, then prefect of the city; and the citizens, not being suffer to retire with their families and effects, were busied night and day in preparing arms, and putting themselves in the best posture of defence they could. The court was no les alarmed than the people, Alaric threatening to besiege the emperor himself, and force him to comply with his demands. Honorius was for retiring into Gaul; but Stilicho would neither suffer him, nor his own wife and son, to abandon Italy. However, the emperor left Milan, and retired to Ravenna, which thenceforth became the usual place of his residence. The news of this irruption soon reached the most distant provinces of the east; for we are told that this year the Christians of Edessa in Mesopotamia, repairing to the church of St. Thomas, begged in their public prayers, that the Arian robber, who plundered Italy, might meet with the just doom which had overtaken his countrymen of the same sect, meaning no doubt Gainas.

The next consuls were Theodosius Augustus and Rumoridus. Who the latter was, we are no-where told; but his name gives us room to think he was a Goth, probably in the service of Honorius; for, generally speaking, one of the consuls belonged to the eastern, and the other to the western empire. This year 403, Eudoxia was, on the tenth or eleventh of February, delivered of Marina, her fourth and last daughter. A statue of silver was erected to the empress on a column of porphyry, near the church of St. Sophia; which occasioned a misunderstanding between Eudoxia and St. Chrysostom, bishop of the city, who could not endure the profane sports that were exhibited before the statue at the very entry of the church. Arcadius caused likewise his own statue to be placed on a column, which, according to some writers, was reared this year in the quarter of the city called Xerelophos, and is described by Glyllius. The same year Arcadius built the city of Arcadiopolis in Thrace, o rather gave that name to the ancient city of Bergulae. To return to Italy, Stilicho, having in some degree removed the young emperor's fears, says Claudian, crossed the lake of Como, and passing the Alps in the depth of winter, entered Rhétia, where, with his unexpected arrival, he alarmed the barbarians and not only obliged them to sue for peace, but persuaded great numbers of them to join him. At the same time he dispatched messengers to the troops that guarded the coast of Britain, and the banks of the Rhine, ordering them to march immediately, and with all possible expedition, into Rhétia. Upon their arrival, he commanded them to pursue their march into Italy; but set out himself before them, attended by a small number of troops in order to return with all speed to court. When he came to the Adda, he found the enemy encamped on the opposite bank and masters of the bridge; but not in the least daunted, he threw himself into the river as soon as it was dark, and forcing his way sword in hand through the midst of the barbarians, appeared unexpectedly at court to the inexpressible joy of the emperor. The troops arrived soon after out of Rhétia; and Stilicho, putting himself at their head, marched against the enemy; but could not hinder Alaric from passing the Po, and advancing to Pollentia, now Pollenza, on the Tanaro in Piedmont, where the two armies engaged, almost on the same spot, says Claudian, where Marius had formerly defeated the Cimbrians; but he was therein mistaken, for the Cimbrians were overcome in the neighbourhood of Vercelli. There is a great disagreement among authors in the accounts they give us of this battle: Jornandes writes, that Alaric having advanced to Pollentia, in virtue of a treaty, by which Honorius had yielded to him the provinces of Gaul and Spain, then held by the Vandals, Stilicho followed him, and without any regard to the faith of treaties, or law of nations, fell upon him, while he was under no apprehension of an enemy. But it is certain, that the Vandals had not yet entered either of those provinces. Claudian, Cassiodorus and Prudentius suppose Stilicho to have been present, and to have commanded the army in person; but Orosius tells us, that Saul, a pagan and barbarian, was vested vested with the chief command; and that he, imagining the Goths, out of respect to their religion, (for they were for the most part Christians, tho' Arians) would not fight on Easter-day, attacked them on that solemn festival. In the present year 403, Easter fell on the twenty-ninth of March; which is agreeable to what we read in Claudian, viz. that the war of Alaric began and ended with the winter. In the Roman army served a body of Alan horse, commanded by an officer of that nation, who advancing with more courage than prudence, was slain at the head of his men; which put them into no small confusion: but Stilicho coming seasonably with the foot to their assistance, they rallied, and returned to the charge. Claudian and Prudentius suppose the battle to have been gained by the Romans; but Cassiodorus in his chronicle writes, that Stilicho and the Roman army were defeated, and put to flight; and Jornandes, that the Goths, when surprized by Stilicho, betrayed no small fear, but afterwards took courage, and put most of his men to the sword, obliging the rest to save themselves by a precipitous and disorderly flight. According to Orosius the Romans gained the battle; but were overcome after the victory. The Romans, while victorious, forced and plundered the enemy’s camp, in which they found the spoils of several provinces, and the wife of Alaric, with his children and daughters-in-law, whom they took prisoners. Alaric was no sooner informed of their misfortunes, than he sent deputies to Stilicho to sue for peace; which was readily granted him upon condition of his marching forthwith out of Italy. Pursuant to this agreement, Alaric repassed the Po, and retired as far as Verona, where, in defiance of the late treaty, he began to plunder the country, and commit other acts of hostility. Hereupon Stilicho detached against him a strong body of barbarians, by whom he was overcome and obliged to take refuge among the mountains. He endeavoured to pass the Alps, and seize on Gaul or Rhetia; but found all the passes guarded by Stilicho, who kept him blocked up, till most of his men forfaking him, and joining the Romans, he thought it advisable to withdraw in the night-time, and return through by-ways into Pannonia. Thus Claudian. Orosius writes, that that the barbarians could not agree among themselves; that the Goths were divided into two factions; and that the Alans and Hunns, who served under Alaric, often quarrelled, and destroyed each other. Italy being thus delivered from the barbarians, Honorius, to satisfy the senate and people of Rome, who, by frequent embassies, had entreated him to honour their city with his presence, left Ravenna, and set out for that metropolis; which he entered in triumph, having Stilicho with him in the chariot, about the beginning of December. He was received with loud acclamations by the senate in a body, by the nobility and people in their best apparel. He would not suffer the senate to attend, according to custom, his triumphal chariot on foot; but allowed his sister Placidia, and Eucherius his brother-in-law, to pay him that honour. While he was still at Ravenna, he suppressed and utterly abolished the shews of gladiators, which, tho' forbidden by Constantine the Great in 325, had been tolerated by his successors, even by Theodosius himself, out of complaisance to the people, fond beyond expression of that inhuman diversion. Theodoret writes, that an anchoret, by name Telemachus, attempting to prevent the gladiators from engaging in the amphitheatre at Rome, whither he was for that purpose come out of the east, was by the incensed populace stone to death; and hence Honorius, according to that writer, took occasion to suppress those sports. Be that as it will, they were forbidden after the battle of Pollentia, as appears from Prudentius, and before Honorius's triumphal entry into Rome; since Claudian, in describing the shews that were exhibited on that occasion, makes no mention of gladiators.

The following year 404, Honorius was consul the sixth time, with Arifianetus, of whom we find no further mention in history. The empress Eudoxia died this year of a miscarriage, on the sixth of October, a few days after she had prevailed upon the weak prince her husband to banish St.
Chryssoptom, whom she had for some time persecuted with great bitterness, on account of his reflecting in his sermons, as she imagined, and perhaps not without reason, on her conduct, and his exclaiming against the profane sports that were exhibited before her statue, which stood near the church.

church. On the very day he left Constantinople, a fire broke out in the great church, which entirely consumed it with the palace where the senate used to assemble, and the neighbouring edifices. This calamity was imputed to the exiled bishop’s friends, and several of them were thrown into prison, and racked to death. But of these violent proceedings against Chrysostom and his friends, the reader will find a distinct account in the ecclesiastic writers. The empress was interred on the twelfth of October, in the church of the Apostles, where her tomb was to be seen many ages after. Before her death the Hunns had broken into Thrace, and the Ifaurian robbers committed great disorders in Asia and Syria. The former having pillaged great part of Thrace and eaft Illyricum, retired of their own accord beyond the Danube, loaded with booty. Against the latter was sent Arbazacus, who cut great numbers of them in pieces, and flut them up on all sides; but suffered them in the end to escape, being bribed by the large sums they offered him.

Suidas, who calls him a native of Ifauria, and a few lines after an Armenian, says, that, from his infatiable rapaciously and avarice, he was nicknamed Harpazacus, or the Harpy. The Ifaurians, having now nothing to fear from Arbazacus, over-ran the provinces of Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Lycaonia, Pisdia, Cappadocia, and Lower Syria, extening their ravages to the frontiers of Persia on one side, and to the Euxine sea on the other, ranfacking every-where, and pillaging the open country, with the villages, and unfortified towns. They even passed over into the island of Cyprus, and caused a general consternation in Phœnicia, Caria, Juda, and Jerusalem itself; insomuch that the people were every-where bufied in building walls, in preparing arms, and putting themselves in a posture of defence: but, upon the approach of winter, they withdrew to their inaccessible mountains, with an immense booty, which they took care to share with Arbazacus. In the west, Honorius began his sixth consulship at Rome, which is the subject of the poem that Claudian pronounced on occasion of that solemnity.

The emperor continued at Rome at least till the fifteenth of July, as appears from the dates of his laws. From Rome he returned to Ravenna, and there fixed his residence, notwithstanding the earnest entreaties of the inhabitants of Milan inviting him back to their city. From this time Ravenna became the seat of the western Roman empire; whence the country in which it stood was called Romania, which name it still retains (N).

The next consuls were Stilicho the second time, and Anthemius, who was soon after appointed prefect of the east, and is mightily commended by St. Chrysostom p. We shall have frequent occasion to speak of him in the reign of Theodosius.

p Chrys. ep. 147. p. 780.

(N) The city of Ravenna is said by some to have been founded by the Thessalians; but Pliny calls it a colony of the Sabines. It was once reckoned amongst the cities of Umbria; but afterwards became the capital of a particular province, called Flaminia, and belonging to Cisalpine Gaul, and the vicarship of Italy (1). It was inclosed on all sides, either by the sea, by an arm of the Po, conveyed thither by Augustus, or by marshes, through which there was but one way, and that very narrow, leading to the city; so that it was, in a manner, a peninsula, and accessible only on one side (2). The sea washed the walls of the city, and formed a spacious harbour in which two hundred and fifty ships could ride safe (3). Augustus, and after him several other emperors, kept constantly two fleets for the defence of Italy, one of which was stationed at Ravenna on the Adriatic, and the other at Misenium on the Mediterranean sea. But Jornandes, who was bishop of Ravenna about the middle of the sixth century, tells us, that the harbour was then become a garden, and the city divided into three quarters, or rather cities, of which the highest was called Ravenna, the second, in which was probably the imperial palace, Caesarea, and the third Clasis, because in that place, then distant three miles from Ravenna, was formerly the harbour with the fleet (4). A city, thus situated amidst waters and marshes, could not be healthy; but, on the other side, it could not be easily attacked, and might with great ease be succoured by sea, affording at the same time a safe retreat into the east, when it could be no longer maintained. These reasons, without all doubt, prompted Honorius to fix the seat of the empire there, notwithstanding the pressing and reiterated remonstrances of the inhabitants of Milan and Rome.

dosius II. This year the Mazichi and Auxoriani, two nations of barbarians inhabiting the country between Cyrenaica and Tripolitana, laid waste great part of Egypt. Arcadius was on the twelfth of June at Nice; on the tenth and twenty-third of July, and twelfth of August, at Ancyra in Galatia, whence he returned in the beginning of autumn to Constantinople. This year Italy was again alarmed with a sudden irruption of barbarians, led by Radagaisus, or Rhodogaisus, as the Greeks style him. He was one of the kings or chiefs of the Goths, a pagan by religion, and a sworn enemy to the Roman name. He is by some writers styled king of the Hunns. He entered Italy, as we have observed above, with Alaric, in the year 400, but returning afterwards beyond the Danube, he assembled an army, consisting, according to Zosimus, of four hundred thousand, according to Orosius and Marcellinus, of two hundred thousand barbarians, of the various nations dwelling beyond the Danube and the Rhine, who were then all blended under the common name of Goths. The commanders, who were distinguished with the title of lords, amounted, according to Photius a contemporary writer, to the number of twelve hundred. With this formidable host he broke suddenly into Italy, vowing to sacrifice to his gods, says Orosius, all the Roman blood he could shed. The news of his approach threw all Italy, and Rome itself, into the utmost consternation. As Radagaisus was a zealous worshipper of the gods, and sacrificed every morning to Jupiter, the pagans in Rome gave out, that he would, without all doubt, prevail, not so much by his numerous forces, as the protection of the gods, whom the ungrateful Romans had banished from a city, which they had so often defended. Unless the antient religion, said they, be restored, and christianity, the only cause of our calamities, utterly abolished, the city must fall into the hands of the barbarians, who have the gods on their side, whom we have forsaken. With these complaints the whole city was filled, and the name of Christ everywhere blasphemed, as the true cause of the present calamities. In the mean time Stilicho, having assembled at Pavia all the Roman forces, amounting to thirty legions, and reinforced them them with great numbers of Goths, Hunns and Alans, under the command of Sarus a Goth, and Uldin king of the Hunns, he left that place, bending his march towards Hetruria, where Radagaisus was bufed in the siege of Florence, which city was already reduced to the utmost extremity. As Stilicho came unexpectedly upon the enemy, he immediately ordered the Hunns, and other auxiliaries, to fall upon one of the three bodies into which he found their army divided. His orders were executed, and an hundred thousand of the enemy cut in pieces, without the loss of one man on the side of the Romans. Thus St. Auffin, Zosimus and Prosper. Radagaisus retired with the rest to the neighbouring mountains of Rosule, where he was closely besieged by Stilicho, and reduced, with his numerous army, to such extremity, that he attempted to escape secretly, and leave his men to the mercy of the Romans; but, as all the passes were well guarded, he fell in to Stilicho’s hands, and was by his orders put to death soon after. His men, finding themselves abandoned by their leader, and destitute of all manner of provisions, submitted to the Romans in such numbers, that they were sold like beasts, in droves, at a crown a head; but, as by the famine that had raged among them while shut up in the mountains, they had contracted an ill state of health, they all died in a few days. Orofius e and St. Auffin f ascribe this victory to a miracle.

The following year Arcadius was consul the sixth time, with Anicius Probus, the younger brother of Olybrius and Probinus, consuls in 395 g. A dreadful fire happened this year at Constantinople on the twenty-fifth of October h; and Palestine was infested with such multitudes of grasshoppers, as quite darkened the sky, and turned day into night. St. Jerom, who was then composing his comments on the prophet Joel, writes, that, after they had done great mischief, they were driven by the wind, partly into the Dead sea, partly into the Mediterranean, and thrown soon after on both shores in such heaps, that they infected the air, and occasioned a plague i. This year Arcadius enacted, amongst several others, a law, dated the twenty-eighth of April, threatening with death, not only the authors of libels, but such as should read such defamatory writings, without tearing or burning them k. Honanorius

Honorius continued all this year at Ravenna, where he enacted a law dated the seventeenth of April, encouraging all persons, whether free-men or slaves, to take arms in defence of their country, and promising to the latter their liberty, to the former three pieces of gold to be paid immediately, and seven more after the war. This law was, without all doubt, occasioned by the motions of the northern nations, who, on the last day of this year 406, entered Gaul, and fixing their abode there, gave beginning to the utter ruin of the Roman empire. Orosius, Marcellinus, Tyro Prosper, and St. Jerom, assure us, that they were stirred up, and invited into Gaul by Sulpichio, who even supplied them with large sums, hoping, by their means, to raise his son Eucherius to the empire. The barbarians who, at his instigation, broke into Gaul this year, were the Alans, the Vandals, and the Suevians. The Vandals, in attempting to cross the Rhine, were attacked by the Franks, who cut twenty thousand of them in pieces, with their king Godigiscles, and would have put them all to the sword, had not the Alans and Suevians, hastening to their assistance, obliged the Franks to retire. Upon their retreat, the barbarians passed the Rhine without opposition, and entered Gaul. Thus Gregory of Tours, upon the authority of an ancient writer named Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus, the Vandals appointed Gonderic or Gontharius, the son of Godigiscles, king in his room. The following year, when Honorius was confud the seventh time, and Theodosius the second, the eastern empire enjoyed a profound tranquillity; but in the west the Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, committed dreadful ravages in Gaul, where they were joined by the Burgundians, and many other nations, stirred up, says Orosius, by Sulpichio. The first city that felt their fury was Mentz, which they took by storm, and levelled with the ground, after having inhumanly massacred many thousands of the inhabitants in the churches, to which they had fled for refuge. Worms held out for a considerable time; but was in the end taken, and laid in ashes. Strafsburg and Spires underwent the same fate. Thence they marched to Rheims, to Tournay, to Amiens, to Aras, made themselves masters of all Aquitain, Gascony, the provinces of Lions and Narbonne, and extended their ravages ravages from the Alps to the ocean, the governors of the provinces having no troops to oppose them; for Stilicho had withdrawn, as we have related above, the forces that guarded the banks of the Rhine, on occasion of the war with Alaric. The whole country, says St. Jerom, writing about this time, between the Alps and the Pyrenees, between the Rhine and the ocean, is over-run and pillaged by the Quadi, the Vandals, the Sarmatians, the Alans, the Greipæ, the Heruli, the Saxons, the Burgundians, and the Alemans.

In the mean time the Roman troops quartered in Britain, apprehending the barbarians would, after the entire reduction of Gaul, cross the sea, and jointly with the Scots and Irish, fall upon them, and expecting no assistance from Honorius, resolved to set up an emperor of their own; and accordingly conferred that dignity on one Mark, whom after a few days they murdered, upon some dislike, and placed Gratian, a native of Britain, in his room. Gratian, after a short reign of four months, underwent the same fate, and was succeeded by Constantine, a common soldier, who was chosen merely for the sake of his name, which was common to him with Constantine the great, who being advanced to the imperial dignity in Britain, had made himself master of the whole empire, and governed it with great prosperity and success. The new prince, immediately after his promotion, passed over into Gaul, taking with him all the Roman forces quartered in the island, and the flower of the Britsh youth; by which means the country, thus left quite naked and defenceless, was not long after obliged to submit to the yoke of new lords. Constantine landed at Bologna, and continued there, till he was joined by the Roman troops, who were dispersed up and down Gaul, and who chose rather to submit to him, than to the barbarians. Hereupon Limenius, prefect of Gaul, and Cariobaudes, commander of the Roman forces, fled into Italy, leaving the barbarians to waste the country on one side, and Constantine to pursue his success on the other. Honorius, who was at Rome when news of this revolt was brought him, immediately dispatched an express to Stilicho then at Ravenna, who hastening to Rome, ordered Sarus, by nation a Goth, but an officer of known valour, bold an enterprising, to march with a sufficient force into into Gaul, and make head against the usurper. Sarus was met on the frontiers of Gaul by Juffin, one of Constantine’s commanders, whom he easily defeated and killed, after having put to the sword the greatest part of his forces. He then led his men, encouraged with this success, to besiege Valence in Dauphiny, whither the usurper had retired. Upon his approach, Constantine sent Neobiagastes, another of his generals, to treat with him of an accommodation; but him Sarus caused to be murdered, contrary to the law of nations, and the afsurances he had given him; but Constantine having placed, in the room of the two generals he had lost, Edobincus and Gerontius, the former a Gaul, the latter of Britain, Sarus, says Zosimus with little appearance of truth, dreading their courage and experience, raised the siege of Valence, and retired in great haste. Constantine’s army pursued him to the Alps, over which he was obliged to purchase a passage of the Bagaudae, by quiting to them all his booty. However that be, it is certain, that Sarus raised the siege, and repassing the Alps with his army, returned to Italy. Upon his retreat, Constantine fixed his residence at Arles, overcame the barbarians in several battles, and in the end forced them to sue for peace; which he granted, without obliging them to quit Gaul, probably because he designed to maintain himself by their means in his usurped power. These disturbances did not prevent Honorius from enacting this year severe laws against the Donatists, Manichees, Phrygians, Priscillianists, and all sectaries in general. The following year 408, when Anicius Basilius and Flavius Philippus were consuls, is remarkable for many memorable events. In the east died at Constantinople, on the first of May, the emperor Arcadius, after having lived thirty-one years, and reigned twelve years with his father, and fourteen after his death, or rather thirteen years, three months, and fourteen days. He was buried near the emperor Eudoxia, in the church of the Apostles, where their tombs of porphyry were to be seen several ages after. He left behind him but one son, viz. Theodotius, then eight years old, but just weaned, says Sozomen. We shall examine elsewhere

where what we read in Procopius, viz. that Arcadius by his laft will appointed Isdegerdes, king of Persia, guardian to the young prince. We have observed in the history of his reign, that he had four daughters, Flaccilla, Pulcheria, Arcadia, and Marina: Flaccilla is never mentioned by historians but on occasion of her birth; whence we may conclude, that she died soon after. The other three embraced the state of virginity, and led exemplary lives. They were all styled queens, as appears from the councils; but only by courtesy; for, excepting Pulcheria, who was declared Augusta in 414, they had no other title but that of most noble. Arcadia and Marina built a palace at Constantinople, which for many ages retained their name. The former built likewise a church in honour of St. Andrew, which was many ages after, when become a monastery, re-built by Theodora, the niece of Michael Paleologus. Arcadia died in 444, and Marina on the third of August 449. Arcadius himself was a prince naturally inclined to virtue, and an enemy to vice, but of very slender parts, and therefore entirely governed, and shamefully imposed upon, by his ministers, and the empress, who abused his authority to oppress the people in a most despotic and tyrannical manner. To return to the west: Constantine, having reduced all Gaul to his obedience, sent a body of troops into Spain, in order to oppose Didymius, and Verianus or Verinianus, who having assembled the few troops that were quartered in that province, and reinforced them with such slaves and peasants as were willing to take arms, had seized on the pastures of the Pyrenees. Didymius and Verinianus were brothers, natives of Spain, and nearly allied to Honorius, for whom they openly declared, while most of the cities of that province were ready to revolt from him, and submit to the usurper. The troops that were first sent against them not being able to open themselves a passage through the Pyrenees, which were carefully guarded by the two brothers, Constantine obliged his eldest son, by name Constans, who professed a monastic life, to quit his retirement, created him Cæsar, and dispatched him with the flower of his army, commanded by Gerontius, an experienced officer, into Spain. Didymius and Verinianus defended the pastures for some time with great resolution and intrepidity; intrepidity; but being overpowered with numbers, were in the end obliged to retire. Constan tions pursued them close; and coming up with them in Lusitania, now Portugal, cut most of their men in pieces, and took both them and their wives prisoners. Upon the news of their defeat and captivity, their brothers Theodosius or Theodosiulus, and Lagedus, who had taken arms in another province, abandoned Spain to the usurper, and retired, the former to the court of Honorius, and the latter to that of Theodosius, who had succeeded his father Arcadius in the empire of the east. Constan tions, having thus reduced all Spain, and appointed Gerontius to command the army and guard the Pyrenees, returned to Gaul, where he presented the two illustrious captives to his father, who immediately ordered them to be privately put to death. To reward his son for his eminent services, he created him Augustus, honouring him, says Zosimus, with a diadem. At the same time he sent a solemn deputation to Honorius, excusing his revolt, as if he had been forced by the soldiery to accept of the sovereignty, and demanding to be acknowledge d by him as his partner in the empire. Honorius, not finding himself in a condition to make war upon the usurper, thought it advisable to comply with his request; and accordingly sent him the imperial purple, honouring him, at the same time, with the title of Augustus. Italy was at this time threatene d with a new invasion of the barbarians, under the con duct of the famous Alaric, who, at the instigation of Stilicho, leaving Pannonia and Dalmatia, where lands had been granted to him and his Goths, passed unexpectedly the Alps, and breaking into Noricum, threatened to invade Italy, and lay all waste before him, unless a certain sum, which he pretended to be due to him and his troops, were immediately sent him. Upon this demand, Honorius, who was then at Rome, assembled the senate, when several senators of great distinc tion were for rejecting his demand, and marching the army without delay against him, urging, that to comply with an arrogant and unreasonable demand was not buying a peace, but signing a contract of perpetual slavery. However Stilicho, who maintained a private correspondence with Ala cia and his party, pleading with great warmth in his favour, as if the money he demanded were really due, it was agreed, that four thousand pounds weight of gold should be sent him.

Lampadius, who had with great liberty of speech opposed this motion, and by that means incurred the displeasure of Stilicho, as soon as the Senate broke up, took sanctuary in a neighbouring church. A few days after Honorius, leaving Rome, set out for Bononia; whence, after a short stay, he removed to Ticinum, now Pavia, attended by one Olympius, who, by an outward show of Christian piety, says Zosimus, had gained the confidence of the emperor, and was by him employed about his person. As every one was now well apprised of the wicked designs of Stilicho, Olympius, thought himself obliged to disclose them to the emperor, which he did accordingly on the road from Bologna to Pavia, and so thoroughly convinced him of the treachery of his minister, that the prince, awaked, as it were, out of a deep lethargy, no sooner arrived at Pavia, than he dispatched an express to Ravenna, where Stilicho then was, with two different orders, the one commanding him to be secured, and the other to be put to death. Upon the arrival of the messenger, Stilicho took sanctuary in a church; but the next day, being, in the presence of the bishop, assured by the soldiers upon oath, that they had orders only to arrest him, he left his asylum, and delivered himself into their hands; which he had scarce done, when the messenger produced the warrant for his death; whereupon he was beheaded the same day, the twenty-third of August, of the present year 408. It was no sooner known at Pavia, that the emperor had ordered him to be arrested, than the army encamped there, encouraged by Olympius, says Zosimus, flew to arms, and in a tumultuous manner flew all those who were known to be well-affected to the disgraced general, and amongst the rest Limenius, prefect of Gaul, Charibaudes, commander of the troops in the same province, who had both been lately driven out of that province by Constantine, Longinius, formerly prefect of Italy, Vincentius, general of the horse, Salvius and Petronius, the one comes domesticorum, the other comes largitionum, another Salvius, who was questor, Nemorius, then magister officiorum, and many other persons of great distinction. All authors, except Zosimus and the poet Claudian, agree, that he was guilty of the crimes laid to his charge, viz. that he maintained a private correspondence with Alaric; that he invited the barbarians.

into Gaul, hoping the emperor would reward his eminent services, after he had driven them out, with assuming him for his colleague; that he had formed a design of murdering the two princes Honorius and Theodosius, and seizing on both empires for himself; that by a potion given to Honorius he prevented his having any issue, &c. But Zosimus pretends these crimes to have been all feigned by his enemies, in order to prejudice Honorius against him, and procure his ruin, to which the credulous prince in the end contented. The same writer adds, that, after his death, several of his friends were cruelly tortured, and amongst the rest Deuterus, the emperor's great chamberlain, and Peter his chief secretary, who died on the rack without owning any of the several charges that were brought against him or them as privy to his wicked designs. Stilicho professed the christian religion; but his son Eucherius was not only a pagan, but a professed enemy to the christians; may he used to brag amongst the pagans, says Orosius, who wrote about that time, that if he ever attained the empire, he would signalize the beginning of his reign with the restitution of the pagan, and utter extirpation of the christian, ceremonies. If what that author writes be true, the partiality which Zosimus, a zealous patron of paganism, shews for Stilicho and Eucherius, may be easily accounted for.

The emperor had married in the beginning of this year Thermantia, Stilicho's second daughter, Maria, his eldest daughter, whom Honorius had married in 398, being dead some years before; perhaps when the emperor was at Rome, in 404, for her body was discovered in the Vatican church on the fourth of February 1544, with several things of great value: her body, when exposed to the air, mouldered away; but the gold of her garments remaining, when the rest fell to ashes, weighed thirty-six pounds. Honorius married Thermantia at Rome, where the match was concluded by Serena, alluding, says Zosimus, to her husband Stilicho, who was averse to it as incestuous, that the other sister died a virgin. Upon the death of Stilicho, Honorius divorced his daughter, and sent her back untouched to her mother Serena. Zosimus writes, that she died soon after; but, according to the chronicle of Alexandria, dria, news of her death was brought to Constantinople on Friday the thirtieth of July 415. Her body too was found in the Vatican in 1543, adorned with the imperial robes, and all the ensigns of majesty. As for Eucherius, when he heard the news of his father’s death, he fled to a church for protection; but being dragged from thence by the emperor’s orders, he was sent under a strong guard to Rome, and there executed. Thus were the empire, says Orosius, and the church, by the death of a few persons, delivered from the wicked attempts of their enemies. However, we could wish for the reputation of Honorius, a pious and well-meaning prince, that the pretended criminals had been tried in due form; for such as suffer without being heard, have a right to be deemed innocent. All the ecclesiastic writers suppose Stilicho to have been guilty; but the crimes laid to his charge were never proved either in his life-time, or after his death; and hence Zosimus looks upon them as false imputations and groundless suspicions. Stilicho’s estate was confiscated, and likewise the estates of all his avowed partizans, and of such as had been preferred by him for money, and Heliocrates was sent to Rome to seize them which; commissio on he discharged with great humanity and good-nature, warning underhand those who were the leaf guilty to remove their effects out of the way: but his moderation cost him dear; for he was not only deprived of his commission, but sent in bonds to Ravenna, and would have been put to death, had he not found means to escape out of prison, and save himself in a church. Such was the end of Stilicho, after he had commanded in chief the Roman armies for the space of twenty-three years. He was no doubt a person of extraordinary qualities, a great statesman, a valiant soldier, and experienced officer. He gained such an ascendant over Honorius, who was blindly guided by his counsels, that, till the time of his disgrace, he governed with a more absolute sway, than the emperor himself. Zosimus, however partial to his memory, accuses him of rapine and oppression, of great partiality in the administration of justice, and of conveying by degrees into his own coffers the whole wealth of the empire. Stilicho was succeeded in the administration by Olympius, the chief author of his ruin. He was a native of the country.

try bordering on the Euxine sea, and not only professed the chritian religion, but outwardly affected an extraordinary piety, says Zosimus, intimating thereby, that his piety was counterfeit: but St. Auffin entertained a very favourable opinion of him, as appears from the commendations he bestows upon him; as did likewise Symmachus, tho’ a zealous pagan. Olympiodorus writes, that he owed his first preferment to Stilicho, who recommended him to Honorius; which would render the return he made that minister highly criminal, if he had any thing in view but the public welfare. He had in Stilicho’s life-time a considerable employment at court, and was after his death raised to the post of magister officiorum, or steward of the emperor’s household, one of the greatest employments in the state. Soon after his promotion, he wrote to St. Auffin, desiring that zealous prelate to suggest to him from time to time what he thought would conduce to the good of the church. In the very beginning of his administration, he caused several laws to be enacted against the pagans, Jews, and heretics, especially the Donatists in Africa. By a law dated the fourteenth of November, all those who were not of the catholic communion, or did not conform to the religion of the prince, were excluded from all employments at court. When this law was enacted, one of the chiefs of the barbarians in the Roman service, resigned his command; and his example, if Zosimus is to be credited, was followed by many others, who were either pagans or Arians. Amongst the several laws of this year, relating both to civil and ecclesiastical matters, one was enacted forbidding all persons of quality to trade, not that trade was by any means looked upon as degrading, but because others, in dealing with men of power and authority, were liable to be injured by them without redress.

When the Roman solders, quartered in the cities of Italy, heard of Stilicho’s death, they flew to arms, and, out of hatred to him, inhumanly murdered the wives and children of the barbarians, whom he had taken into the service, and whom they on that account looked upon as privy to his wicked designs, and public enemies. The barbarians, highly provoked, provoked at this unheard-of cruelty, vowed revenge; and quitting the emperor's service, retired, to the number of thirty thousand and upwards, to Alaric, who, tho' thus reinforced, sent deputies to Honorius, offering to conclude a lasting peace with him, and never more to disturb the tranquillity of the empire, provided he would fend him a sufficient sum to pay his army their arrears. Honorius refusing to comply with his demand, he dispatched an express to Athulphus or Athaulphus, his brother-in-law, who was quartered on the frontiers of Pannonia, ordering him to hasten with his troops, consisting of Goths and Hunns, into Italy. In the mean time, Alaric himself advancing with long marches from Noricum to the Po, crossed that river without opposition; and passing in sight of Ravenna, where the emperor then was, pursued his march almost without halting till he arrived at Rome, which he immediately invested, blocking up all the roads and avenues leading to it, and placing guards at the mouth and on the banks of the Tiber, to prevent the inhabitants from receiving any supplies or provisions by water.

By this means the city, which was crouded with people, was soon reduced to great distress; a famine began to rage, which was attended with a plague, arising from the great number of dead bodies that lay in the streets unburied. Olympiodorus writes, that the unhappy citizens were reduced to the fatal necessity of feeding upon human flesh, and devouring each other; and Zosimus, that they were almost brought to that extremity. During this calamity, the pagans, and among the rest Pompeianus, prefect of the city, began to cry aloud, that recourse ought to be had to the gods of their ancestors, who had so often relieved the city, and delivered it from the greatest dangers. Zosimus adds, that Innocent, at that time bishop of Rome, consented to their offering sacrifices to the gods, provided it were done privately; but that they were, notwithstanding his consent, afraid to perform the ceremony. Sozomen writes, that at the instigation of some Herulcan archons, they actually revived the ancient sacrifices; which were so far from relieving the city, that thenceforth it laboured under greater difficulties than ever. Be that as it will, the unhappy citizens were in the end obliged to send out deputies to treat with Alaric.

These

These were Basilius, who had been prefect of Rome in 395, and John, the emperor's first secretary. Alaric hearkened to their proposals, and agreed to raise the siege, and ever after continue faithful to the Romans, upon their delivering up hostages, and paying to him five thousand pounds weight of gold, thirty thousand of silver, four thousand silk garments, three thousand skins of purple dye, and as many pounds of pepper. For the raising of the required sum, the senators were taxed according to their estates; but as they had not so much ready money by them, that wicked genius, says Zosimus, which then governed the affairs of mankind, prompted those, who were concerned in levying the said sum, to the height of iniquity; for, to make good the deficiency, they had recourse to the ornaments of the temples and images of the gods: some of the latter, that were of gold or silver, they melted down, and among the rest that of Valour, which being destroyed, the antient Roman valour was utterly extinguished, as had been foretold by persons skilled in divine matters, and well versed in the rites and ceremonies of their country. The treaty was ratified by Honorius, and the sum thus raised sent to Alaric, who thereupon raised the siege, and retired with his army into Hetruria. When he first appeared before Rome, the senate, with the consent and approbation of Placidia, the emperor's sister, then in the city, caused Serena, the widow of Stilicho, to be put to death, upon a false supposition, says Zosimus, of her privately corresponding with the enemy. Læta, the widow of the emperor Gratian, and her mother Piffamene, signalized their good nature during the siege, relieving with great generosity, as Zosimus himself owns, the famished citizens.

While the western empire was thus miserably harassed by the barbarians, and rent into two empires by the usurpation of Constantine, whom Honorius had been obliged to acknowledge for his partner in the sovereignty, a profound peace reigned over all the provinces subject to young Theodotius, though not yet eight years old. They were chiefly indebted for the happiness they enjoyed to Anthemius, who taking upon him the administration, discharged the office of prime minister with an integrity hardly to be matched in history. He was grandson to Philippus, who had been prefect of the east.

east under Constantius, which office Anthemiuss himself discharged from the year 405, to 414. Ammiianus Marcellinus mentions one Simplicius, the son of Anthemiuss the elder, and probably the father of Anthemiuss the younger, who was disgraced in 359. The latter was magister officiorum before the year 404, embassador to the king of Persia before the year 405, consul in that year, and soon after praefectus praetorio. He had at least one daughter, who was married to Procopius, by whom she had Anthemiuss, advanced to the empire in 465. Anthemiuss, who governed the eastern empire during the minority of Theodosius, is commended by all the writers of those times as an experienced commander, an able statesman, a zealous christian, and one who had nothing so much at heart as the glory of his prince and the happiness of the people. He was, says Synesius, who constantly styles him the great Anthemiuss, in my opinion, and in that of all men the greatest, the best, the most virtuous, disinterested, and well-meaning minister, that ever governed a state. Procopius writes, that Arcadius, either distrusting his brother Honorius, or apprised that the distracted state of his own affairs would divert him from minding those of the east, begged in his will Idefgerdes, king of Persia, with whom he had entered into a strict alliance, to take upon him the care and tuition of the young prince: the same writer adds, that Idefgerdes, who was a prince of great generosity, sent embassadors to acquaint the senate of Constantinople, that he accepted the charge, and was resolved to make war upon such as should presume to raise disturbances in the state. Theophanes, who wrote after Procopius, and has borrowed from him the greatest part of his history, adds, that Idefgerdes, not being at leisure to attend the administration in person, sent Antiochus to Constantinople in his room, a person of extraordinary abilities, and of an unblemished character, who discharged the trust reposed in him with the greatest integrity till the year 414, when Pulcheria taking upon her the administration, he was deprived of his authority, and even of his life. Zonaras follows Procopius and Theophanes, as does likewise Cedrenus. It is surprizing, that such an event, one one of the most remarkable in history, should by no historian be taken notice of before Procopius, who wrote an hundred and fifty years after, and is often guilty of no small mistakes, being misled by popular and ill-grounded traditions, among which we may reckon this supposed last will of Arcadius; for Agathias tells us, that it was the common talk, having been handed down by tradition from father to son; but that he found it vouched by no writer, except Procopius, not even by those who had given a particular account of the death of Arcadius.  And truly Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Zosimus, Philostorgius, both Prophers, and Marcellinus, take not the least notice of this memorable transaction.  Isidore of Pelusium and Synesius mention an eunuch, by name Antiochus, who passing from the service of a Persian lord, named Narses, to that of Theodosius II. became preceptor to the young prince; which perhaps gave rise to the above-mentioned tradition.  This year the Hunns and Squiri, or Scyri, a northern nation, broke suddenly into Thrace, under the conduct of Uldin, of whom we have made mention above; but some of their officers abandoning them to join the Romans, they retired with great precipitation: however, the emperor’s troops, coming up with the Squiri before they could reach the Danube, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and took the rest prisoners.  By this overthrow, that nation was almost utterly extirpated.

The next confus were Honorius, the eighth time, and Theodosius, the third.  In Gaul, Constantine, who reigned there, caufed himself to be acknowledged conful in the room of Theodosius.  As Honorius, under various pretences, declined delivering up to Alaric the promised hostages, and executing some other articles of the treaty not mentioned by historians, the senate sent Attalus, Cæcilius, and Maximianus or Maximilianus, to represent to him in their name the evils that might thence accrue to the empire, especially to the capital.  But their remonstrances were utterly disregarded by the emperor, misled, says Zosimus, by Olympus and Alaric’s enemies at court.  However, he raised Attalus to the post of comes lagistinum, and Cæcilius to that of praefectus praetorio.  In the mean time, Alaric, provoked at the emperor’s backwardness in complying with the articles of the late treaty, left Hetruria, and approaching Rome, blocked blocked it up a second time, his army being reinforced with forty thousand slaves, who had made their escape out of the city. Honorius sent six thousand chosen troops to the defence of the city; but they were intercepted by Alaric’s parties, and all either cut off, or taken prisoners, except Valens, their commander, Attalus, and about an hundred more, who with much ado got into Rome. Maximilianus, one of the prisoners, was ransomed by his father with thirty thousand pieces of gold. Zosimus writes, that the six thousand men sent by Honorius to defend the city, made up five legions; so that a legion at this time consisted but of twelve hundred men. In the mean time, Ataulphus, whom Alaric had sent for, as we have observed above, was advancing to join him; and had already passed the Julian Alps, and entered the province of Venetia, when Honorius dispatched against him all the forces quartered in the neighbouring towns, who cut in pieces eleven hundred of his men, with the loss only of fifteen; but notwithstanding this check, Ataulphus pur sued his march, and joined Alaric. About this time, Olympius, the prime minister, was disgraced, de vested of all his honours, and discharged, the eunuchs of the court blaming him to the emperor as the author of the present calamities. He was succeeded by Jovius, then prefect of Italy, a person highly commended by Zosimus, which gives us room to believe him to have been a pagan; for he is scarce ever so lavish of his praises on those who professed the Christian religion. With Olympius several other officers were changed. Attalus was made prefect of Rome, andDemetrius comes larginionum, or treasurer, in his place. The soldiers, mutinying at Ravenna, demanded the heads of the two generals Turpilio and Vigilantius, and likewise of Terentius and Arsacius, the emperor’s two first chamberlains.

Hereupon the timorous prince, at the instigation of Jovius, perhaps the author of the tumult, ordered the two generals to be conveyed on board a vessel, in order to be sent into exile; but the soldiers, who were charged to conduct them, put them both to death. Terentius was banished into the east, and Arsacius confined to the city of Milan. Eusebius was made great chamberlain in the room of Terentius; Valens succeeded Turpilio in the post of general of the horse; and the office of comes domelicorum, held by Vigilantius, was was given to Ellebichus or Allobichus. These were all creatures of Jovius, whose authority was thus thoroughly established. At the same time, Generides, by birth a barbarian, was appointed general of the troops quartered in Rhetia, Noricum, Dalmatia, and Pannonia; which countries he procured with great fidelity against the barbarians, who attempted to invade them. Zosimus writes, that he was a pagan, and that for his sake Honorius revoked the law excluding the pagans from all employments. The same law was revoked with respect to heretics, especially the Donatists, to whom some churches were restored, which had been formerly taken from them, the emperor following therein the advice of Jovius, of Heraclianus, count of Africa, and of Macrobius, the author of the Saturnalia, as is commonly believed, at that time proconsul of Africa.

A l a r i c being returned before Rome, as we have observed above, the senate sent a second deputation to the emperor, pressing him to execute the articles of a treaty, which he himself had ratified. Alaric approved of this step, and appointed a body of Goths to escort the deputies, among whom was Innocent, bishop of the city. At the same time, Alaric, by the advice of Jovius, with whom he had been intimately acquainted in Epirus, advanced with part of his army to Ariminum or Rimini, that he might be nearer at hand to treat with the emperor, then at Ravenna. Jovius himself met him at Rimini; and, after some conferences with him, wrote to court, advising the emperor to comply with the articles formerly agreed to; or if he thought them unreasonable, to satisfy Alaric by preferring him to the post of commander in chief of all the Roman forces. To this letter the emperor answered, that he was resolved never to prefer Alaric, nor any of his people. The emperor’s letter being delivered to Jovius, while he was in Alaric’s tent, and he with the utmost imprudence reading it aloud, Alaric was so provoked at the prince’s declaration, that he immediately decamped, bending his march towards Rome; but soon after, changing his mind, he sent some bishops to Honorius, with very moderate proposals; for he offered to enter into a perpetual alliance with Honorius, and to defend the empire against all invaders, provided he would only lend him a small sum to pay his men their arrears, that they might not mutiny when disbanded, and

and allow them to settle in Rhaetia and Noricum, which provinces paid but an inconsiderable tribute, and nevertheless obliged the emperor, as they were exposed to the incursions of the neighbouring barbarians, to maintain numerous armies to defend them, which he took upon himself to do, without putting the empire to the least charge. These proposals, however reasonable, were rejected; Jovius having, by a second fault, cut off all means of an accommodation; for, apprehending the emperor might, from his late imprudent conduct, suspect him of privately favouring Alaric, he over-acted the contrary part, inducing the emperor to swear that he would never make peace, but wage perpetual war with Alaric: this he swore himself by the emperor’s head, and obliged all the officers both civil and military to take the same oath. Alaric, tho’ informed of these unaccountable proceedings, sent back the bishops to Ravenna, earnestly entreating the emperor, who had not sufficient forces to withstand him, not to suffer that stately metropolis, which for so many ages had been revered by all nations as mistress of the world, to become a prey to her enemies. But the emperor continuing obstinate in his former resolution, Alaric pursu’d his march to Rome; and, approaching the city, acquainted the inhabitants with the emperor’s invincible obstinacy, inviting them at the same time to consult their own safety by joining him against Honorius. This proposal they rejected at first with indignation; but Alaric having, after a few days siege, taken the castle at the mouth of the Tiber, in which all the public provisions were lodged, they immediately opened their gates, and received him into the city, which he entered attended by a small guard, and obliged the citizens to renounce their allegiance to Honorius, and acknowledge, not himself, as he might have easily done, but Attalus, then prefect of the city, for emperor. Attalus was a native of Ionia, and greatly beloved by Alaric and his Goths, because he had been baptized by Segisbertus their bishop, and consequently professed the doctrine of Arius, tho’ he was in his heart a pagan, according to Philostorgius. Attalus, thus created emperor by Alaric, made him in return commander in chief of all his forces, and Ataulphus his comes domesticorum, distributing the other great employments amongst mongst pagans and Arians. At it was a matter of the utmoft importance to secure Africa, whence Rome was supplied with provisions, Alaric advised the new emperor to fend thither without delay a considerable body of troops under the conduct of Drumas, who was by nation a Goth, but an officer of great experience and address: but Attalus, contrary to the advice of Alaric, sent one Constantine or Constans, a person quite unacquainted with military affairs, and with him but a small number of troops, being affurred by the aruspices, says Sozomen, that Africa would immediately submit. But Constantine was upon his first landing cut off with all his men by Heraclianus, who took care to place guards in all the ports of Africa, that no corn might be thence convoyed to Rome, which by that means was soon reduced to great straights. In the mean time, Attalus, without waiting for news from Africa, set out from Rome with the succours he received from Alaric, with a design to besiege the emperor in Ravenna, who, alarmed at his motions, dispatched Jovius, the prime minister, Valens, general of the foot, Potamus, the quaeftor, and Julian, his first secretary, to wait his arrival at Rimina, and acquaint him, that the emperor was willing to acknowledge him as his partner in the empire. But Attalus would only grant Honorius his life, and the liberty of retiring to what island he pleased. Jovius, in a private conference with Attalus, not only advised him to insist upon these terms, but suggested to him, that he ought to main the emperor so as to prevent his having issue; which wicked suggestion was rejected with horror, if Olympiodorus is to be credited, by Attalus himself. That treacherous minister returned to court; but being sent back to the ufurper with new proposals, he continued with him. Honorius, finding himself thus betrayed by his friends, and no-ways in a condition to oppose so many enemies at once, resolved to abandon Ravenna and retire by sea into the caft; but was diverted from that resolution by the seasonable arrival of four thousand men, sent him by his nephew Theodosius, which encouraged him to continue at Ravenna, and there wait the issue of the war in Africa. And truly his arms were attended there with uncommon success; for Attalus having, after the death of Constans, sent thither a body of troops far more numerous than the first, Heraclianus cut them likewise in pieces; and not

not only continued to keep the ports blocked up, so that no provisions could be conveyed to Rome, but sent a reasonable supply of money to Honorius, which he immediately distributed among the soldiery, and by that means re-established his affairs. In the mean time, Alaric reduced all the cities of Liguria and Æmilia, except Bononia, which he was obliged to abandon, after having lain a considerable time before it. He caused Attalus to be every-where proclaimed emperor, and obliged the people to swear allegiance to him.

While these things passed in Italy, Gerontius, to whom Constantine, the son of Constantine, had committed the government of Spain, as we have related above, revolting, upon some disgust, from Constantine, set up one Maximus for emperor, whom Olympiodorus supposed to have been his son, while other writers style him his client or creature. Orosius speaks of him as a person of a mean extractions, and altogether unknown. It was no sooner known in Gaul, that Gerontius had revolted, than the Vandals, Suevians, Alans, and other barbarians, whom Constantine had suffered to remain in that province, as we have related above, flew to arms, probably at the instigation of the new usurper, and made themselves masters of several cities. The people, finding themselves thus harassed by the barbarians, and expecting no relief either from Honorius or Constantine, resolved to defend themselves. The Britons were the first, who, falling off from the empire, established a new form of government among themselves, after having driven out the barbarians, the Germans, according to Zosimus, but more likely the Scots, or Irifh, who had invaded their country. Thus they continued a free people till the year 421, 422, when, overpowered by their warlike neighbours the Scots, they were forced to implore the protection of the emperor, and submit anew to the laws of the empire, as we shall relate hereafter. All the Armorici, says Zosimus, that is, in the language of the Gauls, the maritime people, followed the example of the Britons, and, shaking off the Roman yoke, gave rise to a new state and government, which, notwithstanding all their efforts, proved but short-lived. The barbarians, meeting with greater opposition than they expected from the inhabitants of Gaul, who had taken arms in their own own defence, and acquainted with the distracted state of Spain, which was represented to them as a wealthy and fruitful country, resolved to try whether they could settle there. With this design, the Vandals, the Alans and Suevians bent their march towards the Pyrenees, which they passed without opposition, the guards, who had been placed there by Geroncius to defend the narrow passes, either retiring at the approach of such multitudes, or joining them. Thus the barbarians first entered Spain in 409, on a Tuesday, says Idatius, the twenty-eighth of September; or the thirteenth of October; but in the year 409, the 13th of October fell on a Wednesday. The passes of the Pyrenees being once opened, the barbarians, who had over-run Gaul, powered in swarms into Spain, and there made themselves masters of several cities and strong-holds, defeated the troops which Constantine had sent, under the conduct of his son Constans, to suppress the rebellion of Geroncius, and obliged Constans himself to abandon the country, and retire to his father at Arles. As for Geroncius, they entered into a kind of alliance with him against their common enemy Constantine. The barbarians, having no enemy to oppose them, after the retreat of Constans, over-ran the whole country, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties; which the reader will find described at length by Idatius, who, in this very century, was bishop of a city in Spain. Olympiodorus writes, that the Romans, who had taken refuge in some strong-holds, were reduced to the dreadful necessity of feeding upon one another; and adds, that a mother, who had four children, killed and devoured them all; for which unnatural cruelty she was stoned to death by the populace. The barbarians continued their ravages, putting all to fire and sword, till the year 411, when, being absolute masters of the country, they applied themselves to the tilling of the ground, and other works of agriculture, after having divided among themselves by lot the Spanish provinces. In that division Galicia fell to the Vandals and Suevians, the former having Gonderic for their king, and the latter Ermeric; Lusitania, and the province of Carthagena, to the Alans; Bœtica to the Silingi, who were likewise Vandals, and are supposed to have given to their lot the name of Wandalusia, which

which was afterwards changed into that of Andalufia. Such of the natives as had the good luck to escape the general slaughter, submitted to the barbarians, who, touching the holy book of the gospels, swore, that they would treat them for the future as their friends and allies; which oath they observed so religiously, that the Romans chose to live in poverty, says Orosius, under the barbarians, rather than to return into the dominions of the empire. The inhabitants of Galicia, however, maintained their liberty, and formed a new state in a corner of that province, where they were often attacked, but without success, by Emeric or Ermeric, king of the Suevians. Nothing happened this year in the east worthy of notice, except a tumult at Constantinople, where the people, rising on account of the scarcity of bread, burnt the house of Monaxies, prefect of the city; but the senators and other wealthy citizens, having, by voluntary contributions, raised a large sum for the relief of the poor, and the bakers being publicly whipt through the city, as was frequently practised when bread grew dear, the tumult was quelled.

The following year 410, when Varanes alone was consul, is remarkable for the taking of Rome by Alaric. Varanes began his consulship at Constantinople; but the western empire, especially the city of Rome, was involved in such troubles, that Honorius was not at leisure to think of a consul. Attalus, however, raised Tertullus, a pagan, to that dignity; but he was acknowledged only by the partizans of the usurper: whence Varanes alone is named consul in the fasti and in the laws, some of which are dated thus; the year after the eighth consulship of Honorius, and the third of Theodosius. As Heraclian continued to keep the ports of Africa blocked up, and the lands in Italy had not been tilled for several years, by reason of the wars, the Roman people were reduced to feed upon chestnuts; nay, human flesh was publicly sold, and several mothers were said to have devoured their children. This obliged both Alaric and Attalus to hasten to Rome, in order to advise with the senate about the proper means of supplying the city. Most part of the senators were for sending into Africa a body of Goths, Alaric engaging, that that Drumas, one of his officers, would reduce it with five hundred only; but Attalus openly declared, that he would not by any means employ Goths in that war; which so piqued Alaric, who had already began to look upon Attalus as none no-ways qualified for the high station to which he had raised him, that he resolved to depose him, left, by his obstinacy and imprudence, he should quite ruin his affairs. He was confirmed in this resolution by Jovius, who persuaded him, that Attalus, scorn enough to depend upon him, and to hold the empire upon precarious terms, was determined to destroy him. This conduct of Jovius has induced some writers to believe, that he maintained a private correspondence with Honorius; nay, that he abandoned him with no other view but to betray Attalus. Be that as it will, Alaric, finding the new emperor unequal to so great a charge, and provoked at his late declaration and misconduct with respect to the affairs of Africa, sent deputies once more to Honorius, with very reasonable terms; which the emperor seeming inclined to comply with, Alaric publicly stripped the mock prince of all the badges of sovereignty, and sent them to Honorius. He would not, however, deliver up either Attalus, or his son Ampelius; but insinuated upon their being pardoned, since their crime was owing more to him than to them. Attalus being thus deposed, Alaric approached Ravenna, and stopped at a place called the Alps, about nine miles from that city, in order to put the last hand to the treaty of accommodation between him and the emperor. But this peaceable face of affairs was soon changed by an unlucky and unforeseen accident: Sarus the Goth, of whom we have made frequent mention, commanded a body of three hundred men in Picenum, without declaring either for Honorius or Alaric. However, Ataulphus, who bore him an irreconcilable hatred, resolved to destroy him, and with this view marched at the head of a strong party against him; which obliged him to declare for Honorius, and retire to Ravenna. Olympiodorus writes, that Alaric was so provoked at the kind reception Sarus met with from the emperor, that he would hearken to no terms. On the other hand, Sozomen tells us, that Sarus, apprehending a peace would be prejudicial to him, fell unexpectedly upon the Goths, and put some of them to the sword. However that be, it is certain, that Alaric departed in a great rage from the neighbourhood of Ravenna, and returned to his army, encamped near Rome, as soon as Sarus had joined the emperor, restoring the purple, and other badges of majesty to Attalus; but in a few days degrading him anew, as if he designed to traduce and expose to ridicule the imperial dignity. Socrates writes, that having shewed him to the soldiery, with all the ensigns of sovereignty, he exposed him the very next day to public view in the dress of a slave. To this was the majesty of the Roman empire now reduced. Alaric no sooner arrived before Rome, than he blocked it up on all sides, and by that means, as provisions were already very scarce, reduced it in a few days to the utmost extremity. Some authors, and among the rest, St. Jerom write, that it held out a long time; while others say, Alaric reduced it with such expedition, that Honorius, when told by one of his courtiers, that Rome was lost, understood him of a favourite cock bearing that name, not being yet informed, that the city of Rome was besieged. There is likewise a disagreement among authors as to the manner in which it was taken. Procopius writes, that Proba, an illustrious Roman matron, pitting the unhappy condition of the people, reduced by the famine that had long raged in the city to the fatal necessity of devouring one another, opened the gates in the nighttime to the enemy. Sozomen says it was taken by treachery, without explaining himself farther; but Orofius ues the word irruption, which seems to import, that the enemy broke in by force, or took the city by assault. Be that as it will, that proud and haughty city, styled the metropolis of the universe, after having triumphed over so many nations, and extended her dominions from one end of the known world to the other, was, on the twenty-fourth of August of the present year 410, taken by a barbarian, who had not a foot of ground which he could properly call his own. As she had, for the space of one thousand one hundred and sixty-three years, pillaged the rest of the world, and enriched herself with the spoils of the plundered nations, she underwent in the end the same fate, and suffered in her turn the same calamities, which she had brought upon others. Alaric, when upon the point of breaking into the city, addressing his soldiers,

soldiers, told them, That all the wealth lodged in it was theirs, and therefore he gave them full liberty to seize it; but at the same time he strictly enjoined them to shed the blood of none but such as they should find in arms, and above all to spare those who should take sanctuary in the holy places, especially in the churches of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, which he named, because they were more spacious, and consequently capable of affording an asylum to great numbers of people. Having given these orders, he abandoned the city to the Goths, who treated it no better, according to St. Jerom, than the Greeks are said to have treated antient Troy \( b \); for, after having plundered it for the space of three, or, as others will have it, of six, days, they set fire to it in several places; so that the stately palace of Sallust, and many other magnificent buildings, were reduced to ashes; nay, Procopius writes, that there was not in the whole city one house left entire \( c \); and both St. Jerom \( d \) and Philostorgius \( e \), that the great metropolis of the empire was reduced to an heap of ashes and ruins. Tho' many of the Goths, pursuant to the orders of their general, refrained from shedding the blood of such as made no resistance, yet others, more cruel and blood-thirsty, massacred all they met; so that the streets in some quarters of the city were seen covered with heaps of dead bodies, and swimming in blood \( f \). However, not the least injury was offered to those who had fled to the churches; nay, the Goths themselves conveyed thither, as to places of safety, such as they were desirous should be spared \( g \). Many of the statues of the gods that had been left entire by the emperors, as excellent pieces of art, were on this occasion destroyed, either by the Goths, who, tho' Moffly Arians, were zealous christians, or by a dreadful storm of thunder and lightning, which fell at the same time upon the city, as if it had been sent on purpose to complete, with them, the destruction of idolatry, and abolish the small remains of pagan superstition \( h \). The learned bishop of Meaux wrote a famous treatise, shewing, that the taking of Rome by Alaric may be looked upon as one of the chief mysteries foretold by John in his revelations \( i \). The pagans ascribed the calamities which Rome suffered on this occasion, to its having banished the gods, by whom it had been often protected against far more more powerful enemies. These calamities St. Austin fully confuted in his 81st, 105th and 106th sermons, in another intitled of the destruction of the city of Rome, and in his great work de civitate Dei, wherein he shews, that Rome had suffered far greater calamities before it embraced the true faith, and that it was preferred by the Christian religion from utter destruction.

CHAP. XXX.

The history of Rome, from the taking of the city by the Goths, to the death of Theodosius II.

ALARIC, having fluid, according to some, six, according to others, only three, days in Rome, retired from thence into Campania, carrying with him immense wealth, and a great number of captives, among whom was Placidia, the sister of Honorius, whom he treated with all the respect due to her rank and sex. After he ravaged and laid waste Campania, Lucania, Samnium, Apulia, Calabria, and the country of the Bruttii, he approached the shores of Sicily, with a design to pass over into that island, and thence into Africa, which he intended to reduce; but the fleet he had prepared for that purpose being shipwrecked in the straits, he continued in the neighbourhood of Rhegium, deliberating what further measures he was to take; but before he came to any resolution, he was suddenly seized with a fit of sickness, which carried him off in a few days. The Goths were deeply concerned for the death of their king, (for they had given him that title, as we have observed above) and fearing the Romans should offer some indignity to his bones, they turned the course of the Bufento near Cosenza in the Farther Calabria; and having buried him, with many rich spoils brought from Rome, in the bed of the river, river, they restored the waters to their natural current, and killed all the slaves they had employed in the work. After this they chose Ataulphus king in his room. He was brother-in-law to the deceased prince, who had married his sister. Jornandes writes, that he returned to Rome, and pillaged that city a second time. But of this second destruction of Rome, as he styles it, no mention is made by any of the writers who flourished at that time. While the barbarians were thus ravaging Italy on one side, Constantine, leaving Gaul, where he reigned, entered it on the other, giving out, that he was marching to the assistance of Honorius, tho' his real design was to strip him of the few provinces that were left him. With this view he was already advanced as far as Verona; but while he was preparing to pass the Po, in order to march to Ravenna, and there confer as he pretended, with the emperor about the most proper measures in the present juncture, he received news of the unhappy, but deserving, end of Alabicus or Allobicus, one of Honorius's generals, whom that prince had caused to be put to death, upon a well grounded suspicion of his privately corresponding with the usurper. This Constantine no sooner understood, than he repassed in great haste the Alps, and retired to Arles, where he found his son Constanus driven out of Spain by the above-mentioned barbarians. Geroncius, who had joined them against him pursued him into Gaul; which obliged Constantine to send Eobicus, one of his generals, to procure supplies among the Franks and Germans, and to commit the guard of Vienne, and the other cities on the Rhone, to his son Constanus. But Geroncius, arriving in the mean time before Vienne, took the place; and having put Constanus, whom he found in it, to death, advanced without opposition to Arles, and there closely besieged Constantine himself. While the western empire was thus involved in endless calamities, the provinces all over the east enjoyed a profound peace under the wise administration of Anthemiuss; so that nothing remarkable happened there, except the disgrace of one Andronicus, governor of the Pentapolis, who, by his tyrannical extortions, deserved to be first excommunicated by Synesius bishop of Ptolemais, the metropolis of that province, and afterwards removed by Anthemiuss from his government.

The following year 411, Theodosius alone was the fourth time consul, Honorius being diverted, by the troubles in the west, from naming any one to that dignity. This year Honorius sent Constantius, an officer of great experience and address, and inviolably attached to the interest of his prince, into Gaul, with what troops he could spare, to make war upon Constantine, whom, after his entering Italy, the emperor no longer looked upon as his partner in the empire, but as a public enemy. Constantius was not by birth a barbarian, but a Roman; that is, he was born a subject of the empire, according to Olympiodorus, in the city of Panaiia in Illyricum. Valesius, supposes, upon what authority we know not, that he was a native of Naissus in Dacia, the birth-place of Constantine the Great. He was a man of extraordinary parts, well-shaped in his person, agreeable in conversation, frank, generous, an enemy to all dissimulation and restraint, disinterested, brave, and equally capable of commanding an army, and governing the state. He was no sooner named for this expedition, than he set out at the head of a considerable army from Gaul, where he was joined upon his first arrival by most of the troops of Gerontius, then busied in reducing the city of Arles, in which was Constantine himself, as we have related above. Gerontius, finding himself abandoned by his men, raised the siege in great haste, and fled into Spain, where the few soldiers who attended him, provoked at his unseasonable severity, attacked him in the house where he was lodged; which he defended, tho' assisted only by one friend, and a few slaves, with great resolution and intrepidity, killing three hundred of the aggressors. In the end the slaves, consulting their own safety, made their escape, which Gerontius too might have easily done, had he been able to prevail upon himself to forswear his wife, whom he tenderly loved. When he found himself overpowered, he resolved to lay violent hands on himself. His wife, by name Nonnichia, apprized of this resolution, earnestly entreated him to put her to death rather than suffer her to fall into the hands of the incensed soldiery. Moved with her tears, he first dispatched her, then his friend, and lastly himself. It is surprising, that Sozomen should commend this in Nonnichia, as an action worthy of the Christian religion.

religion, which the professed. As for Maximus, whom Geroncius had set up for emperor, as we have related above, he was secured by his own men, and brought to Constantius, who stripped him of his ensigns of majesty, but spared his life, looking upon him as a person of himself inoffensive, and incapable of giving the least umbrage. He retired into Spain amongst the barbarians, and was still alive when Orosius wrote his history, that is, in 417. To return to Constantius: he pursued the siege of Arles, which Geroncius had begun. Constantine, who was in the place with his second son, by name Julian, held out for the space of four months, in expectation of the succours which Edobicius was sent to procure amongst the Franks, and other German nations. Edobicius arrived at length, at the head of an army far more numerous than that of Constantius; which so terrified the emperor's generals, that they were for abandoning the siege, and retreating into Italy. But their retreat being cut off by the enemy, they were forced to put the whole to the issue of a battle. Ulphihas therefore, who commanded under Constantius, passing the Rhone with a strong detachment of foot, concealed himself among the woods, till the enemy passed, and were ready to engage Constantius; when falling unexpectedly upon their rear, while Constantius charged them in front, they were immediately put to the rout. Edobicius fled to the house of a Gaulish lord, by name Ecdices, who, notwithstanding the many favours he had received at his hands, struck off his head, and carried it to Constantius, who ordered the traitor to depart the camp that instant, lest his presence should draw down from heaven some misfortune upon the whole army. Constantius returned without loss of time before Arles, which still held out with great obstinacy, till news being brought to the Roman camp that Jovinus, having usurped the imperial title in Farther Gaul, was advancing full march to Arles, at the head of a formidable army, consisting of Alemans, Franks, Burgundians, and Alans, with a design to fall on the emperor's army. Upon this intelligence, Constantius thought it advisable to comply with the terms which had been proposed before by the besieged, but rejected by him, viz. to grant a general indemnity, and to promise upon oath, that the lives of Constantine and Julian should be spared. Hereupon the gates were opened, open, and the victorious army received into the town. Constantine had some time before devested himself of the purple, and taking sanctuary in a church, caused himself to be ordained priest, thinking that character would screen him from the emperor's just resentment. Constantius nevertheless caueth both him and his son to be secured, and sent into Italy, where they were, by the emperor's orders, beheaded about thirty miles from Ravenna. Honorius would not grant them their lives, because they had put to death his two cousins Didymius and Veriniarius; but as they had been promised indemnity by his lieutenant, the christian as well as the pagan writers look upon this action as a breach of faith unworthy of a prince. About the same time that Constantine devested himself of the purple, Jovinus, or, as he is styled by Sozomen and Philostorgius, Jovianus, assumed it at Mundiaceum, says Olympiodorus; which some take to be Mentz. He was descended from one of the most illustrious families in Gaul, and is said to have caueth himself to be proclaimed emperor at the instigation of Goar king of the Alans, and Guntarius, or Gondicarius prince of the Burgundi-ans. It appears from his medals, that he made himself master of Treves; but his reign was short-lived, as we shall see anon. In the east, the tranquillity which the people had long enjoyed there, was disturbed this year by the Ausrnians, a Moorish nation, who, breaking into the Pentapolis, laid waste that province; but were soon driven out by Anyfius, who had succeeded Andronicus in that government. The Saracens likewise committed great disorders on the frontiers of Egypt, Palestine, Phoenicia, and Syria; but retired of their own accord.

The following year 412, when Honorius was consul the ninth time, and Theodosius the fifth, the Goths at length left Italy, either in virtue of a treaty between Honorius and Ataulphus their new king, as Jornandes seems to suppose, or because they had already quite drained that country of its wealth, which from the sequel of the history, appears more probable. However that be, quitting Italy, they broke into Gaul, ravaging the countries through which they passed. Upon their arrival in that province, Attalus, whom Ataulphus had brought thither with him, advised the Goth to join Jovinus against Honorius, and divide Gaul between them.

Ataulphus and Jovinus met upon that proposal; but all we know of their interview is, that Jovinus was not at all pleased to see Ataulphus and his Goths in Gaul. Sarus, whom we have often mentioned, having about this time revolted from Honorius, because he refused to punish the authors of the murder of one of his officers, by name Bellerid, was going into Gaul, to offer his service to Jovinus; which coming to the ears of Ataulphus, his implacable enemy, he went to meet him at the head of a thousand men. Sarus, tho' attended only by twenty persons, defended himself with such resolution, that it was with the utmost difficulty he was taken alive, after having killed with his own hand great numbers of the enemy. Ataulphus caused him soon after to be put to death, which as he was a brave and experienced officer, created a misunderstanding between Jovinus and Ataulphus. Jovinus soon after took his brother Sebastian for his partner in the empire, contrary to the opinion of Ataulphus, who was so provoked at his promotion, that he dispatched privately deputies to Honorius, offering to restore to him his sister Placidia, and to send him the heads of the two usurpers, provided he would supply his men with a certain quantity of corn. The emperor having readily complied with his demand, Ataulphus soon found an opportunity of dispatching Sebastian; but Jovinus, upon the news of his death, fled to Valence, where he was closely besieg'd, and in the end forced to submit to Ataulphus, who delivered him up to Dardanus, prefect of Gaul, by whose orders he was put to death at Narbonne. Idatius ascribes the defeat of the two usurpers to the generals of Honorius, who had perhaps joined Ataulphus. Dardanus, at this time prefect of Gaul, is highly commended by St. Jerom and St. Auffin, who wrote several letters to him; but Apollinaris Sidonius, who is likewise honoured with the title of saint, paints him as a person of a most infamous character, in whom centered all the vices of the three usurpers Constantine, Jovinus and Geroncius (O). This year Theodofius, or rather Anthemius, caused the walls of the frontier towns of Illyricum to be repaired.

(O) From an antient inscriptions discovered near Siferon in Provence, it appears, that Dardanus, or Claudius Postumius Dardanus, as he is styled there, had been governor of Vienne, and

The next consuls were Lucius and Heraclianus: but the name of the latter was erased out of the safti; for he revolted this very year from Honorius, and causing himself to be proclaimed emperor in Africa, which he had with so much bravery defended against Attalus, he equipped a fleet there of seven hundred sail, according to some, of three thousand seven hundred, according to others, if there is no mistake in the numbers. Orofius writes, that his fleet was more numerous than those of Xerxes, of Alexander, or any other monarch mentioned in history. With this formidable armada he failed from Africa, and landing safe in Italy, marched straight to Rome, which his approach threw into the utmost consternation; but count Marinus marching out to meet him at the head of all the troops he could assemble, the usurper, seized with a sudden panic, betook himself to flight, and hastening on board one of his vessels, returned alone to Carthage. Upon his flight, his men immediately submitted, and were received into favour by Honorius, who soon after published a law, dated the fifth of July, and addressed to the people of Africa, wherein he declared Heraclianus a public enemy, and empowered every one to apprehend him, and put him to death, wherever they found him. He was, soon after his return to Carthage, discovered by some soldiers in an ancient temple, and by them immediately cut in pieces. His estate was confiscated, and bestowed upon Constantius. The same year the Franks made an irruption into Gaul, set fire to the city of Treves, and laid waste the neighbouring country. The Burgundians, who had entered Gaul in 407, with the Vandals and Alans, made themselves this year masters and its territory, prefect of Gaul, quaestor, and in the end raised to the rank of patrician; that his wife's name was Nevia Galla; and that his brother, Claudius Lepidus, who is distinguished in the inscription with the title of count, had been governor of Germania Prima, and treasurer. This inscription was made in honour of Dardanus, and his wife Galla, for having built a castle on a steep rock which stood on their estate, that the country people, in the sudden irruptions of the barbarians, might have a safe place to retire to with their families and effects. This castle was then called Theopolis; but is known at present by the name of Rochetaillée.

matters of the country now known by the name of Alface, or Alatia. Constantius, who had reduced the rest of Gaul after the death of the two usurpers Constantine and Jovinus, marched against them; but they demanding leave to settle in Gaul, as friends and allies of the Roman people, the Roman general, not caring to reduce them to despair, persuaded the emperor to grant them part of the country which they had conquered. Such was the rise of the kingdom of the Burgundians in Gaul, under the conduct of Gondicarius or Guntarius. Socrates commends them as a peaceable people, for the most part artificers, and willing to earn a livelihood with labour. Orosius writes, that in 417, they had all embraced already the Christian religion, and the catholic faith, and treated the Gauls, who lived under them, not as their vassals, but their friends. About the year 449, the heresy of Arius began to prevail among them, which was probably owing to their intercourse with the Goths. Ataulphus had promised, as we have observed above, to restore to Honorius his sister Placidia, taken prisoner in Rome, but treated by him, as she had been by Alaric, with the utmost respect. Constantius, hoping the emperor would give her to him in marriage, was continually pressing Ataulphus to comply with this article; but as Honorius had not yet sent to the Goths the corn he had promised them, Ataulphus, who desired to marry Placidia himself, refused to part with her, till the emperor had executed his promise which he was not at that time in a condition to do: however, the Romans promised to send the corn as soon as Placidia was restored; and Ataulphus to restore Placidia as soon as the corn was spent. After matters had continued for some time in this situation, Ataulphus, at last thinking himself deluded by the Romans, began hostilities anew; and, having reduced the cities of Narbonne and Toulouse, advanced as far as Marselles; but met there with such vigorous resistance from count Bonifacius, that he was forced to abandon the enterprise and retire, after having lost great numbers of his men, and been himself wounded. From Marselles he bent his march to Bourdeaux, where he was received as a friend.

In the east, one Lucius, a pagan who commanded the troops attending the court, provoked at the zeal of young Theodosius in extirpating idolatry, resolved to save it from utter ruin.

ruin by assassinating his prince. With this design he went to the palace, and was thrice upon the point of drawing his sword; but was deterred from executing his wicked purpose by a woman of an extraordinary stature, and a threatening aspect, who, as often as he put his hand to his sword, appeared to him holding the emperor in her arms. Thus Damascus, a pagan writer, who flourished about the latter end of the present century. Photius, who copied it from him, calls it a most remarkable event, and not to be questioned, since related by a pagan writer \(^w\), but it is not, however remarkable, taken notice of by any other historian. This year the city of Constantinople was surrounded with the walls, which Socrates styles the great walls \(^x\). Those which had been built by Constantine the Great were pulled down, and this new work, twenty miles in circuit, completed in two months \(^y\). But this we can hardly believe upon the authority of Nicephorus, an historian not much to be relied on. It was called the new wall, and the wall of Theodorus \(^z\). The emperor published this year several laws against the Re-baptizers, the Eunomians, the Sabbatians, and the Protopaschites, that is, against those, who, in the celebration of Easter, differed from the church as to the day, and therefore styled themselves Protopaschites, as if they followed the primitive practice and institution.

The next consuls were Constantius and Constans, both generals, the former in the west, and the latter in the east. This year the negotiations between Honorius and Ataulphus, interrupted by the taking of Narbonne and Toulouse, were resumed. But the more the Goth was pressed by Constantius to send back Placidia, the higher he raised his demands, that, the emperor refusing to comply with them, he might have a more plausible excuse for detaining her. In the end, by means of one Candidianus, he prevailed upon her to marry him, and the nuptials were celebrated at Narbonne, in the month of January of this year 414, with the utmost pomp and solemnity. Placidia appeared on that occasion sitting on a bed of state, and Ataulphus in the Roman dress. He yielded to the royal bride the most honourable place, and presented her with fifty basons filled with pieces of gold, and fifty with jewels and precious stones of an ineffimable value, part of the spoils brought from Rome. Attalus assisted at the ceremony, and sung the epithalamium or nuptial song \(^z\); a degrading function.

function for one who had been vested with the imperial dignity. This marriage was generally looked upon as an accomplishment of Daniel's prophecy, that the king of the north should marry the daughter of the king of the south (P). Honorius did not, it seems, content to this marriage; for soon after Ataulphus obliged Attalus to resume the purple, and caused him to be acknowledged emperor by his Goths. However, he wished for nothing so much as to conclude a lasting peace with Honorius, and seems to have set up Attalus anew, with no other design but to intimidate the emperor, and oblige him to grant to him and his Goths more favourable terms. Orofius writes, that at first he had nothing else in view than the utter ruin of the Roman empire, and the establishing the empire of the Goths in its room; of giving the name of Gothia to that country, which was then called Romania; and founding such a monarchy among his countrymen as Augustus Caesar had introduced among the Romans: but being by long experience convinced, that the Goths were incapable of being governed by laws, he began to think, that the only means of acquiring a great name was to restore, instead of destroying, the Roman empire; and with this view he courted the friendship of Honorius, especially after he had by Placidia a son to whom he gave the name of Theodosius. But Constantius, and his party at court, defeated all the measures taken by Ataulphus and Placidia to bring about an accommodation: they would not suffer the emperor to hearken to any overtures, however reasonable; so that the war being renewed, Ataulphus was in the end obliged to quit Gaul, and retire to Spain. Valeius is of opinion, that he withdrew in virtue of a treaty between him and Constantius;

(P) At St. Gille in Languedoc was found an inscription made by the neighbouring people in honour of Ataulphus and Placidia, their princes and sovereigns, as they are styled, for having chosen Heraclea, that is, according to some, the present St. Gille, for the place of their residence (1). In this inscription, which both Spon and du Cange look upon as genuine, Ataulphus is styled the most powerful king of kings, and the most just conqueror of conquerors: he is likewise commended for having driven out the Vandals, probably some of that nation, who had remained in Gaul. Placidia is styled Caesarina, as if she had enjoyed the rank and honours peculiar to the Caesars.

but the expression of Orosius, that he was forced to quit Gaul, seems to import, that he was driven out by force. Honorius published a law this year, dated the twenty-third of March, forbidding any one to molest such as should take sanctuary in churches, on pain of being prosecuted and punished as guilty of high treason. The law dated the twentieth of May allows every one full liberty to kill such lions as they should find on their grounds, but not to hunt them, in order to take them alive, and sell them. These lions were kept for the public shews; but the interest of our people, says the emperor in that law, must be preferred to our diversion.

While these things passed in the west, Pulcheria, sister to the emperor Theodosius, being declared Augusta in the east, on account of her extraordinary wisdom and piety, took upon her the administration, Athemius thinking her better qualified for it than himself, though she had just then entered only the sixteenth year of her age, and was but two years older than the emperor. And truly, as she was endowed with most extraordinary parts and eminent for piety, her administration proved equally advantageous to the state and the church. Theodosius II. excelled perhaps in piety and religion even his grandfather Theodosius the Great, which all authors agree to have been in great part owing to the uncommon care Pulcheria took in insuring him with those religious maxims, by which she ruled her own actions. In the very beginning of her administration, she persuaded the young prince to dismiss the eunuch Antiochus, of whom hereafter, and to remit whatever was due to the exchequer from the year 368, to cy.

The following year, when Honorius was consul the tenth time, and Theodosius the third, Theodosius the son of Ataulphus and Placidia, died in Spain, whither his father had retired with his Goths; and was buried in a silver coffin near Barcelona, in a place of prayer, says Olympiodorus, that is, in a church. Ataulphus himself did not long survive him; for he was killed this very year at Barcelona, in the month of August or September, since the news of his death was brought to Constantinople on a Friday the twenty-fourth of the latter month. He was stabbed in his stable by one of his own countrymen.

countrymen and domestics, named Dobbius, whose former master, a leading man among the Goths, Ataulphus had caused to be murdered several years before. Jornandes supposes him to have waged a long war with the Vandals in Spain, and to have been killed three years after he had reduced that country by one Vernulphus, whose former master Ataulphus had murdered. But in what relates to Ataulphus, we have all along followed Olympiodorus, a contemporary historian, who, generally speaking, agrees with the other writers of those times. Photius has transmitted to us an abstract of his work. We are surprized, that Giannone, in his history of the kingdom of Naples, should to his authority prefer that of Jornandes, a writer of a much later date, who seldom agrees with other historians, and often disagrees with himself. Ataulphus, in dying, charged his brother, not named by our historian, to send back Placidia to the Romans, and to live in friendship with them. But the Goths, instead of his brother, chose for their king Sigeric, the brother of Sarus, who immediately ordered the six children that Ataulphus had had by a former wife, to be inhumanly murdered, revenging by that piece of cruelty, the death of his brother. He even obliged Placidia to walk with other captives twelve miles before his chariot. But he was assassinated by his own people the seventh day after his election, and Vallaia chosen in his room, after he had caused all those to be murdered who stood in competition with him for the crown. This year a great tumult happened at Alexandria; the christians and Jews, who were very numerous in that city, quarrelling on account of certain sports exhibited on a Saturday, St. Cyril, bishop of the place, threatened to drive the Jews out of the city; which exasperated them to such a degree, that they resolved to vent their rage upon his whole flock, the more because they were favoured by Orestes, prefect of the city, then at variance with the bishop. Accordingly having provided themselves with arms, some of them in the dead of the night began to cry fire, giving out at the same time, that the great church was in flames. Hereupon, the christians, hastening out of their houses to save the church, were massacred in great numbers by the Jews, who lay in ambush for them, and knew one another by a certain mark or badge, which they

they wore for that purpose. The bishop, highly provoked at this barbarity, drove all the Jews out of the city; which the governor resenting as an encroachment upon his authority, the breach between him and the bishop was widened, and they both wrote to court complaining of each other's conduct. In the mean time, the hermits or monks, who led a retired life on the neighbouring mountains, being told, that Orestes had espoused the cause of the Jews against Cyril and the christians, flew to the city, and meeting the prefect in his chariot, reviled him with the names of pagan and idolater. Orestes, to appease them, told them, that he was a christian, and had been baptized by Atticus, bishop of Constantinople. But while he was yet speaking, one of the monks, by name Ammonius, wounded him on the head with a stone. His attendants, believing him killed, for he was in an instant covered all over with blood, betook themselves to flight, but some of the citizens coming to his rescue, seized the monk, and delivered him up to the prefect, who caused him to be tortured till he died on the rack. The populace resolved to revenge his death, which they did in the following manner, to the great scandal of the christian name and profession. At that time lived in Alexandria, Hypatia, the daughter of the celebrated philosopher Theon, who had been brought up and instructed by her father with extraordinary care, and was thought to excel in learning and quickness of apprehension all the philosophers of that age. She was thoroughly acquainted with the different doctrines of the various sects of philosophers, and publicly explained them to an incredible number of disciples, who flocked from all parts to hear her. She was no less remarkable for her chaffity and modest carriage, tho' her friendship was courted by all the great men of her age, than for her knowledge and erudition. As she was in great favour and esteem with the prefect Orestes, the populace, partly to revenge the death of Ammonius, and partly because they imagined, as she was a pagan, that she incensed the prefect against the bishop and his friends, rose suddenly in a tumultuous manner: and being headed by one Peter, a reader in a church, they stopped her as she was returning to her house, and pulling her out of her chariot, dragged her to a neighbouring church, where they flayed her alive, and tearing her in pieces, carried her mangled members to a place called Cinaron, and there burnt them to ashes. This unheard-of barbarity reflected great scandal on the christian name, especially on the church of Alexandria.
Alexandria. Thus Socrates, whose authority is questioned by most ecclesiastic writers, who suppose him to have been a zealous Novatian, and consequently an enemy to St. Cyril, who, upon his first coming to the see of Alexandria, had caused the penal laws against those and all other sectaries to be strictly executed. This year, Theodosius, by a law dated the seventh of December, excluded the pagans from all employments both civil and military. By another law, dated the nineteenth of October, he deposed Gamaliel, patriarch of the Jews, for having abused his authority. Gamaliel is supposed to have been the last patriarch of that nation, which was thenceforth governed by primates chosen by the councils of the provinces, whereas the patriarchal dignity was hereditary.

The next consuls were Theodosius, the seventh time, and Junius Quartus Palladius, who was prefect of Italy this and the five following years. Vallia, lately created king of the Goths in Spain, resolved to pursue the war against the Romans, and attempt the reduction of Africa; but the fleet he was sending thither being shipwrecked near the straits of Gibraltar, and most of the Goths on board of it drowned, he entered into a treaty with Constantius, and in the end concluded a peace with Honorius, delivered up hostages, and, upon his receiving six hundred thousand measures of corn, sent back Placidia to her brother. Vallia not only concluded a peace, but entered into an alliance, with the Romans against the barbarians, who had settled in Spain, advising the emperor to let them fight it out amongst themselves, since whatever side prevailed, he was sure to be a gainer. This advice Honorius followed, to the great advantage and relief of the empire, as we shall see anon. Attalus, whom the Goths had carried with them into Spain, seeing a peace concluded between them and the Romans, endeavoured to make his escape by sea; but the ship was taken, and carried to Constantius, then in Gaul, who sent him to the emperor, by whose orders his right hand, or, as others will have it, only the fingers of his right hand were cut off, to prevent his writing, and he confined to the island of Lipari, where the good-natured emperor caused him to be treated with great great humanity. This year, Theodosius, leaving Constantinople for the first time after the twenty-second of July, retired to Eudoxiopolis, called formerly Selymbria, on the sea-coast between Constantinople and Heraclea, and continued partly there, partly at Heraclea, till the twenty-ninth of September. The following year 417, when Honorius was consul the eleventh time, and Constantius the second, the emperor, to reward the services of that brave general, gave him in marriage his sister Placidia, an honour at which he had been long aspiring. Placidia could not by any means be prevailed upon to give her consent; but the emperor, taking hold of her hand, gave it in spite of her to Constantius. They were thus married on the first of January of the present year, when Constantius entered upon his second consulship. A few months after, Honorius, leaving Ravenna, repaired to Rome, which he entered in triumph, causing Attalus, brought for that purpose from Lipari, to walk before his chariot. When the triumph was over, Attalus was remanded to the place of his exile, and Honorius returned soon after to Ravenna. The Armorici, who had revolted in 409, and introduced a new form of government among themselves, were this year brought again under subjection by Constantius. About this time the Franks, after having dwelt for the space of near two hundred years on the German side of the Rhine, were allowed to pass that river, and settle in Thongria, that is, in the territory of Tongres, where they were governed by as many kings as they had cities or cantons. But whether Faramond, who reigned at this time, had any authority over the other princes, or was only more powerful than the rest, is what we are no where told. He was the son of Marcomir, of whom we have spoken elsewhere, and the grandson of Priamus, whom Tiro Prosper calls the first king of the Franks mentioned in history. In the east nothing remarkable happened this year besides an earthquake, which overthrown several houses at Constanti- nople, and the city of Cybyra in Phrygia.

The following year, Honorius being consul the twelfth time, and Theodosius the eighth, Vallia, making war upon the Franks allowed to settle in Thongria.

the barbarians in Spain, cut off all the Vandals called Silingi, who had settled in Boetica or Andalucia. He likewise made such a dreadful havoc of the Alans, who had hitherto ruled over the Vandals and Suevians, that their king Ata being killed among the rest, they fled for protection to Gonderic, king of the Vandals, who had settled in Galicia, and submitted to him. Hence the successors of Gonderic used to style themselves kings of the Vandals and Alans. Constantius, to reward these eminent services of Vallia and his Goths, gave them Aquitania Secunda, comprizing the present archbishopric of Bourdeaux, and some neighbouring cities, that is, the whole tract from Touloufie to the sea, to which he added soon after Novempopulania or Aquitania Tertia, that is, the province of Auch, and Gascony. Vallia fixed his residence at Touloufie, which by that means became the capital of the kingdom of the Goths. Vallia on the other hand yielded to the Romans the countries he had taken from the Vandals and Alans in Spain. He died soon after, leaving behind him one daughter, married to a Suevian, by whom she had Ricimer, who completed the ruin of the western empire. The deceased prince was succeeded by Theodoric, called by some Theodorus, and by others Theodorides. In the east one Plintha, by nation a Goth, revolted, but was defeated in Palæstine; which is all we know of this war. Plintha, notwithstanding his defeat, must have concluded an advantageous peace with Theodosius; for he was raised the following year to the consulary dignity, and preferred to the post of general of the Roman horse and foot in which he acquitted himself with great reputation and fidelity. In the consulship he had Monaxius for his colleague, another of Theodosius’s officers; so that both consuls were in 419, subjects of the eastern empire, as they had been in 417, of the western. Of the two consuls, one was, generally speaking, chosen in the east, the other in the west; and he named the first, who was first in rank: if they were equal, each named in the first place his own consul. This year Honorius, by a law dated from Ravenna the twenty-second of November, extended the right and privileges of an asylum to all places within fifty paces of the church, declaring those guilty of sacrilege, who...

who should arrest any one within that space. On the second or third of July of this year, Placidia was delivered at Ravenna of a son, who was named Valentinian, and succeeded Honorius in the empire. The barbarians in Spain being no longer harrassed by the Goths, who had retired to Gaul, as we have related above, and settled there, began to quarrel among themselves. Gonderic, king of the Vandals, having gained great advantages over Eremeric, king of the Suevians, obliged him in the end to fly for refuge to the mountains of Biscay, where he kept him and his people blocked up. But in the mean time, Afterius, count of Spain, and the vicar Maurocelus, falling unexpectedly upon Gonderic, cut great numbers of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest to abandon Biscay and Galicia, and retire into Brittany. Nothing happened this year in the east, which historians have thought worthy of notice, except an attempt upon the life of Actius, prefect of Constantinople, who was attacked by an assassin, named Ceryachus, as he was returning from the great church. We are not told what gave occasion to this attempt, nor what became of the assassin. By a law dated the twenty-fourth of September, Theodosius declared those guilty of death, who should teach the barbarians the art of building ships, to which they were yet strangers. The following year, when Theodosius was confid the eighth time, and Constantius the third, the army mutinied in the east, and put to death their general, by name Maximinus, as we read in the chronicle of Marcellinus: but of this mutiny no mention is made by any other writer. In the west nothing remarkable happened this year; but under the following consuls Agricola and Eufatusius, the emperor Honorius, on the eight of February, raised Constantius to the imperial dignity, declared him his colleague, and gave the title of Augusta to his wife Placidia. The images of Constantius and Placidia were sent to Constantinople, with the news of their promotion; but Theodosius refused, for what reason we know not, to acknowledge them; which would have kindled a war between the two empires, had not Constantius died soon after, that is, on the second of September, after having reigned seven months wanting six days. He was buried at Ravenna, where he died of a pleurisy, in a mausoleum.

foleum, built by his widow Placidia, near the church of St. Vitalis. The same year the emperor Theodosius married Eudocia on the seventh of June, on which occasion there were great rejoicings at Constantinople. Eudocia was the daughter of an Athenian philosopher, by name Heraclitus, upon whose death her two brothers Gelasius and Aurelianus defrauding her of the share that was due to her of her father's estate, she went to Constantinople to implore the protection of Pulcheria. As she had been instructed by her father with extraordinary care in several languages, and in every branch of literature, and was besides remarkable for her beauty and engaging behaviour, Pulcheria, after several conferences with her, began to think her a proper match for her brother Theodosius, whom accordingly she persuaded to marry her. Thus the modern Greeks; but the antient writers tell us, that she was the daughter, not of the philosopher Heraclitus, but of Leontius, an Athenian sophist, or professor of eloquence at Athens. Before the nuptials were celebrated Theodosius caused her to be baptized by Atticus, bishop of Constantinople, who changed the name of Athenais, which she bore before, into that of Eudocia. As Eudocia had been brought up to letters, she used to divert herself with making verses, and this very year she composed a poem on the victory gained by the Romans over the Persians, of which anon (Q.). The two brothers of Eudocia, informed

\[4\] Zonaras mentions another work of the same emperor, which he calls Homer's rhapsody. It contained the history of our Saviour, and entirely consisted of verses borrowed from Homer. It was

Informed of her good fortune, and conscious to themselves of their behaviour towards her, absconded; but she, instead of resenting the injury they had done her, invited both to court, and raised them to great preferments. What Codinus, a modern Greek author, writes of the seven philosophers, who, he says, attended Eudocia to Constantinople, has the air of a fable. This year the peace, which had long subsisted between the Romans and Persians, was broken, and a war kindled between the two empires on the following occasion. Vararanes V., who in 420, had succeeded his father Iudegerdes in the kingdom of Perisia, having, at the instigation of the Magi, raised a bloody persecution against the christians in his dominions, great numbers of them took refuge in the Roman territories, and repaired to Constantinople, where they were received with great kindness by Atticus, bishop of that city, and by him recommended to the emperor, who was so far from delivering them up when demanded by the Persian embassadors, that, on the contrary, he declared his resolution of defending them, and the religion they profess'd, with the whole strength of the empire. Some misunderstanding had arisen before between the two princes, the Persian king refusing to send back some workmen, whom he had hired out of the Roman territories, to dig in mines of gold, which he had lately discovered. Besides the Persians had plundered and insulted some Roman merchants trading to their country. Upon these provocations, as Vararanes continued to persecute the christians in his dominions, Theodofius proclaimed war with the Persians, and, without loss of time, dispatched Aradarius, an Alan by nation, at the head of a considerable army, into Azazene, a Persian province beyond the Tigris, which he laid waste, after having gained a complete victory over Narres, whom the king of Narres, the Persian general, defeated by Aradarius.

was begun by a patrician, says Zonaras, but ended by Eudocia (5). Some take this patrician to have been one Pelagius, who was killed in the reign of Zeno, about the year 480, and is said to have been the author of a rhapsody (6). But he was a pagan as appears from Cedrenus (7), and consequently can hardly be thought to have been the author of that work or any part of it.

of Persia had sent with a numerous army to oppose him. The battle was fought on the third of September, and the news of the victory brought on the sixth of the same month to Constantinople, tho’ seven hundred miles distant from the borders of Persia, by a famous courier of those times, named Palladius. He travelled with the same surprizing expedition to what part soever he was sent; whence of him it was pleasantly said, that he had found means to reduce the Roman empire to a petty state. Narses, after his defeat, abandoning the province of Azazene to the mercy of the enemy, marched with incredible expedition into Mesopotamia, with a design to invade the empire on that side, which was then defitute of troops, and unprepared for a defence. But Ardaburius, aware of his design, followed him close, and obliged him to shelter himself within the walls of Nisibis, which place he immediately besieged. In the mean time the king of Persia having received intelligence of the defeat of his general, and the danger both he and the city of Nisibis were in, assembled all his forces; and entering Mesopotamia, laid siege to Theodosiopolis, with a design to divert Ardaburius from that of Nisibis. But the besieged, having at their head Eunomius, bishop of the place, defended it with such vigour and resolution, that the Persians, after having battered it with an incredible number of machines for a whole month without intermission, were obliged to drop the enterprise and retire. The enemy were soon after reinforced with a numberless multitude of Saracens, under the conduct of Alamundarus, a renowned warrior, who to raise the drooping spirits of the Persian monarch, bragged, that in a short time he would deliver into his hands, not only the Romans who besieged Nisibis, but Antioch itself, the metropolis of Syria. But not long after, his men, being seized with a panic, and not knowing whither to fly, threw themselves headlong into the Euphrates, where an hundred thousand of them are said to have perished. The Romans, seized at the same time with the like fear, upon a false report, that the king of Persia was advancing to the relief of Nisibis with a great number of elephants, burnt all their machines, raised the siege, and retired in the utmost confusion into the Roman dominions.

The following year, when Honorius was consul the thirteenth time, and Theodosius the tenth, the war was purged.

fued with uncommon success against the Persians. From Socrates, who only hints at the military preparations, as foreign to his main purpose, it appears, that Ariobindus, one of the Roman generals, killed in a single combat a Peruvian famed for his valour; that Ardaburias put to the sword seven Persian commanders, surprized in an ambuscade; and that Avitanus cut in pieces the few Saracens who had escaped being drowned in the Euphrates. Notwithstanding these advantages, Theodosius, imagining the Persians, thus weakened and disheartened, would hearken to an accommodation, and give over persecuting the christians, in whose defence he had taken arms, sent embassadors to Vararanes, with very reasonable proposals, which the Persian would have accepted with joy, had he not been diverted from it by the immortals, that is, a corps of ten thousand chosen men, so called because they had never been conquered. These persuaded the king to keep the Romans in suspense, with a design to surprize them in the mean time; for they imagined they would not at that juncture be upon their guard. With this view they divided themselves into two bodies, one of which lay concealed among the woods, while the other advanced in order to attack the enemy, and draw them into the ambuscade; butProcopius, who commanded a separate body of Romans, observing their motions from an eminence where he was posted, and apprised of their design, attacked them in the rear, while Ardaburias charged them in front; by which means they were surrounded, and all to a man put to the sword. Vararanes was no sooner informed of this new calamity, than calling to the Roman embassadors, he agreed to the terms they had proposed, and concluded a peace with the empire for an hundred years, which lasted, according to Evagrius, till the twelfth year of the reign of Anastatus; that is to the year 502. The chief article of this treaty was, that the Persian king should recal the banished christians, restore them to their estates, and put a stop to the cruel persecution he had raised against them. While these things passed in the east, Honorius attempted in the west to recover Spain out of the hands of the barbarians, greatly weakened by their intestine wars. With this view he ordered Caflinus, general of the foot, and comes dometicores, or captain of the guards, to march against them, at the head of a very numerous numerous and powerful army. Caefinus soon reduced them to such straights, that they were preparing to submit, and abandon the country which they had seized; but the Roman general having unfeasibly ventured an engagement, twenty thousand of his men were cut in pieces, and he obliged with the rest to take refuge in Tarraco. Idatius ascribes this defeat to the treachery of the Goths, who served in the Roman army; but all other writers to the rash and imprudent conduct of Caefinus.

The following year, when Marinianus and Asclepiodotus were consuls, a misunderstanding arose between Honorius and his sister Placidia, whom the emperor had entertained at court, ever since the death of her husband Constantius, with such tenderness and affection, as gave occasion to some very scandalous reflections. Some authors write, that the great sway she bore in the administration giving no small jealousy to the other courtiers, they persuaded the emperor, that she corresponded privately with the Goths who still looked upon her as their queen, and betrayed to them all his counsels. However that be, it is certain, that the extraordinary affection he had hitherto shewn her being this year changed into an aversion no less extraordinary, Placidia thought it advisable to quit the court, and retire, with her son Valentinian, and her daughter Honoria, to Constantinople, where she was kindly received by her nephew Theodosius, tho’ he had formerly refused to acknowledge her husband Constantius for emperor, and to give her the title of Augusta. Soon after, Honorius died at Ravenna of a dropsy, having reigned twenty eight years since the death of his father Theodosius, and thirty-one since the time he was first created Augustus. He died, according to Theophanes, on the fifteenth, according to Olympiodorus, on the twenty-seventh of August of the present year 423. His body is said to have been found in 1542, with those of his two wives, Maria and Thermantia, the daughters of Stilicho, in the church of St. Peter at Rome. If so, it must have been conveyed thither from Ravenna, where his mausoleum, supposed to have been built by his sister Placidia, is still to be seen. Of the writers who flourished flourished in his reign, we shall speak in note (R). Honorius no sooner expired, than an express was dispatch'd to Theodosius with

(R) Under Honorius flourished Olympiodorus, who wrote in Greek the history of that prince, from the year 407, the thirteenth of his reign, to his death. His work consisteth of twenty-two books, and was inscribed to Theodosius II. or the younger (8). The reader will find an abstract of it in Photius (9), who censures the style as low, and altogether unworthy of an historian. However, both Zosimus and Sozomen seem to have copied it in several places, with some alteration in the phrase and expression. The author was a native of Thebes in Egypt, and a pagan by religion. He was sent, with others, in 412, on an embassy to a king of the Hunns, named Donatus. Of this voyage (for he went by sea) he gives us an account, and likewise of his journey to Athens, and of another to Syene in Egypt, and to the country of the Blemmyes (10). This is all we know of him. Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus wrote likewise the history of the reign of Honorius, from the year 406, to the death of that prince; but of his work only a few passages have reached our times, quoted by Gregory of Tours (11). Claudian may be ranked among the historians who have written of Honorius; for of him we have learnt several particulars of that prince's reign. He was a native of Alexandria in Egypt, as he himself tells us in different places (12), and not the son of a merchant at Florence, as some modern writers have endeavoured to prove. He first applied himself to Greek poetry; and a fragment of a poem written in that language on the battle of the giants has reached our times (13). His first Latin poem was on the consulship of the two brothers Olybrius and Probinus, who were consuls in 395. He continued to write on different subjects till the sixth consulship of Honorius in 404, he was sent by the citizens of Rome in 396, to congratulate Honorius on his third consulship (14). He was honoured by the Roman senate with a statue, which, in consideration of his excellency in poetry, was erected in the square of Trajan (15). This honour was conferred upon him before he wrote his poem on the battle of Pollentia, fought in 403 (16). He was then tribune and notary, or secretary of state, and enjoyed the title of clarissimus, which was given to the Roman senators. Having, by means of Serena, Stilicho's wife, married a lady possessed of great wealth in Africa, he thenceforth became became a professed admirer, or rather adorer, of that great general and statesman, inveighing at the same time with much bitterness against his rivals Rufinus and Eutropius (17); neither does he spare his countryman Adrian, who was prefectus praetorio in 425, and 412, having probably been ill-used by him; for in an epistle addressed to him to appease his wrath, he complains, that his family was undone; that his friends some had been put to the rack, and others banished; and that he himself was reduced to beggary (18). To avoid the ill treatment he met with from Adrian, he retired, perhaps to the east; for Evagrius ranks him among the poets who flourished under Theodosius II (19). He was, as appears from his poems, an adorer of Jupiter, and all the other pagan gods. Orofius calls him a most obstinate pagan; but at the same time commends him as an excellent poet (20). St. Aulph like wise speaks of him as a person greatly attached to the pagan superstition (21). Hence such pieces as contain christian sentiments are by the best critics thought not to have been written by him, tho' they pass under his name, but perhaps by Claudian Mamertus, a christian poet of Vienne in Gaul. Baillet prefers Claudian to all the poets who have written ever since the age of Augustus, tho' he is not, in the opinion of that writer, without some faults. His style is sometimes flat, and sometimes sublime, and most of his poems filled with youthful follies (22). In all his poems there are several most beautiful passages. His invectives, especially the two books against Eutropius, are most esteemed by the learned (23). It is uncertain whether or no the poem on mount Aetna was written by him. Rutilius, or, as he is styled at the head of his poem, Rutilius Claudius Numatianus, flourished in the reign of Honorius. He was a native of Gaul, according to some, of Toulouse. His father had been governor of Heturia, quae for, comes largetionum, and prefect (24). The Hetuicans, by whom he was greatly beloved, on account of his good nature, and impartiality in the administration of justice, erected several statues to his honour at Pisa, and in other places. He was dead when his son wrote his poem. Rutilius bore two of the greatest employments in the state, viz. the office of magister officiorum, and that of prefect of Rome (25). In his poem he declares himself a pagan, and a sworn enemy to the monks.

of troops to advance into the neighbourhood of Salonae in Dalmatia, that they may be ready at hand, to prevent the disturbances, monks, especially to those who lived in the island of Capraria or Capraia, on the coast of Tuscany, a young nobleman of his acquaintance having renounced a plentiful estate, and abandoned his friends, relations, and even his wife, to lead a retired life amongst them (26). Rustilius left Rome, where he had lived many years to return to Gaul, where he had not been ever since the barbarians entered that country in 407. He set out from Rome in 417, or 420 about the month of October, and embarking on the Tiber, repaired to Porto, where he waited a whole fortnight for the new moon, and the setting of the Pleiades (27). Those who are skilled in astronomy may learn from thence the precise year and day of his departure. In 417, and 420, it was new moon in the latter end of October. At Porto, twelve miles distant from Rome, he heard, or imagined to hear, the shouts of the people in the circus. He embarked there on board a small vessel, for the convenience of landing when he pleased to visit his friends, and of lying every night ashore (28). He landed at Circumcellae, now Civita Vecchia, and went to view certain hot waters three miles from thence called the baths of Taurus. Putting to sea again, he discovered the ruins of Gravisca, and Cofa or Coffa, two cities famous in former ages. The inhabitants of the latter are said to have been forced, by prodigious swarms of rats, to quit their habitations, and abandon the place of their nativity (29). He came ashore likewise at Port-Ercol, beyond which he saw the island of Elba, more useful, says he, on account of its iron mines, than the Tagus for its golden sands. From Port-Ercol he pursued his voyage to Piombino, and from thence to Volterra, where he went to see the fine house of Albinus prefect of Rome, and the salt-pits at a small distance from it. At Volterra he found Victorinus his intimate friend, who, having abandoned Toulouse, the place of his nativity, after the settling of the Goths there, had retired to Italy, and led a country-life in the neighbourhood of Volterra. He had been formerly vicar to the prefect of Britain, which office he discharging to the great satisfaction of the people. Honorius, upon his retiring from Toulouse, had invited him to court, giving him the title of count; but he preferred a retired life to all the honours the emperor could confer upon him (30). From Volterra he sailed to the island of Gorgona, and from thence to the port of Pifa, where he landed, and went to the city of Pifa, to see one of his old friends, by name Protadius, disturbances, which, he apprehended, would be raised in the west by the death of Honorius, who had left no children to succeed us, who, having lost a great estate in Gaul, seized, no doubt, by the barbarians, enjoyed greater happiness on a small farm he had in Umbria, than he had ever done when possessed of immense wealth, and large territories in his own country. He had been prefect of Rome, and had been distinguished with several other great employments (31). Several letters written to him by Symmachus have reached our times (32). From the port of Pisa, where Rutilius was obliged to continue some time, by reason of the bad weather, he pursu ed his voyage to Portus Lunæ, now Lerice, as is commonly believed (33). Thus far his itinerary, that is, the poem in which he describes his voyage. It was divided into two books, of which the latter is almost entirely lost. It has all the elegance and beauty that can be expected in a performance of that unpolished age, and informs us of several things relating to the history of those times (34). Some gross mistakes that are to be found in it are, without all doubt, owing partly to the transcribers, partly to ignorant critics, who have strangely mangled and confounded several passages. The author betrays throughout the whole work an inveterate hatred both to the Jews and christians; whence we may conclude Lacharius, Lucilius, and his other heroes, to have been pagans. Lucilius wrote some satires, in no respect inferior, if we may depend upon the judgment of Rutilius, to those of Turnus and Juvenal (35); but none of them have reached our times. One Flavius, said by St. Jerome to have wrote in verse a treatise on phthisic, is supposed by Vossius to have flourished in the reign of Honorius, and likewise the author of a comedy, styled Querulus Plauti, which is inscribed to one Rutilius (36). About this time flourished Macrobius, or, as he is styled at the head of his works, Aurelius Theodosius Ambrosius Macrobius; for all the perfons he introduces in his saturnalia, lived under Theodosius I. and his son Honorius. He was born in a country where the Latin tongue was not common, that is, in Greece, or in the east (37). To his name is added, in an antient manuscript, the word Sicetius, denoting perhaps his country (38); but to us quite unknown. He is distinguished with the title of illustrious, peculiar to the first officers of the empire (39). Hence most writers conclude him to be the Macrobius who was great chamberlain to Theodosius II in 422, for whose sake that prince equalled the office of great chamberlain to

Chap. 30: The Roman History.

Having taken this step, he made public the death of his uncle, and at the same time caused himself to be proclaimed to those of the praefectus prætorii and the magister militum (40). But against this opinion may be objected, that Macrobius, the author of the Saturnalia had a son, by name Eustathius; whereas the great chamberlains were, generally speaking, eunuchs. Besides, we cannot persuade ourselves, that Theodosius II. would have suffered a pagan (for such was the writer we are speaking of) to enjoy that office; which obliged him to be always about the emperor's person. The opinion of those is better founded, who suppose the Macrobius, who was praepostus of Africa in 410, to be the author of the Saturnalia. One Macrobius was vicar of Spain in 399, and 400, but stripped of his employment, and punished for some neglect with respect to the posts (41). The work by which Macrobius is chiefly known is his Saturnalia, that is, a collection of antiquities made by him for the instruction of his son, and supposed to have been uttered in a familiar conversation among friends, during the Saturnalia, or the feasts of Saturn. The persons he introduces were the most famous then at Rome for their learning and erudition. He addresses his work to his son, for whose sake he undertook it. He relates most things in the terms of the authors from whom he borrowed them, by reason he could not express himself with ease in the Latin tongue; and truly, when he speaks himself, he plainly betrays his small knowledge of that language (42). Besides the Saturnalia, he wrote two books on the dream of Scipio, which he wife inscribed to his son, for whose instruction he undertook that, as he had done the other, work. These two books were translated into Greek by Maximus, surnamed Planudes (43). Another book passes under the name of Macrobius, on the conformity and disagreement of the Greek and Latin tongues (44). Macrobius wrote indeed a book on that subject; but the work which has reached our times was done by John Eriogenes, who flourished in the ninth century, and followed the plan of Macrobius, whom he copied, changing some things, and adding many of his own (45). One of the chief persons introduced by Macrobius in his Saturnalia is Servius, who had lately begun to teach polite literature at Rome, and is painted as a person of great learning, and at the same time universally beloved on account of his modesty (46). He is introduced speaking mostly of Virgil, whose inimitable Aeneid proclaimed emperor of the west in his room. This did not deter John, the deceased emperor’s chief secretary, from assuming

Æneid he explained daily to the Roman youth. Maurus Servius Honoratus, the author of the learned comment on that poem, is, without all doubt, the Servius of Macrobius; but most authors are of opinion, that what has reached us is but an abridgment of that learned work; nay, some take it to have been compiled from Servius, and several other antient critics. It is generally held in great esteem, tho’ not quite free from faults (47). In the fifth or sixth century flourished a grammarian, named Martianus Capella, who published several philological pieces, partly in prose, and partly in verse, which are still extant, and divided into seven books. He is said in the manuscript copies to have been honoured with the proconsular dignity. He was a native of Carthage; and truly his barbarous and uncouth stile plainly shews, that he was no Roman. In his allegorical marriage of Mercury with the sciences, there is a great deal of erudition; but the invention is low and mean (48). Securis Melior Felix, who professed the christian religion, and taught rhetoric at Clermont in Auvergne, was at the trouble of correcting, in 534, one of the copies of Capella’s works. Felix is styled in that manuscript V. Sp. Com. Consil. that is, Vir spectabilis, comes consiliarius, a man of rank, and one of the confidential or the emperor’s counsellors (49). Capella was greatly esteemed in France about the end of the sixth century, as appears from Gregory of Tours (50). Sozis later Charilus, who published five books of observations on the grammar, still extant, flourished, according to Baillet, in the time of Honorius, and before him a grammarian named Diomedes, whose works have likewise reached our times; but strangely mangled by Johannes Caesarius, who published them, with many observations of his own. Charilus is quoted by Priscian, who wrote about the end of the fifth century (51). About the same time, Fabius Fulgentius Planciades published an explication of some words, addressed to one Calcidius, another grammarian. He is styled, and indeed deservedly, both by Vossius (52) and Baillet (53), one of the most ignorant, impertinent, and trifling authors that ever wrote. He ascribes to Tacitus, and other writers, works never before heard of.

assuming the purple in Rome, being, no doubt, encouraged in his usurpation by Caesarius, then commander in chief of all the troops in the west; for he was afterwards disgraced and banished, as one of the usurper's chief friends and abettors. The new tyrant was immediately acknowledged, not only in Rome and Italy, but likewise in Gaul and Dalmatia; which encouraged him to dispatch embassadors to Theodosius, to acquaint him with his promotion; but that prince refusing to acknowledge him, and having even ordered his embassadors to be arrested, and thrown into prison, he began to prepare for war, and sent the famous Aetius, with great sums, to draw the Hunns over to his assistance. That celebrated commander, who governed the western empire with an absolute sway during the reign of Valentinian III. was a native of Dorostorum in Moesia, and the son of Gaudentius, who, tho' by birth a Scythian, was raised to the highest employments in the empire, and married an Italian lady of great distinction, called by some Italia. By her he had Aetius, who served at first among the emperor's domestics, or the troops of his household, and was given as an hostage to Alaric, after the battle of Pollentia in 403, and afterwards to the Hunns.

of. Cave calls him an arrant trifler (54); and all other critics speak of him with the utmost contempt. In the reign of Theodosius I. or his children, was published, as is commonly believed, what we call the map or tables of Peutinger, which are a kind of itinerary made by some quarter master, if we may so call him, for the use of those who conducted the Roman troops from one place to another. The author seems to have been altogether ignorant both of geography and mathematics. These tables belonged to one Conrad Peutinger in Augsburg, and are hence called the tables of Peutinger; but they were published by Velsor, who had them engraved by John Moret of Antwerp. The reader will find them in the theatrum geographicum of Bertius, published at Amsterdam in 1619, and among Velsor's works, published at Nuremberg in 1682. A civilian, by name Eslebus, described the war of Gainas in a poem, which he styled Gainades; and the same subject was handled by another poet, named Ammonius, who read it to Theodosius II. in 438. Both these poems were greatly esteemed (55); but neither of them has reached our times. Volfius supposes them to have been written in the Greek tongue, and ranks the authors among the Greek poets (56).

Hunns, with whose chiefs he, by that means, became acquainted. Upon his return from the country of the Hunns, he married the daughter of Carpilio, captain of the guards, and had by her two sons, Gaudentius, who, after the death of Valentinian, was taken by Genferic, and Carpilio, whom Valentinian sent with the character of ambassador to Attila. Aetius was a person of a majestic mien, of a tall stature, and a robust constitution, which enabled him to bear with patience the greatest fatigues and toils attending a military life. He is no less commended by the antients on account of his prudence, address, and penetration in state affairs, than for his courage, intrepidity, and experience in war. He was quite free from avarice, had but little ambition, and was such a lover of justice, that no recommendations, however pressing, were capable of making him swerve from what to him appeared equitable. Such is the character given him by Frigeridus, a writer who flourished in his time, as quoted by Gregory of Tours. Procopius writes, that Aetius and Bonifacius, who defended, as we have observed above, Marselles, when attacked by Ataulphus, were the two greatest commanders in the whole empire, and that they deferred to be called the last Romans. John, upon his usurping the empire, committed to Aetius the care of his palace, and then sent him to engage the Hunns in his cause, with orders to fall upon the rear of the troops of Theodosius, if they entered Italy, while he himself charged them in front. On the second of January of the preface year, Eudocia was declared Augusta.

The next consuls were Caffinus and Victor. The former was general of the troops in the west. Of the latter we find no farther mention in history. In an antient inscription, John the usurper is styled consul, he being probably acknowledged in the west, and not Victor, whom we may suppose to have belonged to the eastern empire. This year, Theodosius, having drawn together all the forces of the eastern empire, ordered them to march to the frontiers of Dalmatia, under the conduct of Ardaburius, his son Apsar, and Candidianus. With them he sent Placidia and her son Valentinian, allowing the former to resume the title and ensigns of Augusta, which had been given her by her brother Honorius, but she had quitted upon her entering the dominions.

nions of Theodosius; and the latter to wear the habit pecular to the nobilissimi; which title had some time since been given to the sons of emperors before they were created Caefars. This was renouncing all pretensions to the empire of the west, and tacitly yielding it to Placidia, and Valentinian.
Before they left Constantinople, Theodosius betrothed his daughter Licinia Eudoxia, born in 422, to young Valentinian, born on the second or third of July in 419. When this ce-monry was over, Placidia set out from Constantinople, with her son, who upon his arrival at Thessalonica, received the en-signs peculiar to the Caesar, at the hands of Helio, magister officiorum to Theodosius, by whom he had been sent thither for that purpose 2. The following year, Theodosius being confid, the eleventh time, with Valentinian, the army of Theodosius, having crossed Pannonia and Illyricum, appeared unexpectedly before Salona, which was taken by storm.
There it was agreed among the generals, that Aspar should lead the cavalry, with Placidia and Valentinian, by land to Aquileia, while the foot, under the command of his father Ardaebrius, was conveyed thither by sea. This scheme was so well executed on the side of Aspar, that arriving at Aquileia, before the enemy had the least notice of his march, he took the place without opposition; but the fleet being disperséd by a violent storm, Ardaebrius was driven ashore, and taken by the usurper's soldiers, who immediately carried him to their emperor, then at Ravenna, by whom he was received with great joy, and treated with the utmost civility, the usurper hoping by his means to prevail upon Theodosius, with whom Ardaebrius bore a great sway, to acknowledge him for his colleague. As he was allowed to converse with whom he pleased, he gained over the chief officers, who had already begun to be tired of their new prince, and privately acquainting his son Aspar with the security in which the tyrant lived, advised him to advance speedily with his best troops to Ravenna. Aspar immediately set out from Aquileia with the cavalry; and being conducted through the marshes which surrounded Ravenna on the land-side by a shepherd, whom Socrates supposes to have been an angel, he entered the city, finding the gates open and unguarded, and with the assistance of the officers gained over by his father, secured the tyrant before he had time to make his escape, and sent him in chains to Placidia and Valentinian, then at Aquileia, who ordered first his right-hand, and then his head, to be cut off. Procopius writes, that after his hand was cut off in the circus, he was by way of derision, carried about the streets on an ass, exposed to the outrages and insults of the incensed multitude. Thus ended the usurpation of John, after he had borne the title of emperor about a year and six months, according to Philostorgius. Three days after his death, Aetius entered Italy, with an army of sixty thousand Hunns, who being met by Aspar, a bloody battle was fought, without any considerable advantage on either side; but, in the mean time, Aetius informed of the death of the usurper, thought it advisable to make the best terms he could for himself. Accordingly, Placidia promising not only to receive him into favour, but to distinguish him with the title of count, he submitted, and prevailed upon the Hunns to return into their own country. Caffinus, who was supposed to have favoured the usurpation of John, was sent into exile. When news of the captivity and death of the usurper was brought to Constantinople, Theodosius declared his cousin, young Valentinian, emperor, and Placidia regent of the empire during her son's minority. He intended to have taken a progress into Italy, in order to invest him there with the sovereignty, and with that design advanced as far as Theflonalica; but was seized in that city with a malady, which obliged him to return to Constantinople, whence he dispatched Helio to Rome, where Valentinian then was, with the purple and imperial diadem, which the young prince received on the twenty-third of October of the present year 425. The same year, the Vandals, who had settled in Spain, ravaged the Balearic islands; and the Goths, to whom settlements had been allotted in Gaul, seized on some of the neighbouring cities, and even laid siege to Arles, which however they were forced to raise at the approach of Aetius, who was sent against them with a considerable army. In the caft, Thrace was laid waste by the Hunns, probably the same who came to the assistance of the usurper John, and even threatened Constantinople with a siege, but their leader, by name Rougas, or Roillas, being killed with lightning, and a great number of them being daily swept away by a plague, which which broke out in the army, the rest withdrew of their own accord, dreading, not the valour of the Romans, say Socrates, but the power of Heaven, which had evidently espoused the cause of Theodosius. The following year 426, when Theodosius was consul the twelfth time, and Valentinian the second, nothing remarkable happened in either empire. But under the next consuls Hierius and Ardashirius the Goths, who had held Pannonia ever since the year 377, when they first entered that province, were by Theodosius transferred from thence into Thrace, where they continued for the space of fifty-eight years, that is, till they made themselves masters of Italy, under the conduct of Theodoric. This gives us room to believe, that Theodosius, in yielding the western empire to Valentinian, retained Pannonia, which comprised that part of the present Austria and Hungary, that lies on the Roman side of the Danube, and had hitherto belonged to the empire of the west. Great disturbances happened this year in Africa, which were attended with the loss of that province. The celebrated count Bonifacius, who is styled by St. Austin the joy of the church, the bulwark of Africa, and the glory of the empire, had been rewarded by Honorius, for his gallant behaviour at Marseille, with the command of the troops in Africa; which province he defended with great bravery against the repeated attempts of John, tho’ acknowledged by all the other commanders and governors of provinces. Placidia, highly pleased with his conduct and loyalty, called him to court, upon the death of that tyrant; and, after bestowing upon him the highest encomiums, preferred him to the post of Comes domest icorum, and sent him back into Africa with an unlimited power. This gave no small jealousy to his rivals at court, especially to Felix, commander in chief of the Roman forces, and to Aetius, who, after his departure, persuaded Placidia, that he had preferred Africa for himself, and only waited an opportunity of establishing there an independent sovereignty. Aetius added, that the empress might, when she pleased, oblige him to pull off the mask, by recalling him from his government; for he was very sure Bonifacius would disobey her orders. Hereupon the credulous princess immediately ordered Bonifacius to repair to Rome; but Aetius having written to him before, that the empress sought his ruin, and in order to compass it, would soon recall him, advising him at the same time, with great protestations of friendship, to consult sult his own safety, he, upon the receipt of Placidia's letter, concluded Aetius to be his true friend, and following his advice, he refused to comply with the orders he had received. Hereupon Placidia, no longer questioning the truth of Aetius's information, declared Bonifacius a public enemy, and dispatched a strong body of troops against him, under the command of Mavortius, Galbio, and Sinex, who besieged Bonifacius, in what place we are nowhere told, and kept him shut up, till quarrelling among themselves, Mavortius and Galbio were killed by the treachery of Sinex, and he in a sally by Bonifacius, who gained a complete victory, without the loss of one man. Placidia, being resoloved, notwithstanding the ill success of her three generals, to pursue the war with vigour, committed the whole management of it to to Sigisvult, by nation, a Goth, who, without loss of time, passing over into Africa, with a great number of his countrymen, made himself master of Carthage and Hippo. Bonifacius, finding the empress obstinately bent upon his ruin, and himself not in a condition to contend with the whole strength of the empire, had recourse to the Vandals, who, ever since the defeat of Caflinus in 422, had peaceably enjoyed the province of Boetica or Andalusia, and were at this time governed by Genferic, brother to the late king Gonderic. Genferic was according to Jornandes k and Procopius l, of a low stature, and lame by a fall from his horse: he thought much, and spoke little; was an enemy to pleasure and debauchery; had a wonderful address in gaining the affection of the people, and sowing divisions among his enemies. He was remarkably brave and courageous; but no less ambitious and passionate; well skilful in the art of war, and long enured to the hardships and toils attending it. He renounced the catholic faith, which he first professed, to embrace the doctrine of Arius, which prevailed among his countrymen the Vandals m. His brother Gonderic left several sons behind him; but he caueth them all to be put to death, together with their mother n. With this barbarian Bonifacius, whose piety had been formerly so much extolled by St. Auffin o, was forced, in his own defence, to enter into a treaty whereof the chief, and perhaps the only, article was, that, upon their assisting him, Africa should be divided between, Gonderic, says Procopius falsely, supposing supposing him still alive, Genseric and himself. The treaty being agreed to, Genseric, having assembled a great number of vessels, ordered all his Vandals, women and children as well as men, to embark; and abandoning Spain in the month of May of the year 528, while Felix and Taurus were consuls, crossed the frights of Gibraltar, and landed in Africa. The Romans took possession anew of the provinces which the Vandals had abandoned, and held them, till they were driven out by the Suevians, as the Suevians were in their turn by the Goths, who by that means, came to settle in that part of Spain. The same year, Aetius was sent into Gaul, to make war upon the Franks, whom he defeated with great slaughter, and obliged them to abandon the country on the Roman side of the Rhine, in which they had been allowed by Honorius to settle, and to retire, with their families beyond the river. What gave occasion to this war, we are nowhere told. The Franks were governed at this time by Clodius, as Prosper Tyro styles him, or Clodion, as he is called by Gregory of Tours and the modern writers. He is supposed, to have been the son, as well as the successor, of Faramond. Nothing happened this year in the east worthy of notice, except the publishing of a law, by which all brothels were suppressed in Constantinople. Florentius and Dionysius, consuls for the year 429, were succeeded by Theodosius and Valentinian, the former the thirteenth time, and the latter the third time consul. During the consulship of the two princes, Aetius was raised to the chief command of all the troops of the western empire, in the room of Felix, who was at the same time created a patriarch; but soon after killed in Ravenna by the mutinous soldiery, stirred up against him by Aetius, jealous of his great credit at court. The same year Aetius gained considerable advantages over the Juthungi, whose country bordered on Rhœtea; over the inhabitants of Noricum, who had revolted; and over the Goths in Gaul, attempting to raise new disturbances in that province. The following year, when Bassus and Antiochus were consuls, Aetius entirely reduced the Norici, and likewise the Vindelici, who had joined joined the former in the revolt. From Noricum, he passed into Gaul, to awe the Franks, who were said to be in arms. This year Placidia discovered at length the true cause of the revolt of Bonifacius. Some of that general's friends, greatly surprized at his entering all on a sudden into an alliance with the enemies of the empire, after having defended it against the barbarians with so much zeal and integrity, obtained leave of the empress to pass over into Africa, in order to confer with him in person, and hear what he could allege in his own defence. Bonifacius was overjoyed to see them, and produced, upon their charging him with treason and rebellion, the letter which Aetius had written to him, protesting, that nothing but his own safety and preservation could have induced him to turn his arms against his prince and country. With this letter they returned to Placidia, who was thereby fully convinced of the treachery of Aetius; but not thinking it advisable to provoke him, as he was then at the head of a victorious army in Gaul, she concealed her indignation for the present, and contented herself with expressing, in a letter to Bonifacius, her sincere detestation of the injury that had been done him; withholding affurin of her favour and protection for the future; and exhorting him to return to his duty, and consulting, with his usual zeal, the safety of the empire, drive out the barbarians, whom, for his own safety, he had called in. This Bonifacius readily undertook, offering them immense sums provided they quitted Africa, and returned to Spain; but as they had already reduced the whole country, except three cities, viz. Carthage, Hippo, and Cirta, Germanic first returned him a scoffing answer; and then falling upon him, cut most of his men in pieces, and obliged Bonifacius himself to fly to Hippo: which place the barbarians immediately invested but were obliged the following year, for want of provisions, to raise the siege, after it had continued for the space of fourteen months, Germanic attacking the town almost daily with incredible fury, and Bonifacius defending it with equal vigour and intrepidity. In the caft was held this year an oecumenic council at Ephesus, in which the doctrine of Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, affecting not only two natures in Christ, but two persons, was condemned, and he deposed on the twenty-second of June, the sentence of his deposition being signed by above two hundred bishops. The next year, Aetius was raised to the consulship. fulship, Placidia still pretending to be unacquainted with his treachery's conduct towards Bonifacius. He had for his colleague Valerius, the preceding year prefect of Constantinople. This year Bonifacius, reinforced with powerful succours sent both by Placidia and Theodosius, offered battle to the Vandals; who readily accepted it, cut most of his men in pieces, took an incredible number of prisoners, and obliged the rest to shelter themselves among the rocks and mountains. Among the prisoners was Marciarus, who afterwards attained to the empire. Aspar, who commanded on this occasion the eastern troops, with much-ado escaped into Africa, and returned to Constantinople, as did Bonifacius to Italy, being invited thither by Placidia. Upon their departure, the barbarians over-ran all Africa, committing everywhere dreadful ravages and unheard-of cruelties; which struck the inhabitants of Hippo with such terror, that they abandoned their city, which was first pillaged, and then set on fire, by the victorious enemy a. St. Auffin, bishop of the place, died the year before, in the fourth month of the siege.

Carthage and Cirtaha were now the only places in all Africa held by the Romans. Bonifacius, upon his arrival at Ravenna, was received with extraordinary demonstrations of kindness and esteem by Placidia, and raised to the chief command of the army, in the room of Aetius; who, finding his treachery discovered, and dreading the power of Bonifacius, assembled the forces under his command, in order to destroy his rival. Bonifacius, at his approach, marched out at the head of a body of chosen troops to meet him. Hereupon a battle ensuing, Bonifacius received a wound, of which he died three months after b. Thus Marcellinus, who did not, it seems, think it necessary to acquaint us in what place the battle was fought, nor which side carried the day. The same writer adds, that Bonifacius on his death-bed exhorted his wife Pelagia to marry no man but Aetius, if his wife should die before him. Aetius, dreading the resentment of Placidia, withdrew to the court of Ragula, or Rouas, king of the Hunns, whence he returned soon after, at the head of a numerous army of barbarians; but the empress promising not only to pardon him, but restore him to his former post, he diurnissed the barbarians, and returned to court, where he was this very year raised to the rank of a patrician c. The time, with Petronius Maximus, a dreadful fire broke out at Constantinople, which lasted three days, and consumed all the public granaries, with many other stately edifices, and great part of the city. In the following consulship of Apaf and Areobindus, Honoria, sister to the emperor Valentinian, having suffered herself to be debauched by one of her domestics, named Eugenius, was banished from the court, being then sixteen years old, and sent to Constantinople, her mother Placidia having discovered, that, by means of her eunuchs, she maintained a private correspondence with Attila, who had succeeded Rouas king of the Hunns; that she had even sent him a ring, and was daily pressing him to enter Italy at the head of a powerful army, and marry her. The following year 435, Theodosius being consul the fifteenth time, and Valentinian the fourth, a peace was at length concluded with the Vandals in Africa, to whom the Romans yielded great part of Numidia, all the province Proconsularis, and likewise Bizacene. This treaty was signed at Hippo, on the eleventh of February, by Generic, and by Trigetius, who had succeeded Bonifacius in Africa. The king of the Vandals delivered up to the Romans his son Huneric by way of hostage. The same year, Aetius gained a great victory over the Burgundians, who, having been allowed in 413, to settle in that part of Gaul which borders on the Rhine, had revolted from the Romans, and plundered Belgic Gaul. Gondicarius, their king, was obliged to submit to such conditions, as the conqueror thought fit to impose upon him and his people. But Gondicarius did not long enjoy the peace which Aetius had granted him; being soon after, that is, in the beginning of the following year, when Anthemius Ipidorus and Senator were consuls, attacked by the Hunns, and cut off, with twenty thousand of his men. Socrates writes, that of the unhappy Burgundians three thousand only were left alive, who, having embraced the christian religion, and received the sacrament of baptism, went, full of courage and confidence, to attack the enemy, of whom they killed a thousand, and obliged the rest to save themselves by a precipitous flight. Thus Socrates. But Orophi affirms us, that the Burgundians had embraced the

The Christian religion, before the year 417. The Goths, who had been allowed to settle in Aquitain, as we have observed above, and had Theodoric for their king, not satisfied with the countries that had been allotted them, made themselves masters of several neighbouring cities belonging to the Romans, and even laid siege to Narbonne; which, however, they were forced to raise, either this year 436 or the following, as Idatus will have it, count Litorius coming seasonably to the relief of the place with a numerous body of Hunns, who, falling upon the Goths, put them to flight, and entered the city, each horseman carrying with him two bushels of corn; which proved a very welcome supply, the inhabitants being by the long siege reduced to the utmost extremity. While these things passed in the west, Theodosius completed the ruin of idolatry in the east, by a law enacted in 435, ordering all the temples, oratories, and places consecrated to the worship of the idols, to be pulled down, and forbidding his subjects, on pain of death, to practise any of the pagan ceremonies, either in public or private. By this law the very foundations of the temples were to be entirely demolished, and the sign of the Christian religion, no doubt the cross, to be set up in the place where they stood. Theodosius passed part of the year 436, at Cyzicum. The following year 437, when Aetius was confin the second time, with Sigifvultus, or Sigifvult, the Romans, aslifted by the Hunns, pursed the war against the Goths in Gaul; but with what success we are no-where told. The Saxon pirates began this year to infest the coasts of the Armorici. Eudoxia, the daughter of Theodosius by the empress Eudokia, had been betrothed to Valentinian in 424, as we have related above; and this year the nuptials were celebrated with great solemnity at Constantinople, on the twenty-ninth of October. Valentinian being then eighteen years and five months old. The ceremony was to have been performed at Theffalonica; but Valentinian, out of complaisance to the royal bride, proceeded to Constantinople; which city he entered on the twenty-first of October. Theodosius, in giving, or, as others will have it, in betrothing his daughter, to Valentinian, obliged the young prince to yield to him West Illyricum, comprehending comprehending the Upper and Lower Pannonia, Dalmatia, and the two Noricum, viz. Mediterraneum and Ripenfe. The two Pannonias comprised that part of Austria and Hungary, that lies on the Roman side of the Danube; and the two Noricum the archbishopric of Salzburg with Styria and Carinthia. As for East Illyricum, it had belonged to the emperors of Constantinople ever since the time of Gracian, who yielded it to Theodosius the Great. Valentinian left Constantinople in the latter end of this year; and having spent the winter at Theflonica, returned early in the spring to Ravenna. He had by Eudoxia two daughters, viz. Eudocia and Placidia.

The following year, Theodosius being consul the sixteenth time, with Aciulus Glabria Faustus, the Suevians, who had settled in Galicia in 409, under the conduct of their king Ermeric or Hermeric, came after a long and bloody war to an agreement with the antient inhabitants; but the articles of that treaty have not been transmitted to us. The Romans still pursued the war against the Goths in Gaul, of whom eight thousand were this year cut in pieces by Aetius. In the east Justinian published, on the fifteenth of February of the present year 438, his famous code, that is, a collection of all the best and most useful laws that had been enacted by the lawful princes his predecessors. Eight able civilians were employed in this work, at the head of whom was Antiochus, who had been consul in 431. Such laws as were not contained in this code, were declared to be of no force. It was immediately received in the west; nay, it met with better success there than in the east, where it obtained only for the space of about ninety years, that is to the reign of Justinian, who abrogated this, and published a new code: but in the west it was received by Theodoric, and the Ostrogoths, who made themselves masters of Italy about the end of the fifth century, and likewise by Alaric, king of the Visigoths or Westrogoths, in Languedoc and Spain. The laws that were afterwards added to the code by Theodosius, and some other princes, were called Novellæ. Theodosius, in publishing the code, enacted, that the laws made by one prince should be of no force in the dominions of the other, unless confirmed and signed by him. In the following confulship of Theodosius, the seventeenth time consul, and of Feistus, Litorius, after having gained great advantages over the Goths in Gaul, laid siege to Toulouse, their capital. Theodoric, who was in the place, sent several catholic bishops to Litorius, with very reasonable proposals; nay, he offered in the end to submit to what terms the Romans thought fit to impose upon him, begging only, that they would grant to him and his Goths their lives and liberty. But Litorius, confiding in the valour of his Huns, and desirous of taking the Gothifh king alive, and carrying him in triumph, would hearken to no proposals. Hereupon Theodoric, having first performed his devotions, and visited all the churches of his capital in the habit of a penitent, fell out at the head of his Goths, and falling upon the enemy, cut most of them in pieces; put the few who survived the general slaughter to flight; and having surrounded Litorius, while he was attempting to make his escape, took him alive in spite of the vigorous and desperate resistance he made, and carried him with his hands tied behind his back into that city, which he had hoped to enter that very day in triumph. Theodoric caused him to be exposed for some time to the insults and outrages of the populace and children, and then to be thrown into the public prison, where he died soon after. Litorius seems to have been a pagan; for he reposéd great confidence in the answers of the auspices. He was, next to Actius, the most powerful man, and the best general, in the western empire. After this victory, the Goths might have easily extended their conquests to the Rhine; but Theodoric, thinking he ought to use with moderation a victory, for which he acknowledged himself in a particular manner indebted to heaven, hearkened to the proposals of Avitus, prefect of Gaul, and this very year concluded a peace with the Romans upon very reasonable terms. Jornandes supposes this peace to have been made by Litorius, and no battle to have been fought, or victory gained by the Goths; so little was that writer acquainted even with the history of his own nation. The Huns, who served under Litorius, were commanded by a king of their own nation, named Gauerici, who, during this war, laid siege to the city of Bazas, belonging ing to the Goths; but is said to have been obliged by a miraculous apparition to drop the enterprize and retire, as the reader will find related at length by Gregory of Tours. The same year Merida, then the metropolis of Lusitania, was taken by Richila, who the year before had succeeded his father Hermeric, king of the Suevians, in Galicia. But the loss of Carthage in Africa, surprized on the twenty-third of October of the present year by Genferic, king of the Vandals, proved a more fatal blow to the western empire. By the taking of that important place, which had belonged to the Romans for the space of five hundred and eighty-five years, the Vandals remained masters of the Proconsularis, of Byzacene, Getulia, and part of Numidia. However, Valentinian maintained so long as he lived, the two Mauritanias, viz. Cæsariensis and Sitifensis, with Tripolitana, Tingitana, and that part of Numidia in which Cyrtha stood. In the east, nothing worthy of notice happened this year, except the journey which the empress Eudocia undertook to Jerusalem, in compliance with a vow she had made to visit the holy places there. She passed through Antioch, where, in the presence of the senate and people, she pronounced a speech in commendation of that city from a throne of gold enriched with precious stones. At her departure, she presented the magistrates with a very considerable sum, for the relief of the indigent citizens. The inhabitants of that metropolis acknowledged the kindness she had shewed them by erecting two statues to her honour, placing the one, which was of bronzes, in the museum; and the other, which was plated over with gold, in the senate. At Jerusalem she presented Julianal, bishop of the place, with great sums, to be distributed among the poor, and with a cross of gold, adorned with precious stones, to be set up on mount Calvary; for which the bishop is said to have presented her in his turn with the right hand of St. Stephen, the protomartyr. The following year, when Valentinian was consul, the fifth time, with Anatolius, Genferic made a descent upon Sicily in the month of June; and meeting with little or no resistance, ravaged the open country, committing unheard-of cruelties, and even laid siege to Palermo: but not being able to reduce the place, he

he returned to Africa with an immense booty. The same year, count Censorius, who had been sent by Valentinian to negotiate a peace between the Suevians in Galicia and the natives of that country, was besieged by Rechila in Merfola on the Guadiana, where he resided, and upon the reduction of the place, taken prisoner. About the same time, Aetius, removing the Burgundians from the banks of the Rhine, allotted them settlements in the present duchy of Savoy, and rewarded a body of Alans, who had served the Romans with great fidelity under the conduct of their king Eocaric or Eocric, with lands on the Loire. These Alans are supposed to have settled afterwards with the Britons in Armorica. Bucherius takes Sangiban, king of the Alans, mentioned by Jornandes, to have been the successor of Eocaric. As Salvianus wrote at this time his treatise on judgments, we shall transcribe out of that piece a passage, wherein the author acquaints us with the chief virtues and vices of the several barbarous nations then infesting the empire. The Goths, says that writer, are treacherous, but chaste: the Alans are not so chaste, but less treacherous, the Franks are liars, but kind to strangers: the Saxons are exceeding cruel, but wonderfully chaste. But tho' the Saxons are cruel, continues Salvianus, the Gepidæ are void of humanity, the Hunns lewd and deceitful, the Alemans drunkards, the Alans lover of plunder, and the Franks deceitful and perfidious to such a degree as to look upon false oaths as ornaments of speech; yet these vices are not so criminal in the barbarians as in the Romans, who are instructed in the morals of the christian religion. The same writer observes elsewhere, that tho' the Goths would not suffer their own people to frequent brothels, yet in the countries allotted to them they kept up those infamous places for the sake of the Romans, who lived among them, and claimed the scandalous privilege of frequenting them without restraint. In the east, Paulinus, the emperor Eudocia's chief favourite, who by her interest had been raised in 430, to the high post of magister officiorum, was this year put to death by the emperor's orders at Caesarea in Cappadocia. And this is all we find in the ancient writers concerning this remarkable event. The more modern Greeks ascribe his death to the jealousy of Theodosius; and tell us, that the emperor emperor being presented on the sixth of January with an apple of an uncommon size, and extraordinary beauty, he immediately sent it, as a rarity, to Eudocia, and she to Paulinus, in whose conversation she took great delight, as he was a man of learning, and the empress herself well versed in all the branches of literature. Paulinus, not knowing by whom it had been sent to the empress, thought it a proper present for the emperor, and accordingly carried it to him. This raised some jealousy in Theodosius, who thereupon dismissed Paulinus; and sending for Eudocia, asked her what was become of the apple. The empress, not caring to own she had given it to Paulinus, answered, she had eat it. Upon this, the emperor, perceiving it, commanded Paulinus to be immediately executed, and from that time shewed himself so indifferent towards the empress, that she begged leave soon after to return to Jerusalem, and to continue in that city, which was readily granted her. Thus Constantine Manassis, Zonaras, Nicephorus, Glycas and Codinus.

That Eudocia retired about this time to Jerusalem is very certain; and likewise, that there was a misunderstanding between her and the emperor, who caused a priest, by name Severus, and a deacon, named John, whom Eudocia had carried with her from Constantinople to Jerusalem, to be murdered, for no other reason, but because the empress lived in great intimacy with them, and made them frequently rich presents. This giving, either jealousy to the prince, or occasion to scandalous reflections, Theodosius dispatched Saturnius, his comes domesticorum, to Jerusalem, with private orders to dispatch the two favourite ecclesiastics. Eudocia was so affected with their death, that not mistress of her temper, she caused, in her turn, Saturnius to be murdered; which provoked the emperor to such a degree, that he ordered all the great officers of her court to quit her service, and return to Constantinople; which was reducing her to the condition of a private person. Thus she lived at Jerusalem to her death, which happened in 460. She is said to have solemnly declared on her death-bed, that she was altogether innocent as to the crime, of which Theodosius had suspected her and Paulinus. As she was possessed of immense wealth, which the emperor left untouched, she built at Jerusalem a great number of churches, monasteries, and hospitals.

hospitals, adorned the city with many stately edifices, and, at a vast expense, repaired the walls, which in most places were entirely ruined. She was buried in a magnificent tomb in the church of St. Stephen, which she had built in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. Her piety is greatly extolled by most writers; especially by Cassiodorus, who styles her of all women the most pious, the most religious. The following year, Cyrus alone was consul: he excelled in polite learning, especially in poetry; and having by that means gained the favour and protection of Eudocia, who took great delight in verses, he had been raised by her interest to the first employments in the state. As he entered the circus this year with the confular ornaments, the people, by whom he was greatly beloved, received him with such acclamations, that the emperor, who was present, caused him out of jealousy, a few days after, to be stripped of all his employments, and his estate to be confiscated, giving out, that he was inclined to paganism, and that he aspired at the empire. Hereupon Cyrus fled for refuge to a church, and caused himself to be ordained priest. The emperor respecting his new character, granted him his life, and soon after suffered him to be ordained bishop, and to be raised to the see of Cotyca in Phrygia. As Generici, king of the Vandals, was now become very formidable, Theodosius resolved in the end to assist Valentinian, his cousin and son-in-law, against so powerful an enemy. Accordingly he fitted out a fleet, consisting of eleven hundred large ships, and putting on board of it the flower of his army, under the conduct of Arcovindas, Anius, and Germanus, he ordered them to land in Africa, and joining the western forces there, to drive Generici out of the countries he had usurped. They steer'd their course to Sicily, in order to pass more safely from thence over into Africa. But in the mean time, Generici having sent a solemn embassy to Theodosius, and pretending to be desirous of concluding a peace with the two empires, the Roman generals waited on the coast of Sicily the result of the negotiations, which Generici craftily spun out till the season proper for action was over. While his embassadors were still at Constantinople, the Perrians, in open breach of the treaty made between the two empires in 422, entered the Roman territories in an hostile manner; which obliged Theodosius to recall his forces, and Valentinian to conclude a peace with Genesic, which he could not obtain but by yielding to him all the countries in Africa, which he had feized, and we have mentioned above. Anatolius and Aspar were dispatched against the Persians, who finding the Romans, whom the expected to surprize, upon their guard, hearkened to an accommodation; so that a peace was concluded, whereas one of the chief conditions was, that neither the Persians nor the Romans should for the future raise any new fortifications on the frontiers. The same year, Arfaces, king of Armenia, dying, divided his kingdom between his two sons Tigranes and Arfaces; but by his last will bequeathed the far greater part to Tigranes. Hereupon Arfaces had recourse to Theodosius, who threatening to make war upon Tigranes, terrifed the young prince to such a degree, that flying to the protection of the Persian king, he yielded to him his share, preferring the ease and quiet of a retired life to all the charms of a crown. Arfaces, on the other hand, dreading the power of the Persians, put Theodosius in possession of his share, upon certain conditions, one of which was, that his family should enjoy for ever an entire liberty, and an exemption from all tribute and taxes. Thus ended the kingdom of Armenia, after it had continued for many ages, and given occasion to much bloodshed and endless wars, waged by the Romans first with the Parthians, and afterwards with the Persians. It began and ended in Arfaces. The share of Tigranes belonging to the Persians, was called Perfarmenia and Armenia Persica. The part of Arfaces held by the Romans was thenceforth governed by a particular officer, with the title of come Armenia, or count of Armenia. The same year, the Huns, taking advantage of the wars, in which the Romans were engaged with the Vandals and Persians, passed the Danube, and with a formidable army fell unexpectedly upon Thrace. They had invaded that province in 425, under the conduct of Rougas, their king, as we have related above; but he being killed with lightning, and at the same time a plague breaking out, and raging with great violence, in his army, the barbarians repassed the Danube of their own accord, not caring, says Socrates, to engage in a war with the Romans, whose cause heaven had evidently espoused. Rougas was succeeded.

succeeded by Roas or Rouas in 434, who concluded a peace with the Romans, whereof one of the conditions was, that they should pay him yearly a pension of three hundred and fifty pounds weight of gold. A few years after, the Hunns resolving to drive out the Boschi, and other barbarous nations dwelling on the banks of the Danube under the protection of the Romans, Rouas dispatched one Eilas to the court of Constantinople, threatening to make war upon Theodosius, if he lent them the least assistance. Hereupon the two generals, Plintha and Dionysius, were appointed by the emperor to treat with the king of the Hunns, and divert him, if possible, from the resolution he had taken. But in the mean time, Rouas dying, and his nephew, the famous Attila, of whom we shall speak at length in the history of the Hunns, succeeding him, the embassadors were ordered to treat with him and his brother Bleda, his partner in the sovereignty. But in the room of Dionysius, who could not agree with Plintha, was sent the questor Epigenes, a man of great experience in negotiations. The embassadors had an interview with the two princes in the neighbourhood of Margum, a city on the Danube in Upper Moesia, at a place where the Margus or Margis falls into that river. The Romans were obliged to confer with them on horseback, the Hunns refusing to dismount. The peace was confirmed, but upon such conditions as plainly betrayed the weakness and deplorable condition of the empire. These were, 1. That the Romans should deliver up to Attila and Bleda such Hunns as had taken, or should for the future take, refuge in the Roman dominions. 2. That the Roman prisoners, who should make their escape from the Hunns without paying their ransom, should in like manner be delivered up or eight pieces of gold paid for each of them. 3. That, instead of three hundred and fifty pounds weight of gold, the Romans should for the future pay annually seven hundred. 4. That the Romans should not affright any nation whatsoever, when attacked by, or at war with, the Hunns. In compliance with this shameful treaty, the Romans immediately delivered up to Attila some princes of the royal blood of the Hunns, who were by his orders crucified like the meanest of slaves, in the sight of the Romans, for no other crime but because they had abandoned their own country to serve in their armies. Attila, being, in virtue of this treaty, at full liberty to make what conquest he pleased, reduced all the northern countries, his authority being acknowledged.

ledged even by the several barbarous nations lying north of the Euxine sea. Having thus extended his dominions, he resolved to take advantage of the wars in which Theodosius was engaged this year with the Persians and Vandals; and accordingly, without any regard to the above-mentioned treaty, he passed the Danube at the head of a very numerous and formidable army, and entering Thrace, made himself master of several cities and strong holds, and, among the rest, of Viminacium, a place of great importance on the Danube, and of Margum, which was betrayed to him by the bishop of the place. Elated with this success, he dispatched a messenger to Theodosius, requiring, or rather commanding, him to deliver up forthwith all the Huns who had taken refuge in the Roman dominions, to pay part of the tribute that had been owing for some time, and to settle what should be paid him for the future. Theodosius could not prevail upon himself to abandon those, who, after the declaration of war, had forsaken Attila, and come over to him. Whereupon Attila began to ravage the country, putting all to fire and sword, without diffusion of sex, age, or condition. He took by storm Retiarium on the Danube in upper Moesia, Singidunum, Naissus and Sirmium, formerly the capital of all Illyricum, with several other cities and strong-holds, informuch, that Theodosius, not thinking himself safe at Constantinople, retired the following year 442, when Eudoxius and Diocletian were consuls, into Asia. As to the issue of this war, we are left quite in the dark. All we know is, that this very year a peace was concluded between Attila and Theodosius, who thereupon returned to Constantinople, and entered that city on the twenty-seventh of August. From this time Attila continued quiet till the year 447, contenting himself with only threatening to make war upon the Romans, in order to draw from them corn, money, provisions, and whatsoever else he stood in need of; for the Romans, trembling at the very name of Attilas, complied with all his demands, however unreasonable, and obeyed him, says Priscus, like so many slaves, that he might have no pretence to take arms against them. The embassadors he sent to Constantinople returned always loaded with presents; informuch that, when he thought fit to reward any of

of his own people, he used to send them, under some pretence or other, with the character of ambassadors to Theodosius, who, to court the friendship of their master, never failed to load them with presents to a great value. Thus were the subjects of the empire impoverished to enrich the barbarians, their sworn enemies. Attila, finding himself thus become the terror of the Romans, is said to have sent, out of mere wantonnss, two Goths, with the character of ambassadors, the one to Theodosius, and the other to Valentinian, whom, by his orders, they addressed thus; Attila, my master and yours, commands you to get ready a palace for his reception. During these transactions in the east, the Suevians made great progress in Spain, where they took the city of Seville, and reduced all Baetica with the province of Carthagena.

The following year, Maximus being consul, the second time, with Paternus, Theodosius, leaving Constantinople, visited the province of Pontus, where he caused the public edifices and walls of Heraclea to be repaired. As he was one day, during this progress, marching on foot, greatly tormented with heat, dust, and thirst, an officer of his guards presented him with a beautiful cup full of fresh and excellent liquor; but the emperor, returning the officer thanks in a most obliging manner, declared, that he would not by any means refresh himself, when it was not in his power to refresh those who attended him. In 444, when Theodosius was consul, the eighteenth time, with Albinus, died Arcadia, the sister of Theodosius. The same year the eunuch Antiochus, the emperor’s great chamberlain, being convicted of extortion, and abusing his authority to the oppression of the people, was by Theodosius degraded from the rank of a patrician, and confined to the monastery of St. Euphemia at Chalcedon, stripped of the great wealth he had amassed, and deprived of all the honours which he had enjoyed. Theophanes writes, that Theodosius made him pope, meaning perhaps, that he obliged him to take holy orders. Upon his disgrace, the emperor enacted a law excluding all eunuchs from the dignity of patrician. The following year, when Valentinian was consul, the sixth year, with Nomus, nothing remarkable happened in the

The east; but in the west, Vitus being sent with a considerable army into Spain, to support the Romans, that is, the natives, against the Suevians, most of his men were cut off by Rechila, and he obliged to save himself by flight, and abandon the inhabitants to the mercy of those barbarians. The next year, Aetius being consul the third time with Q. Aurelius Symmachus, the Britons, no longer able to withstand the Scots and Picts, had recourse to Aetius, who governed the western empire almost with an absolute sway. To move him to compassion, they wrote him a letter with the following direction, The groans of the Britons to the consul Aetius; but could not, with all their groans and tears, prevail upon him to lend them the least assistance. The learned Usher thinks, that Valentinian was then under apprehension of a war with Attila. The venerable Bede supposes the Hunns to have already broken into the western empire; but he was therein certainly mistaken. In the east a dreadful plague raged this and the following year, when Ardaburius and Alypius were consuls, and violent earthquakes were felt in most provinces, which overturned several cities, and great part of the new walls of Constantinople, with fifty-seven towers, and many stately edifices, not only in that city, but likewise at Antioch and Alexandria. The same year, 447, Attila, upon what provocation we know not, (for both emperors readily complied with all his demands, however unjust and arrogant) broke into Thrace with a formidable army, consisting of Hunns, Goths, Gepidæ, Alans, and many other barbarous nations, commanded by their respective kings. Attila, whom they all obeyed, at the head of this numerous host, over-ran without opposition Illyricum, Thrace, both Dacia's, Moesia, and Scythia. He took and plundered above seventy cities, and, among the rest, Philippopolis in Thrace, properly so called, Arcadiopolis in the province of Europe, and Marcianopolis, the metropolis of Lower Moesia. They extended their ravages on one side to the Euxine sea, and on the other to the shores of Thermopylae, which part of Thessaly from Achaia or Greece. In the mean time, Arnegiselus, governor of Moesia and Thrace, having drawn together all the troops quartered in those two provinces, marched against Attila; And engaging him him in Lower Moesia, on the banks of the river Utis, which falls into the Danube near a city of the same name, cut off great numbers of his men; but falling unluckily from his horse, he was himself killed, after having fled his life dear, and his army put to the rout: another battle was fought in the Chermonesus near Gallipoli, probably by the generals Aspar and Arcobindus, who were both sent against Attila. But no better success attended the Romans in this than in the other engagement; so that Theodosius was obliged the following year 448, when Zeno and Pothuminus were consuls, to send Anatolius, with one Vigilius, who understood the language of the Huns, to Attila to sue for peace, which he was strictly enjoined to conclude upon any terms. A peace was accordingly agreed to, and ratified by the emperor, on the following terms, highly opprobrious to the Roman name, viz. 1. That the Romans should pay immediately to Attila six thousand pounds weight of gold, and every year two hundred. 2. That they should send back to him all his defectors, and receive none for the future. 3. That they should deliver up the Roman captives, who had escaped without paying their ransom, or pay for each of them twelve pounds weight of gold. 4. That the Romans should send no embassadors to Attila, till they had delivered up to him all his defectors and fugitives. Pursuant to this ignominious treaty, six thousand pounds weight of gold were sent immediately to Attila, with all the Huns who had taken refuge in the Roman dominions, among whom were several princes, who chose rather to be killed by the Romans, than fall into the hands of Attila. While these things passed in the east, Rechila king of the Suevians settled in Spain, died at Merida in 447, and was succeeded by his son Requarius, who the year following married the daughter of Theodoric, king of the Goths in Languedoc, and soon after went to pay a visit to his father-in-law at Toulouse; but on his return to Spain, surprized the city of Lerida; and carrying with him from thence a great number of captives, pillaged the territory of Saragosa, which, according to Isidorus, belonged to the Romans. This year a misunderstanding arose between Attila and Valentian on account of some sacred vessels, which Attila falsely pretended to have been stolen from him by one Silvanus, a banker in Rome. Silvanus, vanus, who was the lawful owner of these vessels, had sold them to the church. But as they were pieces of exquisite workmanship, Attila, coveting them, or rather seeking a pretence to quarrel with Valentinian, claimed them as stolen from him by Silvanus, and with great arrogance pressed the emperor either to restore the vessels, or deliver up to him Silvanus. Hereupon count Romulus was sent with Promotus, governor of Noricum, and Romulus, an officer of distinction, to the court of Attila, to convince him, if possible, that the vessels in dispute had never belonged to him; or if he continued to claim them, to pay him their value in gold. Attila received the embassadors in a very obliging manner, entertaining them at his own table with the embassadors of Theodosius, who arrived at his court much about the same time. But the only answer that he returned to their reasoning and arguments was, that the vessels belonged to him, and that he was determined to do himself justice, and declare war, if Valentinian did not either restore them, or deliver up to him Silvanus, who had stolen them. But notwithstanding these menaces, he did not make war upon Valentinian till three years after, tho' that prince could not by any means be prevailed upon to comply with either of his demands. The following year, when Protogenes and Asturius or Asterius were confus, one Edecon being sent by Attila with the character of embassador to Theodosius, the eunuch Chryfaphus, the emperor's great chamberlain, discovering him to be greatly taken with the splendor of the court, and desirous to continue among the Romans, promised him great wealth and preferments, provided he dispatched Attila; which he promising to do, Theodosius consented to the wicked attempt, and charged Vigilius, interpreter to the Roman embassadors at the court of Attila, to be assisting in him in that undertaking. But Edecon, either apprehensive of the dangers attending such a desperate attempt, or deceiving the whole time the emperor and his minister, upon his return discovered the plot to Attila, who thereupon caused Vigilius to be seized, and dispatched his secretary Orestes to reproach Theodosius with his treachery, and demand Chryfaphus, the chief author and contriver of the conspiracy, to be delivered up to him. But Nomon, who was sent embassador to the king of the Hunns on this occasion, with several other persons of great distinction, gained his esteem and affection to such a degree, that he promised to live in peace and amity with Theodosius, pardoned Chryfaphus, set Vigilius at liberty berty, and dismissed the embassadors, loaded with rich presents. Thus Priscus, who was an eye-witness of what he wrote, having attended the embassadors to the court of Atti-

The following year, 450, when Valentinian was con-ful the seventh time, with Avienus, Theodosius was fo-bruised with a fall from his horse in hunting, that being with much ado carried in a sedan to Constantinople, he died there the next day, the twentieth of June, according to Theo-phanes *, or the twenty-eighth of July, as we read in Theodorus *, who is followed by most chronologers. According to this opinion, he died in the fiftieth year of his age, after having reigned forty-two years, and near three months after the death of his father, and forty-eight since he had received the title of Augustus. He was buried on the thirtieth of July, in the same tomb with his father Arcadius z. He is generally commendéd as a prince of exemplary nícty; but all own him to have had but slender parts, and to have been entirely guided by those about him, especially by the eunuchs of the court, who, abusing his authority, oppressed the people to such a degree, that many in his reign chose rather to abandon their native country, and live among the Hunns, and other barbarians, than bear the tyrannical government, of those who, by the eunuchs, were set over them. Authors give us the following instance of his disaffection to public affairs: As he had been used, when yet a child, to sign all the acts that were brought to him by his ministers, without reading them, he continued the same custom even after he was married, till his sister Pulcheria, to apprize him of the evil consequences that might attend it, caused an act to be drawn up, whereby he yielded to her for ever the empress Eudocia as her slave. This act the emperor signed without perufing it, or enquiring what it contained; which he had no sooner done, than Pulcheria desired him to read it, when, ashamed of his past indolence and neglet, he resolved to be upon his guard for the future, and to sign no papers till he was well informed what they contained *. He was a great friend to the church, but yet, misled by ill-meaning men, countenanced the declared enemies of the orthodox faith, as the reader will find in the account which the ecclesiastic writers give us of the two councils held by his orders at Ephesus, and of the progress which the hero of Eutyches made in his reign. Of the writers who furnished under Theodosius, we shall speak in note (S).

(S: We are chiefly indebted to the ecclesiastic writers Socrates, Sozomen, and Philostratus, for the history of the reign of Theodosius the younger. Socrates was born in Constantinople about the year 380, and spent most part of his life in that city (1). He speaks of what happened after the year 395, as of things that had happened in his time (2). He tells us, that when he was yet very young, he knew a Novatian priest, by name Auxano, who remembered the council of Nice, and lived to the reign of Theodosius the younger, that is, to the year 403 (3). Socrates studied grammar under Helladius and Ammonius, two pagan priests of Alexandria, who had retired to Constantinople, when the temple of the idols were pulled down in their own country, which happened in the year 389. He probably studied eloquence under Troilus, who in his time taught it with great applause at Constantinople: for he beholds mighty encomiums upon that sophist (4). He begins where Eusebius ended his history, but repeats the transactions of the first year of Constance's reign, that is, of the year 306, and carries his work down to the seventeenth confulship of Theodosius II. that is, to the year 439, so that it com-prompts the space of an hundred and thirty-four years. He addresses it to one Theodorus, by whose orders he undertook it. Thedorus was probably a bishop or priest; for he calls him a person consecrated to the worship of God (5). He writes in a familiar, but plain and easy, style. At first he followed Rufinus, especially in his first two books, copying even his mistakes; but the he corrected, after having perused the works of Athanaeus. He informed himself with great care of the truth of what he relates, copying what had happened before his time from the authors that were most esteemed, and relating only such events of his own time as he himself had either seen, or learnt from persons of unquestionable veracity (6). As he speaks of the Novatians with great refinement, and even pretends some of their bishops to have wrought miracles, several writers conclude from thence, that he himself held the tenets of Novatus. But on the other hand, he blames the Novatians for separating from the church (7), and in express terms disapproves the suppressing of the office of penitentiary in the church of Constantinople, against which office the Novatians had always exclaimed (8). Socrates wrote in Greek, but seems to have been acquainted with the Latin tongue. His history is quoted by Liberatus, and the seventh eumenical council. So-zomen, or Salaminus Hermias Sozomenes, as he is styled by Photius, was not, as some have conjectured from the first of these names, a native of Salamis in the island of Cyprus, but of a village in the territory of Gaza, named Bethelia, as appears from the account he gives of the conversion of his grandfather to the christian religion (9). The title of scholasticus, bestowed upon him by Photius (10) and others, gives us room to believe, that he was well versed in polite literature. He pleaded at the bar in Constantinople (11), and was at the same time aseffor or counsel-elor to Isidorus, prefect of the caet in 435, and 436 (12). He was well acquainted with the civil law, as is plain from his works. He wrote first in two books the ecclesiastic history, from the ascension of our Saviour to the deposition of Licinius in 323 (13), which work has been long since entirely lost. He afterwards undertook his great history, which was to comprise whatever had happened worthy of notice from the third confullship of Cripus and Constantine Caesar, that is, from the year 324, to the seventeenth confullship of Theodosius the younger, in 439 (14). Whence it is manifest, that the work, which has reached our times, is imperfect, since it ends in the year 415. Some think he was prevented by death from pursuing his design. St. Gregory writes, that the history of Sozomen was not received by the church of Rome on account of the many falsehoods it contained, and of the great commendations the author bestowed on Theodorus of Mopuestia. He is not indeed without faults; but notwithstanding some mistakes that are to be found in his work, he is commonly preferred to the other historians of those times. Whoever compares his history with that of Socrates, will find, that the one has evidently copied from the other, most likely Sozomen from Socrates; for the latter seems to have written before the former. When Socrates wrote, the house in which Arius died was still standing; whereas Sozomen observes, that an Arian, having bought it, had pulled it down, and built another in its room (15). Besides, the candor and simplicity with which Socrates writes, would not, in our opinion, have allowed him to copy his history from another without owning it. Though Sozomen bestows great commendations on some Novatian bishops, as Socrates had done; yet he condemns in several places their tenets (16). About the beginning of the sixth century, Caßdorius, cauèd the histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret to be translated into the Latin tongue by one Epiphanes, that Greece alone, says Caßdorius, might not possess so valuable and necessary a work. He divided them, thus translated, into twelve books, commonly known by the

The Roman History. Book III.

The name of Historia Tripartita. Before him Theodorus, the reader, had begun to compile a history in Greek from the three above-mentioned historians. But of that work, only the two first books, comprising the reigns of Constantine and Constans, have reached our times. It does not appear, that the author wrote any more; and those, which he wrote, have never yet been printed. Philostratus, born about the year 368, in the province of Cappadocia Secunda, wrote an ecclesiastic history, or rather, under that name, an apology for the Arians, especially the Eunomians whose tenets he himself held. He began his work, which was divided into twelve books, with the death of Constantius Chlorus, the father of Constantine the Great, and carried it down to the accession of Valentinian III. to the empire, that is, to the year 425. This work has been long since lost; but an abstract of it, which may be called a large history, has been conveyed to us by Photius (17), who commends the style, but thinks the author often too diffuse and tedious. The whole is a continued fatire on the catholics, and a panegyric on the Arians. Philostratus seldom agrees with other writers, and relates several remarkable events, quite unknown to those who lived at the same time with him, such as the miracles wrought by Eusebius of Nicomedia, by Theophilus the Indian, by Leontius of Tripoli, &c. whence Photius styles him a fabulous and lying writer (18). However, he is often quoted by John of Antioch, who wrote about the beginning of the seventh century, by Nicetas Coniates, who flourished in the thirteenth century, by Nicephorus and others. Suidas likewise has copied several passages from him. Philostratus, besides his history, wrote a long panegyric on Eunomius, and an apology for the christian religion against Porphyrius; but neither of these works has reached our times. About the same time flourished Philip of Sida in Pamphylia, who wrote a very diffuse history from the creation to his time, consisting of eight hundred and sixty-four books, which he intitled the Christian history. Of this voluminous work, which has been long since lost, Photius speaks with great contempt (19). The same author wrote another extensive work, wherein he confuted, or attempted to confute, the writings of the emperor Julian (20); but that performance has undergone the same fate as the other. The author was a deacon of the church of Constantinople, and thought himself highly injured, because he was not preferred to that see (21). Priscus, who attended Maximus, when sent ambassador to Attila in 449, wrote the history of the war between that prince and Theodosius; the history of Marcian’s reign; an account of the journey of Anacharsis to Rome; of the war carried on in the reign of Leo against Geneseric; and of the unhappy end of Alpa and his children, put to death by the emperor Leo in 471 (22).

The Roman History.

Suidas ascribes to him eight books of the Byzantine history, and of the war with Attilus, meaning, no doubt Atula (23). Priscus was a native of Panes or Panium, reckoned among the cities of the province of Europe in Thrace (24). He was a sophist, or professor of eloquence (25). He visited Rome, where he saw the king of the Franks (26), no doubt Meroue, and travelled likewise to Thebaïs and Alexandria in Egypt. In the latter city he was an eyewitness of the disorders which attended the election of the holy bishop Proterus to that see, and greatly contributed to the appealing of them by the good advice he gave to Florus, prefect of Egypt. Euphemius, magister officiorum to the emperor Marcian, advised with him in all matters of importance (27). His history is said to be still extant and lodged in some libraries (28). Hitherto only some fragments of it, relating to embassies, have been published, which are to be found among the works of the other Byzantine historians. Some passages of his history are quoted by Jornandes (29). He wrote with great exactness and elegance (30). Suidas mentions his declamations and letters (31). The history of Theodorus the younger was likewise written by one John, who is often quoted by Evagrius, and by him styled orator, or professor of eloquence (32). He is thought to have been a native of Antioch, because he is frequently quoted by Evagrius in what relates to the history of that city (33). His history ended with the seventh year of Justin I. of the Christian era 525, whence we must distinguish him from another historian of the same name, whose history began with the death of Justinian, and was carried down to the reign of Mauricius (34). Another historian, named likewise John, a follower of Eutyches, wrote in five books the ecclesiastic history, from the time of Ne- florius to the defeat of Basilius; that is, from the year 428, to 477. To his ecclesiastic history he added five books (35), the contents of which are to us quite unknown.

C H A P. XXXI.

The Roman history, from the death of Theodosius II. to the total failure of the western empire in Augustulus.

If the laws at this time in force concerning private estates and inheritances, had obtained with respect to kingdoms and empires, the right of Eudoxia to the imperial crown had been indisputable, that princess being the only child of the deceased emperor; but not the least regard was had, either to her, or to the emperor Valentinian her husband: and truly neither of them seems to have laid any claim to the eastern empire, tho' Theodosius left no issue male behind him. As Pulcheria had shared the sovereignty with her brother, and bore the title of Augusta, she remained by his death sole mistress of the empire; and no person was more capable of governing it well. However, as no woman had yet reigned alone in either empire, she resolved to marry, notwithstanding the resolution she had taken, or the vow she had made, to continue a virgin to her death. Pursuant to this resolution, as soon as the death of Theodosius was publicly known, she sent for Marcianus, a person famous for his exemplary piety, and extraordinary qualifications; and told him, that she designed to raise him to the sovereignty, by marrying him, on condition that he would suffer her, agreeable to the resolution she had taken, to live and die a virgin. Marcianus readily complying with this condition, she sent for the patriarch Anatolius, and the senate, and in their presence declared Marcianus emperor. Her choice being approved by them, and applauded by all the officers at court, both civil and military, the new emperor was crowned at the palace of Hebdomon, on the twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth of August of the present year 451. His election was immediately notified to Valentinian; and he approving it, his images were, according to custom, sent into the west, and received at Rome on the thirtieth of March of the following year. After this, the marriage was celebrated with the utmost pomp and magnificence.

Pulcheria, being then in the fifty-first, and Marcian in the fiftieth year of his age. He was a native of Thrace or Illyricum, and descended from a family of no great distinction, but remarkable for their attachment to the orthodox faith. As his father served in the army, he resolved to follow the same profession; and, pursuant to this resolution, set out for Philippopolis in Thrace, in order to enlist himself there. On his journey, he found the body of a man lately killed lying on the public road, and, prompted by his good nature, could not proceed, till he had decently interred it. This same persons, accidently coming by, observed, and immediately acquainted the magistrates of Philippopolis with what they had seen; who thereupon caused Marcian to be seized and examined, and would have condemned him, had not the true author of the murder been seasonably discovered and convicted. Marcian, thus set at liberty, lifted himself among the troops quartered at Philippopolis, and served still as a private man in 421, when, upon the breaking out of the war between the Romans and Perrians, the corps in which he served was ordered into Syria; but Marcian falling sick as they marched through Asia, continued a long time indisposed at a place called Sydema, and thence repaired to Constantinople, where he lifted himself among the troops that were commanded by Ardashir, and his son Aspar, who discovering him to be a man of uncommon parts, raised him to the post of their secretary. With that character he attended Aspar in 431, into Africa, where he was taken prisoner by Geneseric, with many persons of distinction, Aspar himself having narrowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands. All the captives of note were, by Geneseric's orders, brought into the palace, where while they were waiting in an open court till the king was at leisure to view them, Marcian lying down on the ground, fell asleep, and an eagle at the same time appearing over him, says Evagrius, and intercepting with his extended wings the scorching rays of the sun, afforded him a friendly shade. This Geneseric observed from his apartment, and concluding from thence, that he was destined by Heaven to the empire, he granted him his liberty, after having obliged him to swear, that he would never make war upon the Vandals. From Africa he returned to Constantinople, where he was, according to Theophanes, honoured with the senatorial dignity. Theodorus styles him only tribune; but adds, that he distinguished him-
The Roman History.  Book III.

He had by his first wife, who died before his accession to the empire, but one daughter, named Euphemia, whom, when he was raised to the sovereignty, he married to Anthemiüs, afterwards emperor of the west. All writers agree, that Marcianus was a prince of most exemplary piety, a zealous patron of the orthodox faith, a father to his people, a sincere friend to virtue, an enemy to all vice and irreligion; in short, a person endowed with every great and good quality becoming a prince. Some writers prefer him even to Constantine and Theodosius the Great. He preferred none but persons of known abilities, and unblemished characters; whence the reader will find, in the writers of those times, great encomiums bestowed, not only upon him, but on all those who were employed by him in the administration. In the west died in the same year 450, Pulcheria, mother to the emperor Valentinian, and was interred at Ravenna, where her tomb is still to be seen. She is blamed by some writers for yielding, or inducing her son to yield, West Illyricum to Theodosius. She had governed the western empire with an absolute sway for the space of twenty-six years, Valentinian suffering her to rule, to the hour of her death, with the same authority which she had enjoyed in his minority.

The following year 451, Attila assembled one of the most numerous and formidable armies we find mentioned in history. It consisted of Hunns, Gepidae, Ostrogoths, Rugians, Geronians, Burgundians, Belonatians, Squiri, Neurians, Baffarm, Thuringians, Bructerians, Franks dwelling on the Neckar, Marcomans, Suevians, Quadians, Heruli, Turcilingians, and in short, of all the northern barbarians, to the number of five, or, as others will have it, of seven, hundred thousand men. Attila, in raising so formidable an army, had nothing less in view, than to make himself master of both empires. But Marcian returning no other answer to his ambassadors, sent to demand the annual pension or tribute paid him by Theodosius, than that he had gold for his friends, and steel for his enemies, he thought it advisable to turn his arms first against Valentinian, whom he held in the utmost contempt, being well apprized, that it would be no difficult undertaking to reduce, in spite of all opposition, the eastern, after he had made himself master of the western empire. Being therefore determined to make war upon Valentinian, The Roman History.

Lentinius, he sent a solemn embassy to that prince, demanding his sister Honoria, whom he pretended to be his wife, and with her half of the western empire, as belonging of right to her. We have observed above, that Honoria had maintained, by means of her eunuchs, a private correspondence with Attila, and even sent him a ring, which the ambassador produced to prove their marriage. Valentinian answered, That, among the Romans, women had no right to the imperial crown, nor to any part of the empire; and at the same time dispatched Carpio, the son of Aetius, and several other persons of great distinction, to the court of Attila, to convince him of the injustice of his claim. Attila, to the great surprise, both of Valentinian and the embassadors themselves, seemed to be fully satisfied with their reasoning, and the arguments they alleged; but it was only the better to deceive the unwarry prince, and put in execution a new scheme. Hemeric, the son of Generic, king of the Vandals, having married the daughter of Theodoric king of the Goths in Languedoc, caused her nose to be cut off soon after, and sent her back, thus disfigured, to her father, upon a bare suspicion, that she designed to poison him. As he was well apprised, that Theodoric would not fail to resent such an affront, he resolved to be beforehand with him; and therefore sent embassadors with rich presents to Attila, to engage him to fall upon Theodoric. Attila, who wanted only some pretence to enter Gaul, readily closed with the proposal, pretending at the same time, that he might meet with no opposition from the Romans, to be fully satisfied with the reasons alleged by their embassadors, and to relinquish all claim to any part of the empire; nay, he sent to Valentinian embassadors, with a very friendly, in appearance, and obliging letter, affirming him, that his warlike preparations were designed against Theodoric alone; that, as to the Romans, he should ever look upon them as his friends, provided they did not espouse the cause of his enemy. At the same time he wrote to Theodoric, affirming him of his friendship, and exhorting that prince to join him against the Romans, as their common enemy. The better to surprise Valentinian, he did not wait the return of the embassadors he had sent to him; but setting out immediately from Scythia, tho' in the midst of winter, and directing his march through Germany, he never halted till he reached, early in the spring, the banks of the Rhine. There such of the Franks as still dwelt on the German side of that river, endeavoured to stop him; but they were easily defeated, Childeric, the son of Meroue, and grand-son of...
of Clodion, being taken prisoner, with his mother and other persons of distinction. The Franks being thus overcome and defeated, Attila caused an incredible number of boats to be built, cutting down for that purpose whole forests, and passing the Rhine without opposition, entered Gaul. As he gave out, that he designed to live in friendship with the Romans, and only begged leave to march through their country, in order to make war upon the Visigoths in Languedoc, several cities opened their gates to him; but the ravines and violences which he suffered his men to commit in the cities that had received him, betraying his real design, the other cities shut their gates against him. Hereupon pulling off the mask, he besieged, took by storm, and pillaged Tongres, Treves, Strafbourg, Spires, Worms, Mentz, and all the cities in that neighbourhood. Advancing thence into the country, and dividing his numerous army into several bodies, he put all to fire and sword, and not only reduced and pillaged, but laid in ashes the cities of Arras, Laon, Befancon, Toul, and Langres. Attila, thus laying waste the country far and near, and committing every-where unheard-of cruelties, arrived at length before Orleans, and laid siege to that city. In the mean time, Aetius, arriving from Italy at Arles, assembled what forces he could, having brought with him but a small number of troops, which, however, were reinforced by a great number of Visigoths, under the command of their king Theodoric, whom Aetius had persuaded to join the imperial troops, and, with their united forces, oppose the furious torrent, which threatened both alike. The example of Theodoric was followed by several other nations, namely, by the Franks, under the conduct of Meroue, who by means of one of his own nation, named Wimaud, had made his escape; by the Sarmatians, Burgundians, Saxons, the Armorici, the Lians, the Riverins, the Ibrions, and several other nations of Celtic Gaul and Germany, who, apprehending themselves to be in no less danger than the Romans, readily joined Aetius against the common enemy. The Lians dwelt, according to Valesius, on the banks of the Lis in Flanders; the Riverins on the Rhine towards Cologne; and the Ibrions in Vindelicia now Suabia and Bavaria. While Aetius was busied in assembling the Roman

Roman forces and those of their allies, Attila pursuèd the siege of Orleans with great fury, battering the place night and day with an incredible number of warlike engines. At length he carried it by assault, according to Apollinaris Sidonius; but while his men were busied in plundering without the least apprehension of danger, Actius and Theodoric, arriving with all their forces, entered the city, cut great numbers of the Hunns in pieces, before they could put themselves in a posture of defence, and obliged Attila to repass the Loire, in which many of his men were drowned, and to retire towards the Rhine. Having passed Troyes, he halted in the Catalaunic or Mauriac fields, that is, in the plains of Chalon, which city was then known by the name of Catalauni. The same plains were called, according to Jornandes, Mauriac or Mauritii, no doubt, from some neighbouring city or village. Valesius indeed distinguishes the Catalaunic from the Mauriac plains, and supposes two battles to have been fought, the one, which was not decisive, in the Mauriac, and the other, which put an end to the war, in the Catalaunic plains. But all the antients mention only one battle fought in the plains, called by some Mauriac and Mauritian, and by others Catalaunic. Attila chose that place, as the most advantageous for his Hunns, who were all horse, to engage in. Actius, who followed him close, resolved, notwithstanding the enemy's advantageous situation, to put the whole to the issue of a battle. As he arrived late at night in the plains where Attila was encamped, the Gepidae, who followed Attila, and the Franks, who served under Actius, meeting in the dark, engaged with such fury, that, on both sides, above fifteen thousand were left dead upon the spot. The next day Attila drew up his men in battle-array, placing the flower of his army in the centre, which he commanded in person, the Ostrogoths in the left wing, and the Gepidae, with other barbarous nations, in the right. On the other hand, Actius placed the Romans, whom he commanded himself, in the left wing; the Visigoths, under the command of Theodoric and his eldest son Thorismund, in the right; and the Alans, with their king Sangoian, the Franks, and the other auxiliaries, with their respective leaders, in the centre. That the Romans might not have time to pursue their victory, in case they gained it, Attila did not quit his camp till four in the afternoon, when the battle began, which, by all accounts, was the most bloody encounter between the Franks and Gepidae.

all writers, is reckoned one of the most obstinate and bloody engagements mentioned in history. Aetius, Theodoric, and his son Thorismond, distinguished themselves in a most eminent manner, Theodoric, notwithstanding his great age, fought at the head of his Goths with a courage and resolution hardly to be expressed. But while he was thus animating his men, more by his example than his words, he unluckily fell from his horse, as some authors write, and was tried to death by his own people, who did not know him. Others write, that he was killed by a Goth, named Andagus, who served under Attila, and was descended from the royal family of the Amali. The Goths, not in the least disheartened by the death of their king, charged the Huns so vigorously, that they began, after a most obstinate resistance, to give ground; which Attila no sooner perceived, than he caused the retreat to be founded, and retired to his camp. As it was already dark, Aetius, thinking it advisable not to pursue the enemy, withdrew likewise; but kept his men all night under arms, for fear of a surprise. The next morning, the extensive plains, in which the battle had been fought, appeared covered with heaps of dead bodies, and a neighbouring brook tinged with the blood of the slain. As Attila kept close in his camp, the Romans concluded from thence, that his army had suffered greatly, and that he owned himself conquered; but as his camp was well fortified, and surrounded with an incredible number of wagons, the Romans and Goths contented themselves with blocking it up, being well apprised, that the enemy would be soon obliged, for want of provisions, either to submit, or to quit their intrenchments, and venture a second battle in the open fields. In the mean time, the body of Theodoric, found among the slain, was interred with extraordinary pomp; and his son Thorismond, who had been dangerously wounded, proclaimed king of the Visigoths in his room. Such is the account the ancients give us of this famous action. Idatus writes, that on both sides near three hundred thousand men were killed; and Jornandes, according to the Amsterdam edition in 1655, makes the number of the slain amount to two hundred and fifty-two thousand. Both armies were greatly weakened, and the loss on each side perhaps equal; but as Attila shut himself up in his camp, and declined a second engagement, the Romans, who who remained masters of the field of battle, challenged the victory. Cassiodorus, and Theodoric king of Italy, ascribe this victory to the courage and bravery of the Goths; but Gregory of Tours will have it to have been chiefly owing to the prayers of St. Agnan bishop of Orleans. Thorsimond who had not been informed of his father’s death till the day after the battle, was for revenging it on the Hunns, and attacking Attila in his camp. With this view he had already drawn up his Goths in battle-array; but Aetius fearing, if the Hunns were entirely cut off, that the young prince, who was of an aspiring genius, would turn his arms against the empire, advised him to return home with his forces, and take possession of his paternal dominions, left his brothers, during his absence, should raise disturbances, and, feizing on the royal treasures, give rise to a civil war. Thorsimond followed his advice, which Attila no sooner knew, than he quitted his camp, and began to retire towards the Rhine. As he did not attack Aetius even after the departure of Thorsimond, Valerius concludes, that either the number of his troops was greatly increased by the writers of those times, or the loss he sustained in the battle lessened; but the first is most likely. Aetius pursued Attila as far as the Rhine; but never offered to attack him, being willing, some authors say, that he should make his escape, and, by awing the Franks and Goths, divert them from raising disturbances in the empire. Attila, being thus driven out of Gaul, retired to Pannonia; and having thence reinforced his army with supplies sent him out of Scythia, he resolved to make an irruption into Italy, where he hoped to meet with more booty and less opposition, there being no Goths, Alans, Franks, or Burgundians, there to oppose him. Pursuant to this resolution he left Pannonia, and finding the passes of the Alps unguarded, as no hostilities were expected on that side, he entered Italy in the latter end of the present year 451, as Iatius and Jornandes seem to insinuate, or in the beginning of the following year 452, when Herculanus and Sporacus were confused. It is impossible to express the terror and confusion, which so sudden and unexpected an irruption occasioned, even in the most distant provinces. Aetius was at first for saving himself by flight, and retiring with the emperor into Gaul; but shame getting the better of his fear, he continued in Italy, and began to assemble the forces that were dispersed up and down the provinces. In the mean time, Attila, advancing as far as Aquileia, the metropolis of the province called Venetia, invested that important place, battering it night and day with an incredible number of warlike engines; but as it was well fortified, and defended by the flower of the Roman troops, it held out, in spite of his utmost efforts, for the space of three whole months, at the end of which it was taken by assault, pillaged for several days together, and laid in ashes, not one house being left standing, nor one person alive that fell into the enemy’s hands, Attila designing, by this barbarous and inhuman treatment, to strike terror into the other cities, and frighten them into submission. The cities of Arevigo, Verona, Mantua, Cremona, Brescia, and Bergamo, underwent the same fate, the barbarians raging every where with such fury, as can hardly be expressed or conceived, and putting all to the sword, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. It is commonly believed, that on this occasion the inhabitants of the province of Venetia, to avoid falling into the hands of the Huns, retired to the islands on their coast, and there laid the foundations of a city, which, borrowing its name from the province, was called Venetiz, and is now known by the name of Venice. Cassiodorus, speaking of the Venetians, as he flyles them, about fifty years after, says, that they inhabited the islands of the Adriatic; that they had no other fence against the waves but hurdles; no other food but fish; no wealth besides their boats; and no merchandise but salt, which they exchanged for other provisions. To return to Attila: From the province of Venetia he advanced to Milan, then the metropolis of Liguria, which he took and pillaged; the city of Pavia, and several other places in that neighborhood, he laid in ashes, after having plundered them, and put such of the inhabitants to the sword, as had not saved themselves by a timely flight. Seeing at Milan some pictures, representing the Roman emperors sitting on thrones of gold, and the Scythians, that is, the Goths or Huns, prostrate at their feet, he caused himself to be painted sitting on a throne, and the Roman emperors carrying on their shoulders sacks facks filled with gold, which they emptied at his feet. From Liguria, Attila was for advancing to Rome, which city was not in a condition to withstand him; but his men, remembering the untimely end of Alaric, who died soon after he had plundered the metropolis, did all that lay in their power to divert him, notwithstanding their thirst after plunder, from that resolution. Attila despised that omen; but his troops being greatly diminished for want of provisions, and by the maladies that raged among them, and Actius having at the same time, with a reinforcement sent him by Marcian out of the east, defeated a party of Hunns, he thought it advisable to put off his march to Rome, and pursue his ravages in the neighbouring provinces. In the mean time, Valentinian, having no other resource, sent a solemn embassy to Attila, with proposals for an accommodation. At the head of this embassy was Leo bishop of Rome, a person famed for his eminent piety, eloquence, and learning. His colleagues were Albinienus or Avienus, who had been confus in 450, and Trigecius, formerly prefect. They found Attila on the banks of the Menzo, not far from Mantua, and were by him received with uncommon demonstrations of kindness and esteem. He concluded with Leo, who surprized and softened him with his eloquence, a kind of treaty, which, it seems, was but a truce; for he threatened to return to Italy, and pursue his ravages with more cruelty than ever, unless the princess Honor was sent him, with the share of the imperial treasures that was due to her. One of the articles of this treaty was, that the emperor should pay an annual pension to Attila. It was no sooner signed, than he ordered his Hunns to forbear hostilities, and leaving Italy, retired beyond the Danube. Damascius, who flourished about this time, writes, that a bloody battle was fought under the walls of Rome between the Romans and the Scythians under the conduct of Attila; and that the slaughter was great on both sides, none but the chiefs, and a small number of their guards, being left alive; but as he adds, that the souls of the slain pursued the engagement with great noise for three days and three nights, his whole account may be looked upon as fabulous. The following year, 453, when Opilio and Vincomalus were confuls, Attila, incapable of living himself, or suffering others to live in peace, crossing Rhéaetia, and following the course of the Rhone, entered unexpectedly...

the country now known by the name of Dauphiny, and fell upon the Alans, whom Aetius had allowed to settle in the Valentinois, under the conduct of Sangiban. But Thorismond, king of the Visigoths, whose dominions were divided from those of the Alans only by the Rhone, being well apprised, that Attila, after having reduced the Alans, would not fail to invade his territories, joined his neighbours with the whole strength of his kingdom, and having gained a complete victory over Attila, obliged him to return with shame and disgrace into his own country. Jornandes, and Sigebert are the only writers who mention this second irruption of the Hunns into Gaul; and their authority is suspected, especially that of Jornandes, who seems not to have been well acquainted with the history of the Visigoths. Attila died soon after, that is, either in the present, or the following year, 454, and with him ended the kingdom, or rather the empire, of the Hunns, in the north, a civil war being kindled, upon his death, among his numerous issue; which gave the several nations he had subdued an opportunity of shaking off the yoke, and recovering their antient liberty, as we shall relate more at length in the history of the Hunns, and other northern nations. The same year, Thorismond, king of the Visigoths, was murdered in Toulouse, the capital of his kingdom, by two of his brothers, viz. Theodoric and Frederic, and succeeded by the former, on whom Apollinaris Sidonius, who was intimately acquainted with him, bestows great encomiums, extolling him even above his father, and styling him the protector and bulwark of the empire.

While these things passed in the west, the council of Chalcedon was held in the east by Marcian's orders, who nevertheless seems to have aslifted in person only at the session of the twenty-fifth of October. The council began on the eighth of October, of the year 451, and ended on the first of November. The same year the emperor enacted a law, forbidding, on pain of death, any one to sacrifice to the gods, or even to adorn their temples with flowers, and condemning the governors and officers, who should wink at such wicked practices, to pay fifty pounds weight of gold. The following year, the Saracens, the Nubians, and the Blemmyes, broke into the empire; but were defeated by the troops troops of Marcian, and forced to sue for peace, which the emperor granted them upon terms highly advantageous to the empire, as Priscus assures us, who attended the Roman embassadors to Damascus, where the treaty was concluded. The following year, 453, Attila dying, several nations, formerly subdued by that conqueror, revolting from his children, begged and obtained leave of Marcian to settle in Thrace and Illyricum, almost entirely depopulated by the frequent incursions of the Huns and other barbarians. Among these mention is made of the Squiri, Satagaira, and Alans, who, under the conduct of Candax, their king or leader, settled in Lesser Scythia, and Lower Moesia: to the Rugians, Sarmatians, and Cemandrians, lands were granted in Illyricum near a place called the cattle of Mars: to the Goths, commonly called Ostrogoths or Eastern Goths, to distinguish them from the Visigoths or Western Goths, who afterwards became masters of Spain, Marcian granted all Pannonia, from Sirmium, now Sirmian, in Scelavonia, to Vindobona, at present Vienna, in Austria, a large tract, comprising many cities. These Goths were then governed by three brothers, viz. Valenmir, Theodemir, the father of Theodoric the Great, afterwards king of Italy, and Vidi-mir, who divided that extensive country among them, Valenmir settling in the eastern part of it, Theodemir in the western, and Vidiimir between the other two. The Goths, as well as the other barbarians, acknowledged the authority of the Constantinopolitan emperors, and were subjects of the empire; but at the same time their princes claimed an uncontrolled authority over their own people, and frequently waged war with each other. Even one of the sons of Attila, named Ernac, and several other Huns, submitted to the Romans, who granted them lands on the most distant borders of Lesser Scythia, in Dacia, and amongst the Sarmatians in Illyricum. The same year died, in the month of July, the The empress Pulcheria, daughter to Arcadius, sister to Theodo-fius II. and wife to Marcian. She left by her will, which was confirmed and executed with great fidelity by Marcian, the immense wealth of which she was possess'd, and her rich moveables, to the poor. She was a woman of most extraordinary parts, and is, on account of her exemplary piety, piety, honoured both by the Greeks and Latins with the title of saint.

The following year, 454, when Aetius was consul the fourth time with Studius, is remarkable for the downfall and death of that great commander, owing chiefly to the malice and insinuations of an eunuch, by name Heraclius, who having gained an absolute ascendant over the emperor, easily persuaded the weak prince, that Aetius aspired at the empire, and maintained a private correspondence with the barbarians, in order to raise himself by their means to the imperial dignity. Aetius, on his side, gave some occasion to the accusations of the eunuch, by pressing the emperor with too much eagerness to perform the promise he had made of marrying his eldest daughter Eudocia to Gaudentius, the general’s son. His importunity gave weight to the calumnies of Heraclius, and confirmed the weak and jealous emperor in his suspicions, which, according to Gregory of Tours and all the writers of those times, were altogether groundless. But after all, his treachery towards count Bonifacius and several others, plainly prove, that he did not on all occasions scruple sacrificing his conscience and honour to his preferment and grandeur. Some pretend, but without any positive proof, and probably without foundation, that he was at the bottom of all the disturbances that happened during his administration. Petronius Maximus is said to have greatly contributed to the death of Aetius, by prompting the eunuchs of the court to persuade the emperor, that he aimed at nothing less than the sovereignty. The view of Maximus therein was to remove out of the way the only person, who screened the prince from the vengeance he was resolved to take upon him for a late affront, of which anon. However that be, the death of Aetius being resolved on, Valentinian ordered him one day to attend him in the palace, pretending to have some affair of the utmost importance to impart to him. Aetius obeyed the summons, repairing without delay to the emperor’s apartment, attended by Boëtius, the praefectus praetorio, his intimate friend, and several others. But Aetius alone was admitted into the prince’s chamber, which he had no sooner entered, than Valentinian ran him through with his sword; and with the assistance of the officers about him, particularly, of Heraclius, dispatched him in a most barbarous and

and inhuman manner (). Thus fell the best general of his age, the terror of Attila, the bulwark of the western provinces, says Sidonius, by the hand of the greatest coward in the whole empire (). We are told, that Valentinian having one day asked a Roman whether he had done well in dispatching Aetius? the Roman answered, that he could not tell whether he had done well or no, but thought he had cut off his right hand with his left (x). The prefect Boëtius, and all those who had attended Aetius to the palace, were likewise dispatched, being called one after the other into the emperor's chamber (v). This bloody tragedy was acted, according to Theophanes, at Rome (z). Valentinian immediately dispatched embassadors to the Suevians, and other foreign nations, to acquaint them with the death of Aetius, and confirm the treaties that general had concluded with them (z). But the news of that great man's death encouraged, it seems, some of them to make irruptions into the empire. For in the beginning of the following year, the Armorici, that is, the inhabitants of the present Bretagne and Normandy, were under daily apprehensions of seeing the Saxons on their coasts; the Alemans passed the Rhine near Baffe, and the Franks laid waste the territories of Mentz and Rheims (b).

The following year, 445, when Valentinian was consul the eighth time with Anthemius, son-in-law to the emperor Marcian, the western empire was involved in endless calamities. The emperor Valentinian was murdered on the seventeenth of March, and the empire seized by Petronius Magnus, grandson to Magnus Clemens Maximus, who having usurped the sovereignty in 383, was taken and put to death by Theodosius the Great in 388. Authors give us the following account of the unhappy end of Valentinian, and usurpation of Maximus. The latter having married a lady, equally famous for her beauty and chafftiness, Valentinian, taken with her charms, fell passionately in love with her; but her virtue being proof against all his presents, menaces, and promises, he had recourse to the following artifice: He sent one day for Maximus to play with him at dice; and having won of him a considerable sum, obliged him to leave his ring as a pledge for the payment of it. This ring he sent privately to the wife of Maximus, desiring her in her husband's band's name to repair to the palace, and wait upon the empress. The lady, knowing the ring, hastened to the palace, in compliance with the supposed orders of her husband; but was conducted by some persons employed for that purpose to a remote apartment, where Valentinian, without any regard to her tears and entreaties, robbed her by force of that which was infinitely more dear to her than her life. Upon her return home, she burst into a flood of tears, reproaching, in most bitter terms, her husband, whom she believed privy to her dishonour, and his own infamy. Maximus, on the other hand, then first apprized of the emperor's wicked artifice, acquainted his wife with it, and resolved at all events to be revenged on Valentinian. Pursuant to this resolution, he applied to the friends of Actius, whom the emperor had caused to be lately murdered, especially to Trausflila and Optila or Occylla, two barbarians, who had served under that general, and had been distinguished by him with particular marks of kindness and esteem. These readily undertook to revenge the death of their old commander, and at the same time the dishonour offered to Maximus; and accordingly falling upon Valentinian, while he was diverting himself in the campus Martius at Rome, they first killed his favourite eunuch Heraclius, who courageously interposed, and endeavoured to save his master, and then dispatched, with many wounds, the emperor himself in the sight of the whole court. Procopius and John of Antioch, who evidently copies from him, are the only authors who mention the indignity offered to Maximus. Sidonius and Idatius, without taking the least notice of that outrage, ascribe the death of Valentinian to the unbounded ambition of Maximus, not to be satisfied with anything less than the empire itself. Valentinian was murdered on the seventeenth of March of the present year 455, after having lived thirty-four years, and reigned twenty-nine and about five months, reckoning from the twenty-third of October 425, when he was first declared Augustus. His tomb is thought to be still extant at Ravenna. As he had but very slender parts, he was entirely governed by the eunuchs of the court, who disposed, at their pleasure, of all the great offices, sacrificing the good of the public, and the honour of the prince, to their private interest.

terest and ambition. He had not courage enough to head his armies in person; and besides, was, by his effeminate edducation, become altogether incapable of bearing the toils of a military life. The only journeys he undertook were from Ravenna to Rome, and from Rome back again to Ravenna, keeping himself in both places locked up in his palace with a herd of eunuchs, and indulging, without restraint, his most brutal inclinations, tho' married to one of the most beautiful women of that age: The day after his death, Maximus, the author of it, assumed the purple; and being saluted by the Roman people with the title of Augustus, he immediately raised his son, by name Palladius, to the dignity of Cesar. Maximus was sprung from an illustrious family in Rome, and had discharged with great applause and reputation the first offices in the state. He was possessed of immense wealth, which he shared and enjoyed with his friends, leading an easy and quiet life, and indulging himself in all the diversions and recreations, which his plentiful estate could afford him. Hence he no sooner began to feel the anxieties inseparable from a crown, especially when acquired by unlawful means, than he repented the step he had taken, painting after his former condition. Sidonius writes, that the very first night he lodged in the palace, he was heard crying out, "Happy Damocles, whose reign began and ended with a dinner;" nay, he had some thoughts of abandoning Rome, of quitting the enigms of majesty, and resuming in some corner of Italy his former method of life. But being diverted from that resolution by his friends, he appointed Avidius, then in Gaul, commander in chief of the Roman armies, who immediately dispatched Messianus to acquaint Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, with the accension of Maxi-mus to the empire. That general went soon after to confer in person with the Gothish king, and entered Toulouse, attended by Theodoric himself on his right hand, and one of the prince's brothers on his left. He was upon the point of concluding a treaty with Theodoric, when he unexpectedly received the disagreeable tidings of the death of Maximus, which put him upon other measures. The wife of Maxi-mus dying soon after the outrage supposed to have been offered her, the usurper, that he might have some title to the crown,

Crown, obliged Eudoxia, the deceased emperor's widow, to marry him, contrary to her inclination, a few days after the murder of her husband; and at the same time married her daughter Eudocia to his son Palladius. Eudoxia, who had loved Valentinian with great tenderness, highly provoked in seeing herself married against her will to the very person who had deprived him both of his life and empire, resolved, whatever it cost her, to revenge the death of her former husband, and the affront offered in her person to his bed. Blinded therefore with passion and thirst of revenge, she took such measures as proved fatal to herself, to Rome, and all Italy. For expecting no assistance from Marcian, unwilling perhaps to engage in a civil war, she dispatched a trusty messenger to Geneseric in Africa, conjuring him to come and revenge the death of his friend and ally Valentinian, and to rescue her out of the arms of a tyrant, the murderer of her husband. Some authors affirm, that she wrote to the king of the Vandals with her own hand, assuring him, that he would meet with no great resistance in Italy, and promising to assist him to the utmost of her power. This message was very acceptable to Geneseric, who had long wished for such an opportunity, which he embraced with great joy; and putting to sea without loss of time, steered his course straight to Rome. When his numerous fleet first appeared, the chief citizens, and all persons of distinction, struck with terror and dismay, instead of putting themselves in a posture of defence, thought only of consulting their safety by flight. Among these was Maximus himself; but as he was flying with those of his court, the populace, highly incensed against him for thus shamefully abandoning those whom it was his duty to protect, rising all on a sudden, pursued him with showers of stones; which some of Valentinian's officers observing, they threw themselves upon him; and a Roman soldier, by name Ursus, gave him the fatal blow. His body was ignominiously dragged through the chief streets of the city; and, after it had lain some time exposed to the insults of the incensed multitude, thrown into the Tiber. Such was the end of the usurper Maximus, after he had lived about sixty years, and borne the title of emperor three months wanting five days. His son Palladius is supposed to have undergone the same fate. Three days after the death of Maximus, that is, on the fifteenth of June, Geneseric entered Rome without opposition, and and abandoned it to the mercy of his Vandals, strictly enjoining them, however, not to set fire to the city, nor shed the blood of the inhabitants, pursuant to the promise he had made to Leo the Great, then bishop of Rome, who had gone out to meet him. They continued in the city fourteen days, pillaging not only the private houses, but stripping the public buildings of all their rich ornaments, and even the churches of their sacred vessels. They took an incredible number of captives, every one seized such women as they liked best; and amongst the men, those who they thought would be of most use to them. Genferic himself forced the imperial pal-lace; and having seized on the treasure, and all the rich moveables he found there, he caused them to be put on board a vessel, with the empress Eudoxia, her two daughters Placidia and Eudocia, and Gaudentius, the son of Aetius, and carried them all into captivity. Amongst the spoils, men-ton is made of a great many statues with which a vessel was loaded; of half the covering of the capitol, which was of brass plated over with gold; of sacred vessels of gold, enriched with precious stones; and of those which had been formerly taken by Titus out of the temple of Jerusalem, and brought to Rome. Genferic, having thus stripped the city of all its wealth and valuable ornaments, returned with his fleet to Africa, but lost in his passage the ship that carried the statues. Marcian, sensibly affected with the misfortune of Eudoxia and the two princesses her daughters, dispatched em-bassadors to Genferic, earnestly entreating him to set them at liberty; but he, despising both his entreaties and menaces, kept them till the year 462, when he sent back Eudoxia, with her second daughter Placidia, to Leo, the successor of Marcian. As for Eudocia, he married her to Hunneric, his elder son, who had by her Aideric, afterwards king of the Vandals in Africa. In the east Marcian enacted this year a famous law, dated, according to some, the first of May, according to others, the twenty-second of April, wherein he allowed every one to bequeath to the ecclesiastics and monks what they pleased, and revoked the laws of the other emperors his predecessors, forbidding widows and deaconesses to leave any thing by will to the church. This law is addressed to Palladius, the prefectus pretorio, to whom is likewise addressed another against the Eutychians, dated from

Avitus,

* Concil tom. iv. p. 886, 888.

(T) The chronicle of Idatius has been of great use to us in writing the history of Valentinian's reign. He was a native of Lamego, in the province of Beira, belonging then to Galicia, but at present to the kingdom of Portugal. His parents dying when he was very young, he left Spain, and retired to the east, where he saw St. Jeronim, Eulogius of Cæsarea, John of Jerusalem, and Theophilus of Alexandria. He owns himself to have been but indifferently versed in polite literature, and still less in the study of the holy scripture (1). But as to the latter, Leo the Great, bishop of Rome, seems to have been of a different opinion, since he employed him against the Priscillianists 2. He was ordained bishop in the third or fourth year of the reign of Valentinian III. that is, about the year 427, for he reckons from the time that prince was created Cæsar (3). Sigibert, and some other writers, suppose him to have been bishop of Lamego. And truly the words of his preface leave it doubtful, whether he was bishop, or only a native, of that city; but in his chronicle he tells us, that the bishop Idatius was taken in the church of Aquæ Flavie, and returned after three months captivity to Flavie (4). As he evidently speaks in that place of himself, father Labbé concludes him to have been a native of Lamego, and bishop of Aquæ Flavie (5); which last city Sanfon places in the territory of Braga, on the confines of Portugal, calling it Aquæ Læc Turodorum. Leo, bishop of Rome, only writes, that Idatius was bishop in Galicia (6). Dupin will have him to have been archbishop of Lugo (7), not reflecting, that Idatius was ordained bishop in 427, and that six years after the see of Lugo was held by Atelerius (8). In the year 431, Idatius was sent by the natives of Galicia to implore the assistance of Aetius, then in Gaul, against the Suevians, who, contrary to the articles of a late treaty, pillaged the country. He returned from Gaul the following year with count Cenforius, sent by Aetius to treat with the Suevians. He was taken by the Suevians in the church of Aquæ Flavie, on the twenty sixth of July 462, but after three months captivity was set at liberty. Notwithstanding the wars and disturbances that reigned in his time all over the Empire, especially in Spain, he wrote a chronicle, which is, properly speaking, ing, a continuation of that of St. Jerom. What he wrote from the death of Valens, where his chronicle begins, to the third year of Valentinian's reign, and his own episcopacy, he either copied, as he assures us, from the best writers, or learnt of persons of unquestionable veracity: of all the rest, he was himself an eye-witness. He writes, that he had the misfortune to see the Roman empire reduced within narrow bounds, and in great danger of losing the little it retained; that the discipline of the church was utterly neglected in Galicia, and the liberties of the people entirely lost, the barbarians, who prevailed there, acknowledging no other law but their arbitrary will and caprice. He carries his chronicle down to the third of Anthemiuss reign, that is, to the year 469, the forty-first of his episcopacy. The chronicle of Idatius gives great light to the history of those times, especially to that of Spain; whence Isidore and some others have copied almost word for word. However, it is not quite free from faults, especially at point of chronology, either the author himself, or his transcribers reckoning sometimes the end of one emperor's reign, and the beginning of another's, as two distinct years, which is a very gross mistake. The years of the emperors are marked all along with the olympiads, and, in imitation of St. Jerom, the years of the suppuration of Eutubius from the birth of Abraham. The area of Spain, which is thirty years anterior to ours, is marked in the beginning on the margin Father Sirmond, to whom we are indebted for this chronicle, has annexed to it a book of consular tables, which he believes to have been done by the same author. Father Sirmond published only part of these tables. But father Labbé inserted the whole in his Bibliotheca nova, and Du Cange in his Chronicon Paschale (9), which extends from the consulsip of Brutus, the first consul, to the second consulship of Anthemiuss in 468, so that the consular tables end about a year after the chronicle. In the tables no other area is marked but that of Spain, which gives us room to believe that they were done by a native of that country (10). They are reckoned very exact; but yet some faults have crept into them, which, in all likelihood, is owing to the ignorance of the transcribers. In the time of Charlemagne, a French chronologer published an epitome of the chronicle of Idatius, which is to be found in Caninus (11). The work

mander in chief of all the Roman forces, and was at the court of Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, when news was brought him of the death of the usurer. He immediately acquainted Theodoric, with what had happened, who thereupon preflied him to affume the purple, and even caufed him to be proclaimed emperor by the Goths in Toulouse, on the tenth of July of the present year, promifing to support him in his new dignity with the whole strength of his kingdom". However, he did not, it seems, take upon him the title of emperor till he was proclaimed some time after, that is, on the eighth of August, by the Roman army at Arles, and by all the chief men in Gaul. Theodoric went immediately, attended by his brothers, to Arles, to congratulate the new prince on his accession to the empire, and was received by him as one to whom he was chiefly indebted for the dignity he enjoyed w. From Arles the new emperor set out soon after for Rome, where he was received by the populace with great demonstrations of joy. Marcial, who had nothing so much at heart as the public welfare and tranquillity, readily approved of his promotion, and acknowledged him for his colleague x. The following year, work intituled Notitia imperii is supposed to have been written in the reign of Valentinian III. and Theodosius II. but by some in the very beginning, by others in the latter end, of the reign of Theodosius. This notitia contains a succinct account of the state of the empire in those times, viz. of the provinces and their governors; of the other magistrates, both civil and military, their titles and offices; of their land and sea forces; of their foot and horse; of their troops, both Roman and foreign, and the places where they were quartered, &c. This notitia was published by Guidus Pancirollus in 1593, with copious comments, of which father Labbé speaks with great contempt, ridiculing the cuts with which they are adorned, representing, as Pancirollus imagines, the habits and ornaments peculiar to each office and dignity. To the notitia is added the description of Rome by an anonymous author, who is supposed to have wrote under Valentinian III. To this description of Rome, father Labbé adds one of Constantinople, done like-wise by an anonymous writer, either in the reign of Arcadius, or of Theodosius the younger.

The treatise de rebus bellicis, which Labbé adds to it, is supposed to have been written about the same time; but the author, who seems to have been a private person, and to have professed the study of philosophy, is not known.
broke out between the Suevians in Spain and the Visigoths in Aquitaine. Requiarus, king of the former, taking advantage of the distracted state of the empire, over-ran the province of Cartagena, which still belonged to the Romans, committing every-where dreadful ravages. Hereupon Avitus, dispatching count Fronto to him with the character of ambassador, put him in mind of the treaties concluded between him and the Romans. Theodoric likewise, whose sister Requiarus had married, interposed his good offices, conjuring his brother-in-law not to disturb the public tranquillity, and acquainted him with the engagements which he had entered into with Avitus. But Requiarus, without any regard either to treaties or remonstrances, pursued his ravages, laying waste, not only the province of Cartagena, but that of Tarraco too, which likewise belonged to the empire. Upon this, Theodoric sent him a second embassy, to which he answered with great haughtiness, that if Theodoric found fault with his conduct, he would soon give him an account of it at Toulouf. This answer piqued Theodoric to such a degree, that he immediately entered Spain at the head of a powerful army; and being met by Requiarus about twelve miles from Aftorga, a battle ensued, in which the Suevians were entirely defeated, and their king, who was dangerously wounded, obliged to fly for shelter to a distant corner of Galicia. Theodoric pursued him close; and entering Braga on a Sunday, the twenty-eighth of October, gave that city up to be plundered by his soldiers. From Braga he advanced with all possible expedition to a place called Portugal, whither the fugitive king had retired. Some writers take Portugal for the present city of Porto, on the Douro, in the kingdom of Portugal, to which it is thought to have given name. Jornandes writes, that Requiarus put to sea, in order to save himself by flight, but was driven back by a storm. Be that as it will, all authors agree, that he was taken, and delivered up to Theodoric, who, after having kept him some time in prison, put him to death in the month of December. The Suevians, disheartened by the death of their king, and destitute of a leader, submitted to Theodoric, who retained for himself the country he had conquered, appointing one Aquilulphus to govern it. Aquilulphus, revolting soon after from Theodoric, caused himself to be proclaimed king of the Suevians in Galicia, but died the following year in the month of June at Porto. Jornandes writes, that a powerful army being sent against him by Theodoric, he was overcome in battle, taken, and beheaded. Some Suevians, refusing to submit to the Goths, retired to a distant corner of Galicia, and there chose for their king one of their own nation, named Mildra. The same year, Geniseric, putting to sea with a numerous fleet, and a considerable army on board, with a design to ravage the coasts of Italy or Gaul, was overtaken near Corsica by the Roman fleet, under the command of Ricimer, and utterly defeated. Ricimer, styled by some Richimer or Richemer, was sprung from the royal family of the Suevians; but as his mother was the daughter of Valla, king of the Goths in 418, he is commonly looked upon rather as a Goth than a Suevian. He had served from his youth in the Roman armies, and acquired so much reputation by his warlike exploits, that Sidonius gives him the title of invincible, and Jornandes styles him the best commander of his age; nay, Sidonius prefers him for courage to Sulla, for prudence to Fabius, for good-nature to Metellus, for eloquence to Appius, for vigour and resolution to Fulvius, and for address to Camillus. But these good qualities were not without the allay of as many bad ones; for he was a man without faith, honour, or honesty; ambitious to such a degree, that not satisfied with being commander in chief of all the forces in the west, patrician, and fon-in-law to the emperor, he took upon him to raise and depose emperors at his pleasure, and, since he was excluded by his birth from wearing the imperial crown himself, to command and controul those who wore it. This unbounded ambition, this unbridled lust of ruling, prompted him to murder four emperors, three of whom had been raised by himself, and to stir up and affright under-hand the avowed enemies of that empire, which he was by the strongest ties bound to protect and defend. Elated with his success over Geniseric, instead of pursuing it, he returned to Rome, and, revolting with Majorianus, obliged the senate to declare Avitus unworthy of the empire; which no sooner came to the prince’s ears, who was then in Gaul, than he hastened back to Italy; but upon his arrival at Placentia, he was stopped by Ricimer, and stripped of all the badges of majesty. Theophanes writes, that Avitus was overcome in battle by Ricimer, Ricimer, on the sixteenth of October \(^k\); so that he had scarce reigned fourteen months. Being thus deposed of the purple, he caused himself to be ordained bishop of Placentia, but the senate insisting upon his being put to death, he withdrew from Placentia, with a design to take sanctuary in the church of St. Julian at Brioude in Auvergne, the place of his nativity. Gregory of Tours adds, that he died on the road, and his body was brought to Brioude, and buried near that of the holy martyr of St. Julian \(^1\). During his short reign, the Burgundians, who had been removed from the banks of the Rhine in 438, or, as others will have it, in 443, and had ever since that time dwelt amongst the mountains of Savoy, seized on part of Gaul, and made themselves masters of the city of Lions \(^m\). In 463, the city of Die in Dauphiny was subject to them, as appears from a letter of Gondiace their king to Hilarius bishop of Rome \(^n\). The next consuls were Constantine and Rufinus, belonging both to the eastern empire, no emperor being yet chosen in the west. In the beginning of this year 457, died the emperor Marcian, after having reigned six years, five months, and two days. His death, which Theodorus, surnamed the Reader, ascribes to his having assisted at a procession on the twenty-sixth of January \(^o\), must have happened about the end of that month; for Leo, who succeeded him, was proclaimed at Constantinople on the seventh of February. Marcian is commended by all the writers of those times, for the innocence and simplicity of his manners, for his extraordinary piety, and zeal for the purity of religion \(^p\). Leo bishop of Rome, calls him a prince of a blest and venerable memory; and the Greeks honour him with the title of saint, celebrating his festival, with that of the empress Pulcheria, on the seventeenth of February. He was buried in the church of St. Zea at Constantinople, which he had built \(^q\). Priscus, of whom we have spoken above, wrote the history of his reign; but of that work only some fragments have reached our times \(^r\). A few days after the death of Marcian, Leo was proclaimed emperor, with the unanimous

The famous consent of the senate, people, and soldiery, and crowned by Anatolius, patriarch of Constantinople. This is the first instance we find in history of a prince's receiving the crown at the hand of a bishop. Leo, distinguished by the Greeks with the surname of the Great, was, according to the most probable opinion, a native of Thrace, and thence commonly called Leo the Thracian. He had served from his youth in the Roman armies, and commanded a body of troops encamped at Selymbria in Thrace, when he was raised to the empire. His prudence, moderation, impartiality in the administration of justice, exemplary piety, and zeal for the catholic religion, are greatly extolled by the writers who flourished in those times. Leo is said to have owed his promotion to the patrician Aspar, of whom we have made frequent mention, and his son Ardaburius, who not daring, tho' very powerful, to assume the purple themselves, as they were Arians by religion, and not Romans by birth, but Goths, or rather Alans, conferred it upon Leo, in whose name they hoped to reign; nay, we are told, that Leo promised to raise one of Aspar's sons to the dignity of Caesar. In the very beginning of his reign, great disturbances were raised by the Eutychians in Alexandria, who hearing of the death of Marcian, rose in a tumultuous manner, murdered the catholic bishop Proterus, and chose in his room one of their own sect, named Timotheus Elurus. The tumult was soon quelled; but the authors of it putting themselves under the protection of Aspar, a zealous patron of Arianism, were by him screened from the punishment due to their wickedness. In the west, after an inter-reign of about three months, during which time Ricimer governed with an absolute sway, Majorianus was proclaimed emperor by the senate, the people, and soldiery, Ricimer proposing him as a person in every respect well qualified for that high station. All we know of his family is, that his father had served with great reputation under Actius, and was afterwards raised to the office of treasurer of the empire. His mother was daughter of Majorianus, appointed by Theodosius I. or rather by Gratian, in 379, general of the Roman horse and foot in Pannonia. From him the emperor took the name of Majorianus. He was raised to the

The empire in the flower of his age, having already given several instances, not only of his courage and military abilities, but of his good-nature, generosity, moderation, and other amiable qualities. Procopius, speaking of him, says, that he surpassed in every virtue all the princes who had reigned before him. He lived from his childhood in great intimacy with Ricimer, and therefore was easily prevailed upon by him to revolt from Avitus. Soon after the deposiing of that prince, he was raised to the poft of general in the room of Ricimer, who was created patrician, probably by Marcian, or Leo his successor; for the emperor of the east is supposed to have governed the western empire during the inter-regnum. He had not been long general, when he was proclaimed emperor at a place about six miles from Ravena, called The little pillars. In the beginning of his reign, Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, having almost entirely reduced the Suevians in Galicia, entered Lusitania, and made himself master of several cities there, and among the rest of Merida, the metropolis of that country; but receiving disagreeable tidings from Gaul, not mentioned in history, he set out from Lusitania the day after Easter, which fell this year 457, on the thirty-first, and not on the twenty-eighth, of March, as we read in Idatus, and returned in great haste to Toulouse. He left a body of troops in Spain, with orders to reduce the Suevians in Galicia, who had not yet submitted to him. These forces being, on their march to Galicia, admitted as friends into the city of Astorga, which was held by the Romans, fell unexpectedly upon the inhabitants, put most of them to the sword, plundered their houses, and setting fire to the place, carried all those, whose lives they had spared, into captivity, and among the rest the whole clergy, and two bishops, who happened to be there at that time. The city of Palentia met with the same treatment; but the castle of Coviac, about thirty miles from Astorga, making a vigorous resistance, the Goths, after having lost great numbers of their men, thought it advisable to raise the siege, and return to Gaul. The Suevians had, upon the death of Requiarus their king, chosen Maldra in his room, as we have observed above; but some of them, revolting from him, set up one Frantan. A civil civil war being thus kindled among them, they concluded a peace with the Romans, that is, with the natives, who still held several strong-holds in Galicia, and acknowledged the authority of the emperor; but notwithstanding this peace, the partizans of Maldræ, entering Lusitania, made themselves masters of Lisbon, after having been admitted into the place as friends.

The following year, when the two emperors, Leo and Majorianus, were consuls, the Vandals made a descent on the coast of Campania; but Majorianus, marching against them, defeated them in the neighbourhood of Sinuessa, between the Garigliano and the Volturno; put great numbers of them to the sword, among whom was the brother-in-law of Genferic their commander; and obliged the rest to have themselves on board their fleet, which sailed immediately for Africa. Majorianus, resolved to pursue them thither, and to attempt the recovery of that wealthy country, applied himself to the fitting out of a powerful fleet, and had, before the end of this year, assembled a great number of troops, and above three hundred ships. But of this enterprise hereafter. Majorianus, leaving Ravenna in the depth of winter, passed the Alps, and entering Gaul, obliged the Burgundians, who had made themselves masters of the city of Lyons, to deliver it up, and retire. From that city, where Sidonius pronounced his panegyric, Majorianus pursued his march to Arles, where he passed the remainder of the winter and part of the spring; for he was still in that city on the seventeenth of April of the following year. 459. In Spain, Frantan, one of the kings of the Suevians, dying, those who had followed him submitted to Maldræ; so that the whole nation was again united under one head. An army of Visigoths, sent into Spain by Theodoric, ravaged the province of Bœtica, while the Suevians, notwithstanding the peace concluded the preceding year with the natives, over-ran that part of Galicia, which borders on the Douro, putting all to fire and sword. In the following consulship of Ricimer and Patricius, Theodoric, taking unexpectedly the field, surprised some cities in Gaul belonging to the Romans; but Majorianus, marching from Arles against him, defeated him in a pitched battle, and obliged him to sue for peace; which was granted him, upon his promising...

mising to assist the Romans against the Suevians in Spain, and the Vandals in Africa. In the east, the city of Antioch was almost utterly ruined by an earthquake, which happened on the fourteenth of September. Scarce a single house was left standing in the new city, the most beautiful quarter of that metropolis. The following year 460, when Magnus and Apollonius were consuls, Majorianus, leaving Arles, bent his march towards Spain, which he entered in the month of May, with a design to pass over from thence into Africa. Procopius writes, that the better to inform himself of the strength of the enemy, the state of the country, and the disposition of the inhabitants, he went in disguise to the court of Genericius, pretending to be an embassador sent by the Roman emperor, with proposals for an accommodation. This Procopius relates with such circumstances, as render the whole account altogether incredible. Genericius, alarmed at the vast preparations that were carrying on in all the ports of the empire, sent deputies to sue for peace; but his proposals being rejected, he dispatched a squadron of his best ships, with orders to attack the Roman fleet riding in the bay of Alicant; which they did with such success, that they took most of the Roman ships, and returned with them in triumph to Africa. This misfortune, which was chiefly owing to the treachery of some on board the Roman fleet, put a stop to the enterprise, and obliged Majorianus to return to Arles, whence he issued out orders for the equipping of a new fleet. But, in the mean time, Genericius, dreading the arms and valour of Majorianus, dispatched embassadors to him, with new proposals; which in the end he accepted, as they were very advantageous to the empire. Thus a peace was concluded between Majorianus and Genericius; but the articles of the treaty have not been transmitted to posterity. In Spain, Maldra, king of the Suevians, being killed, Remismond his son, and Frumaricus, probably another of his children, dividing his troops between them, the latter surprised Aquae Flaviae, and took Idatus, bishop of the place, prisoner, on the twenty-sixth of July, while Remismond laid waste the territories of Orense on the Minho, and of Lugo. Suniericus and Nepotianus, two of Theodoric’s generals, marched ched against them; and, after having ravaged part of Galicia, entered Lusitania, and made themselves masters of Scalabis, now Santarein on the Tagus. In the east, nothing happened this year that deserves notice, except an earthquake, which overturned great part of the city of Cyzicus. The following year 461, Severinus and Dagalaiphus being consuls, Ricimir, who had ravaged Majorianus to the empire, thinking himself neglected by him, and jealous of the great reputation the prince had gained by his wise and vigorous administration, resolved to depose him; and accordingly, having got him by treachery into his power, as he was returning from Gaul to Rome, he stripped him of the imperial ornaments at Tortona in the Milanese on the second of August, and caused him, on the seventh of the same month, to be put to death at Iria, now Voghera, after he had reigned three years and some months. The account whichProcopius gives us of his death shews, that we must not lay stress upon the authority of that writer. Majorianus, in whose reign the empire seemed in a manner to revive, being thus removed, Ricimir caused Severus to be proclaimed at Ravenna, on the nineteenth of November, hoping to reign in his name, the new prince being no ways qualified for that high station. All we know of him is, that he was a native of Lucania. In the east, Leo refusing to pay the usual pension to Valamir, Theodomir, and Widemir, kings of the Ostrogoths, whom Marcian had allowed to settle in Pannonia, as we have related above, they flew to arms, laid waste great part of Illyricum, and made themselves masters of several cities; but Anthemius son-in-law to the late emperor Marcian, having obliged them to retire into Pannonia, they hearkened to the embassadors that were sent by Leo to renew the antient alliance between them and the empire. A peace was accordingly concluded, and the famous Theodoric, afterwards king of Italy, then in the eighth year of his age, delivered up to Leo as a hostage. But of him we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the history of the Ostrogoths in Italy.

The following year, when the emperor Leo was consul for the second time, with Severus emperor of the west, who nevertheless seems to have been acknowledged by

by the Greeks, Genferic, pretending not to be bound by the late treaty with Majorianus, after that prince’s death, sent a powerful fleet to pillage the coasts of Sicily and Italy, and made himself master of Sardinia. In Gaul Ægidius, a native of that country, and commander in chief of the Roman forces there, provoked at the death of Majorianus, who had raised him to that post, resolved to march into Italy, and revenge it upon Ricimer and Severus. But in the meantime, the Visigoths, in all likelihood stirred up by Ricimer, having made themselves masters of Norbonne, which was betrayed to them by one Agrippina, and besieged Arles, Ægi-dius turned his arms against them, and obliged them to raise the siege and retire, tho’ they were powerfully assisted by the Burgundians, under the conduct of Gonziac their king, whom Severus had raised to the command of the Roman forces in Gaul, with the title of general. The same year, Marcellinus, or, as Procopius calls him, Marcellianus, who had served with great reputation in the Roman armies, no longer able to bear the haughty behaviour of Ricimer, revolted from Severus, and retiring into Dalmatia, establisht there a new sovereignty, independent of the empire. Hereupon the inhabitants of Italy, seeing themselves at the same time threatened by Marcellinus, by Ægidius, and by Genferic, had recourse to Leo, emperor of the east, who immediately dispatched embassadors to Genferic and Marcellinus.
The latter, satisfied to see himself acknowledged by Leo prince of the country which he had seized, promised not to molest the Romans. But Genferic openly declared, that he would hearken to no terms, till the effects of Valentinian were delivered up to him; which he claimed, because his son Huneric had married Eudocia, that prince’s eldest daughter. He likewise demanded the effects of Aetius, perhaps because Gaudentius, that general’s eldest son, whom he had taken at Rome in 455, was then at his court. However, he sent back to Leo, Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, and Placidia her second daughter; who being soon after married to Olybrius, of whom anon, Genferic declared he would wage an eternal war with the western empire, unless Olybrius, brother-in-law to his son, was raised to the imperial dignity. To this low ebb was the Roman grandeur reduced by the death of Majorianus and the administration of Ricimer. The following year 463, Flavius Cæcina Basilius and Vivianus being consuls, Ægidius gained a signal victory over the Visigoths in Gaul. The battle was fought between the Loire and the Loiret. The latter river, after a short course of about six miles, falls into the former a little below Orleans. Great numbers of the enemy were cut in pieces, and among the rest Frederic, the king's brother, who in this action commanded in chief. After this battle, Ægidius, laid siege to the city of Chinon in Tauraine; but the vigorous resistance he met with obliged him to drop the enterprise. The Visigoths were attended with better success in Spain, than in Gaul; for Idatius speaks of them now as masters of the whole country, except part of Galicia, which was still held by the Suevians, and the provinces of Tarraco and Cartagena, which belonged to the Romans. Such of the natives of Galicia, as had not yet submitted to the Suevians, sent this very year one Palegorius, to implore the protection, not of Severus, but of Theodoric; which plainly shews, that they acknowledged him, and not the Roman emperor, for their sovereign. The next year Rusticus, or Rufficus, and Olybrius being consuls, Remismond, king of the Suevians, surprized and plundered the city of Coimbra; but soon after concluded a peace with Theodoric. In the beginning of the year, Beorger, king of the Alans, having entered Italy with a considerable army, was met by Ricimer in the neighbourhood of Bergamo, and, on the 6th of February, cut off with all his men. Whence these Alans came, is uncertain. This Jornandes supposes to have happened in the reign of Anthemius; but we have followed Idatius, who lived at that time. The same year, died Ægidius in Gaul, being, according to some, says Idatius, poisoned, according to others, murdered. That writer adds, that, upon his death, the Visigoths made themselves masters of the far greater part of Gaul. However, Berri, Sens, and Avergne still belonged to the Romans in 472, and were governed by one Paulus, distinguished with the title of count. Sygarius, the son of Ægidius, held Soiffons and its territory, for several years, having erected there a petty sovereignty, according to the French historians, who give him the title of king. At the same time, Childeric, king of

of the Burgundians, laid siege to Paris, and reduced it; the Franks made themselves masters of the provinces bordering on the Rhine; the Saxons settled at Nantes and Bayeux; the Alamans in the country of the Helvetii; and the Britons, driven out by the Angles and Scots, in the territories of Vannos and Treguier, which, with the adjacent country, took from them, according to the most probable opinion, the name of Bretagne\(^1\). In 465, when Basilius and Hermenericus were consul, died at Rome Severus, after having borne the name of emperor almost four years. He is supposed to have been poisoned by Ricimer\(^k\). His death was followed by an inter-regnum of almost two years, Ricimer ruling, during that time, with an absolute sway; but not daring, as he was by birth a barbarian, to take upon him the title of emperor. The same year, a violent fire breaking out in Constantineople, on the second of September, reduced to ashes eight of the fourteen quarters into which that city was divided. However, it was at last overcome, after it had raged with incredible fury for the space of six whole days, and as many nights\(^l\). The following year, when the emperor Leo alone was consul the third time, Ricimer assembled a powerful fleet, with a design to attempt the recovery of Africa; but was, by contrary and violent winds, which continued blowing the whole summer, obliged to drop that enterprise\(^m\). The same year, Theodoric, king of the Vigoths, after having reigned near thirteen years, was murdered by his brother Euric, who immediately took possession of his dominions, and was proclaimed at Toulouse\(^n\). Jordanes, always favourable to the Goths, only writes, that Euric was suspected of having contributed to the death of his brother\(^o\). The new king sent embassadors to the emperor Leo, to Remismond king of the Suevians, and to Germanic king of the Vandals, acquainting them with his accession to the crown\(^p\). In the east, the Hunns broke into Dacia; but were defeated, first by Anthemius, and afterwards by Anastasius, styled general of Thrace. They were commanded by Dengizic, one of Attila’s sons, who was slain in the engagement. His head was sent to Constantineople, and there exposed expoused for some days to public view. In the following consulship of Pusæus and Johannes, the inter-regnum ended in the west. Anthemius was, with the consent and approbation of Ricimer, declared emperor, notwithstanding the great interest made by Genferic in favour of Olybrius, brother-in-law to his son. Anthemius was a native of Constantinople, descended of an antient, illustrious, and wealthy family, and was, at the time of his promotion, count of the east. He had some claim to the empire, having married Marciana, the only daughter of the late emperor Marcian, by whom he had three sons and one daughter. He had been confin in 455, and was soon after, tho' yet very young, raised to the dignity of patrician, and the post of general. Sidonius, his panegyrist, writes, that, upon the death of Marcian, no one thought of confreign the empire on Leo, till Anthemius had refused it. Theophanes styles him a most christian prince. Soon after his nomination, he left Constantinople, where he then was, and set out for Italy, attended by a great number of chosen troops, and several counts, with other persons of distinction, among whom was Marcellinus, prince of Dalmatia, whom Leo had persuaded to join the new emperor, and, jointly with him, make war upon the Vandals. Anthemius was received at Rome by the senate and people with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable, and proclaimed, according to some, on the twelfth of April, according to others, in the month of August, at a place about three miles from Rome, called Bontrata. A few days after, he gave his daughter in marriage to Ricimer, pursuant to a private agreement between that general and the two princes. In the mean time, Genferic, highly provoked against Leo, for having preferred Anthemius, and not Olybrius, to the empire, sent a powerful fleet with orders to ravage Peloponnesus and the Greek islands; which they did with great cruelty, destroying all with fire and sword. Leo resolved at all events to revenge the affront offered to the eastern empire; and accordingly the following year 468, when Anthemius alone was confin, he fitted out the greatest fleet, says Procopius, the Romans had ever had. Cedrenus writes, it consisted of one thousand one one hundred and thirteen ships, each ship having one hundred men on board. Theophanes and Nicophorus will have no fewer than one hundred thousand ships to have been employed in this expedition, a number altogether incredible. To the forces of Leo were joined all the best troops of the west, under the command of Marcellinus, who reinforced them with a chosen body of men raised in his own dominions. Leo gave the chief command of this formidable fleet to Basiliscus, brother to his wife Verina, who had frequently overcome the barbarians in Thrace. Under him commanded one John, a person of extraordinary courage, and great experience in war. The island of Sicily was appointed the place of the general rendezvous. From thence Marcellinus was to sail for Sardinia, which the Vandals had lately seized; Heraclius of Edeff, a brave and experienced officer, for Libya; and Basiliscus, with the greatest part of the fleet, and the flower of the troops, to steer his course straight to Carthage. Marcellinus, purfuant to this plan, landed in Sardinia, and made himself master of that island, while Heraclius, landing unexpectedly in Libya, defeated the Vandals, who attempted to oppose him, and reduced with incredible expedition Tripolis and all the other cities of that province. Genferic, receiving at the same time news of the loss of Sardinia and Libya, and of the arrival of the Roman fleet at Cape Mercury, about thirty miles from Carthage, began to look upon himself as irretrievably lost, and is even said to have had some thoughts of yielding up Africa to the Romans, and retiring elsewhere; and indeed if Basiliscus had, during the panic which had seized the barbarians, marched directly to Carthage, he might have easily made himself master of that city, and put an end to the war at once; but his dilatory proceedings giving Genferic time to recover from his consterna tion, he began to despise the Roman admiral, and had even the confidence to send deputies to him, begging a truce of five days, to settle with him the conditions on which he was to submit to Leo. Some authors write, that, with the embassadors, Genferic sent privately an immense sum to Basiliscus, with whose avaricious temper he was well acquainted. Others tell us, that Afsar, who had lately quarrelled with Leo, fearing that prince would become too powerful, if he overcame overcame the Vandals, had promised to raise Basiliscus, who was no less ambitious than covetous, to the empire, provided he spared Genferic. Be that as it will, Basiliscus readily consented to the truce, during which Genferic taking one night advantage of a favourable wind, failed unexpectedly out of the harbour with a great number of fire-ships, which being by the wind driven full sail upon the Roman navy, set fire to many of their ships, and threw the whole fleet into the utmost confusion. The next morning Genferic’s fleet appeared drawn up in line of battle, and falling upon the Romans before they could recover themselves from their terror and consternation, took several of their ships, sunk others, and obliged the rest to save themselves in the best manner they could. John, who commanded under Basiliscus, and was no ways privy to his treachery, after having killed with his own hand an incredible number of barbarians, threw himself, when overpowered, on a plank into the sea. Genfion, the son of Genferic, greatly taken with his courage and gallant behaviour, offered him his life and liberty; but the brave commander answering, It shall never be said, that John owed his life to dogs, quitted his plank, and was drowned. As for Basiliscus, Zonaras writes, that, in the heat of the engagement, he all on a sudden tacked about, and, crowding all sails, betook himself to flight; which raised the courage of the enemy, and quite disheartened his own people. Marcellinus, after the reduction of Sardinia, returned to Sicily, with a design to pass from thence over into Africa; but, before he set sail, he was affrighted by an officer, who commanded under him, not without the privy, as was supposed, of Anthemius, to whom his power gave no small umbrage. Heraclius, who was on full march from Libya to Carthage, upon the news of the bad success of Basiliscus, thought it advisable to turn back, and hasten into the territories of the empire. Basiliscus returned to Sicily, with the few ships that had escaped, having lost above fifty thousand men. From Sicily, he returned to Constantinople, and there, as his treachery was publicly known, took sanctuary in the church of St. Sophia. Tho’ both the emperor and people were incensed against him, yet, by the mediation of the empress Verina, his sister, his life was spared, and leave granted him to

to retire to Heraclea in Thrace. Such was the issue of this unhappy expedition, which is said to have cost both empires above an hundred and thirty thousand pounds weight of gold, not only the two princes, but all governors, and other persons in employments, cheerfully contributing large sums to defray the charges of an enterprize so advantageous to the empire. Priscus the historian, who flourished at that time, wrote a very minute and exact account of it; but his work has not reached our time. The same year, Leo married his daughter Ariadne to Zeno, descended from an illustrious family in Iphauria. His father's name was Rufumbladastes, and his, before his marriage, Trafalissaeus, or Tarafiodus. He took the name of Zeno from another Iphaurian, who had been raised to great employments in the reign of Theodosius the younger. Evagrius refers us to one Eustathius, a Syrian writer, who, he says, will inform us as to the motives that prompted Leo to prefer Zeno to many other persons of great merit in the choice of a son-in-law; but the works of Eustathius have been long since lost. Theophanes and Candidus Iphaurius write, that Leo, jealous of the too great power of Aspar, and apprised of his wicked practices, gave his daughter to Zeno, hoping by his means to gain over the Iphaurians his countrymen, who were deemed the best soldiers of the empire. However that be, Leo immediately raised his son-in-law to the rank of patrician, appointing him at the same time captain of his guards, and commander in chief of all the armies in the east. In the west, Remismond made himself master of Lisbon, betrayed to him by one Lufides, a native of Lusitania, who commanded in that place. About the same time, the Goths surprised Merida, and committed dreadful ravages in the neighbouring country, sparing neither Romans nor Suevians. Here Idatius ends his chronicle, with telling us, that many prodigies appeared this year in Galicia, and among the rest, that several fishes were taken in the Minho, marked with Hebrew, Greek, and Latin characters. The next confus were Marcianus and Zeno, the two sons-in-law of the emperor Leo, the latter having married Ariadne, and the former, who was the son of the emperor.

emperor Anthemius, Leocadia. Nothing worthy of notice happened this year in either empire; but in the following consulship of Severus and Jordanes, Euric, king of the Visigoths, an ambitious and warlike prince, made himself master of Auvergne, Berri, and Gevaudan, after having defeated a body of twelve thousand Britons dwelling on the Loire, who, under the conduct of Rictioth or Riotham, came to the assistance of the Romans. At the same time one Odoacer, who had commanded a body of Saxons under Aegidius in 464, made himself master of Angers; but was overcome by Childeric king of the Franks, who reduced not only the city of Angers, but all the neighbouring country. The Burgundians too, taking advantage of the weak and distracted state of the empire, reduced the city of Lions, and the whole province called Lugdunensis Prima.

The following year, when Leo was consul the fourth time with Probianus, some misunderstanding arose between that prince and Aspar, who had raised him to the empire; but as Aspar was greatly beloved by the army, and commanded a separate and independent body, having one Quercal, by nation a Hunn, for his lieutenant, the emperor thought it advisable to dissemble for the present; and pretending to be reconciled with Aspar, gave one of his daughters in marriage to Patricius Secundus, that general’s eldest son, and soon after created Aspar Caesar. The inhabitants of Constantinople, knowing Aspar and his whole family to be greatly attached to the doctrine of Arius, were highly displeased at this promotion; but the emperor soon delivered them from the apprehension they were under of seeing an Arian raised to the empire; for being informed by some persons, privy to all the counsels of Aspar, that a plot was carrying on against him by that general and his children, he resolved to be before-hand with them; and accordingly caused Aspar, and his son Ardabarius, to be murdered this very year. The antients only tell us, that they fell by the hands of the eunuchs of the palace, Leo having ordered them to be put to death, because they aspired at the empire. But the modern writers add several circumstances, which seem inconsistent with what we read in the authors who flourished in those times. Patricius was dangerously wounded, but found means... means to make his escape, as did likewise Aspar’s third son, named Hermeneirc. The friends of Aspar, especially the Goths in the emperor’s service, attempted to revenge his death, and committed great disorders in Constantinople, being headed by one of their countrymen, named Ostroui. But Zeno, who was then at Chalcis, hastened with a choice body of troops to the metropolis, the Goths were driven out of the city with a great slaughter. However, they ravaged Thrace, and, being joined by the Goths, settled in Pannonia, made themselves masters of Philippi and Arcadiopolis; which places they restored soon after, laying down their arms, upon the emperor’s promising to pay them a certain sum, and to appoint Theodoric, son to Triarius, the brother of Aspar’s wife, commander of the Goths in the Roman service. Upon the death of Aspar, who had been a zealous patron of the Arians, Leo published several rigorous laws against those heretics, depriving them of all their churches, and forbidding them to hold any public or private assemblies. The following year, when Festus and Marcianus were consuls, Ricimir, who was no less powerful in the west, than Aspar had been in the east, dreading the same fate, resolved to be before-hand with the emperor Anthemiust, who, he saw, began to mistrust him. Accordingly he openly revolted, and, at the head of the barbarians in the Roman service, but under his command, laid siege to Rome, where the emperor then was. The citizens, who were, generally speaking, well affected to Anthemiust, made a vigorous resistance, notwithstanding the famine and plague that raged in the city, depending upon the succours they daily expected out of Gaul, under the conduct of Bilimer, who commanded the Roman troops there, and was greatly attached to the interest of Anthemiust. Bilimer arrived at length with a considerable army, consisting partly of Romans, partly of barbarians; but having ventured an engagement, he was utterly defeated by Ricimer, who, encouraged with this success, pursued the siege with fresh vigour, and breaking in the end into the city, raged with no less fury than Alaric or Genferich had done, allowing his men not only to plunder the houses of the unhappy citizens, but to commit all manner of cruelties. As for the emperor Anthemiust, Ricimir caused him to be put to death, and Olybriust to be proclaimed in his room. Zeno, who succeeded succeeded Leo, reproached the Roman Senate with the death of Anthemiuss. He is supposed to have died on the eleventh of July; but authors are quite silent as to the circumstances of his death, contenting themselves only with telling us, that, by the treachery of Ricimer, he lost both his life and the empire. Ricimer did not long outlive Anthemiuss; for being seized with violent pains in his bowels, he died on the eighteenth, or rather nineteenth, of September; and was followed soon after by Olybrius, who died a natural death at Rome, on the twenty-third of October. This year, Mount Vesuvius in Campania threw out such an immense quantity of ashes, as turned night into day, even at Constantinople, where the people were assembled in the circus, when the cloud first appeared. All the streets and houses were covered with ashes three inches deep. This happened according to Marcellinus, on the sixth, according to the chronicle of Alexandria, on the eleventh, of November. The following year 473, when Leo alone was consul the fifth time, Glycerius took upon him the title of emperor at Ravenna, on the fifth of March; being supported by Gondibal, nephew to Ricimer, whom Olybrius had raised, during his short reign, to the rank of patrician. All we know of this new prince is, that he had been comes doneficorum, and was, according to Theophanes, a man of some merit. In the very beginning of his reign, the Goths, who had been allowed to settle in Pannonia, resolved, without the least provocation, to make war upon both empires. Purtuant to this resolution, Vitudem broke into Italy, while his brother Theodomir invaded the eastern empire; but the former dying, his son, bearing the same name, was, by the rich pretenses of Glycerius, prevailed upon to quit Italy, whence he retired into Gaul, and there joined the Visigoths, who, being thus reinforced, conquered soon after both that country and Spain. Theodmir likewise died as soon as he entered the territories of the eastern empire, and was succeeded by his son Theodoric, surnamed the Great. The same year 473, Leo, apprehending, either from his age or infirmities, that his end approached, was for naming Zeno to succeed him, but both the Senate and people of Constantinople, who hated hated Zeno, strongly remonstrating against his promotion, the emperor raised Leo the younger, the son of Zeno by his daughter Ariadne, to the dignity of Caesar, and even declared him his partner in the empire, tho’ he was then only five, or at most six, years old. The following year, when Leo the younger was consul alone, the emperor, his grandfather, was seized with a bloody flux, which, being attended with a violent fever, carried him off in a short time. He died at Constantinople, in the month of January, after having reigned seventeen years, wanting some days. Soon after his death, the empress Verina prevailed upon the senate and people of Constantinople to suffer her son-in-law Zeno to be declared colleague to young Leo in the empire. The ceremony was performed in the month of February, not in the palace of Hebdomon, as usual, but in the circus at Constantinople. The young prince did not survive his grandfather above ten months; for he died in the month of November of the same year. Victor Tununensis and Ado suppose, that he was dispatched by his own father; but neither the antient nor modern Greek writers, tho’ highly prejudiced against Zeno, charge him with that unnatural murder. Leo the elder, or, as he is commonly surnamed, the Great, not approving of the promotion of Glycerius, had, before his death, named to the empire of the west Julius Nepos, or, as some call him, Nepotianus, a native of Dalmatia, and nephew, by the mother, to Marcellinus, prince of that country, who was murdered in Sicily, as we have related above. Nepos, who, it seems, was then at Constantinople, failed from thence without loss of time, for Italy, and landing at Porto, surprized Glycerius there, took him prisoner, and, stripping him of the imperial ornaments, caused him to be ordained bishop of Salonae in Dalmatia, after he had borne the title of emperor a year, and some months. In the mean time, the Visigoths, under the conduct of Euric their king, broke into the territories which the Romans had still left in Gaul; but he was prevailed upon by Epiphanius, bishop of Pavia, whom Nepos sent to him with the character of embassador to conclude a peace with the empire, whereof whereof one of the articles was, that the city of Clermont, which Euric had not been able to reduce by force, should be delivered up to him. Thus the whole country lying between the ocean, the Rhone, and the Loire, fell under the power of the Goths, who, it seems, had made themselves masters of all the open places, before Clermont was yielded to them. The following year, when Zeno alone was consul the second time, Nepos, having raised Orestes to the post of general, appointed him commander of the Roman forces in Gaul; but he, instead of hastening into that country, pursuant to his orders, bent his march towards Ravenna, with a design to depose Nepos, who, he knew, was not in a condition to oppose him. The emperor, suspecting his design, and disturbing the few troops he had with him, abandoned the city at his approach, and fled by sea to Salonæ in Dalmatia, where he was entertained by the bishop Glycerius, whom he had lately deprived of the empire. The flight of Nepos happened on the twenty-eighth of August of the present year 475. Orestes was by birth a Roman, that is, he was born a subject of the empire. As he lived in Pannonia, perhaps his native country, when that province was yielded to the Hunns in 430, he lifted himself among the troops of Attila, who, finding him to be a man of parts, made him his secretary, and sent him at least twice to Constantinople with the character of ambassador, viz. in 448, and 449. His father, by name Tatula, bore likewise some considerable employment at the court of Attila. Orestes married the daughter of count Romulus, sent by Valentinian on an embassy to Attila in 449, and had by her a son, called by Males, or Mulus, Romulus Augustus, but, by all other historians, Romulus Augustulus, either by way of derision, or because he was very young when raised to the empire. Orestes, leaving the Hunns, served with great reputation in the Roman armies, and was raised to the rank of patrician, and appointed by Nepos general of the troops in Gaul; when turning his arms against the prince who had entrusted him with them, he drove him from the throne, as we have related above, and caused not himself, but his son Augustus, or Augustulus, to be proclaimed emperor in his room, on the twenty-ninth of October of the present year. The new prince styled himself Augustus Romulus Augustus, Augustus being both his proper name, and the title of his dignity. As Augustus was very young, his father took upon him the administration, contenting himself with the title of patrician, and governing only as tutor and guardian to his son, during his minority. While these things passed in the west, the Saracens committed dreadful ravages in Mesopotamia; and the Huns and Thrace put all to fire and sword, and afterwards retired unmolested, the emperor Zeno, a most lewd and debauched prince, being wholly intent upon his scandalous pleasures and diversions. However, he concluded a peace with Geneseric, which was religiously observed by the Vandals, till the reign of Justinian. The same year the empress Verina, who had by her interest raised her son-in-law Zeno to the empire, highly provoked by his enormous vices and scandalous indolence, formed a conspiracy against him, at the head of which was her brother Basiliscus, of whom we have spoken elsewhere. Zeno was privately informed of the whole; but, instead of putting himself in a posture of defence, and defeating their measures, as he might have easily done, he betook himself to flight, retiring first to Chalcedon, and from thence into Æsaria, his native country. Upon his retreat, Basiliscus was proclaimed emperor by the senate and people of Constantinople, to the great disappointment of Verina, who designed to confer the empire on Patricius, magister officiorum to Zeno, with whom she is said to have maintained a criminal correspondence. Basiliscus immediately declared his wife Zenonides Augusta, and raised his son Marcus to the dignity of Caesar. The following year 476, when Basiliscus and Armatus were confusis, the barbarians who served in the Roman armies, and were distinguished with the title of allies, demanded, as a reward for their services, the third part of the lands in Italy, pretending that the whole country, which they had so often defended, belonged of right to them. As Orestes refused to comply with this insolent demand, they resolved to do themselves justice, as they called it; and, openly revolting, chose one Odoacer for their leader. Thus Procopius. He is called by Theophanes a Goth; by Marcellinus, king king of the Goths; and by Isidore, prince of the Ostrogoths. We cannot conceive what could induce Baronius, and several others, to call him king of the Heruli. Jornandes styles him in one place king of the Rugians, and in another king of the Turcilingians. The Rugians inhabited both the banks of the Danube, near the city of Faviana, a little above Vienna. As for the Turcilingians, we find no account in the antients of them, or their country. Odoacer, whether by birth a Goth, Rugian or Turcilingian, was, according to Ennodius, meanly born, and only a private man in the guards of the emperor Augustulus, when the barbarians revolving chose him for their leader. However, he is said to have been a man of uncommon parts, equally capable of commanding an army, and governing a state.

Having left his own country, when he was yet very young, to serve in Italy, as he was of a stature remarkably tall, he was admitted among the emperor's guards, and continued in that station till the present year; when putting himself at the head of the barbarians in the Roman pay, who, tho' of different nations, had, with one consent, chosen him for their leader, he marched against Orestes and his son Augustulus, who still refused to give them any share of the lands in Italy. As the Roman troops were inferior, both in number and valour, to the barbarians, Orestes took refuge in Pavia, at that time one of the best fortified cities in Italy; but Odoacer, investing the place without loss of time, took it soon after by assault, gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers, and then set fire to it, which reduced most of the houses, and two churches, to ashes. Orestes was taken prisoner, and brought to Odoacer, who carried him to Placentia, and there caused him to be put to death on the twenty-eighth of August, the day on which he had driven Nepos out of Ravenna, and obliged him to abandon the empire. From Placentia Odoacer marched straight to Ravenna, where he found Paul, the brother of Orestes, and the young emperor Augustulus. The former he immediately put to death; but sparing Augustulus, in consideration of his youth, he

he stripped him of the ensigns of the imperial dignity, and confined him to Lucullanum, a castle in Campania, where he was, by Odoacer’s orders, treated with great humanity, and allowed an handsome maintenance to support himself and his relations. Rome readily submitted to the conqueror, who thereupon caused himself to be proclaimed king of Italy, but would not assume the purple, or any other mark of the imperial dignity. Thus failed the very name of an empire in the west. Britain had been long since abandoned by the Romans; Spain was held by the Goths and Sueviens; Africa by the Vandals; the Burgundians, Goths, Franks, and Alans, had erected several tetrarchies in Gaul; at length Italy itself, with its proud metropolis, which for so many ages had given law to the rest of the world, was enslaved by a contemptible barbarian, whose family, country, and nation are not well known to this day. The downfall and ruin of the greatest state the world ever beheld were, no doubt, owing to the depravity of the people in general, and to the sloth, luxury, and ambition of their princes; but more immediately to their allowing such swarms of barbarians to settle within the empire, and to serve in the Roman armies, under their own officers, in separate and independent bodies. Thus they became more numerous and powerful than the natives, controlled the emperors, disposed of the imperial crown as they pleased, and at length became absolute masters of those whom they were employed to defend and assist. This great revolution happened in the west in the year 476, of the Christian æra, five hundred and seven years after the battle of Actium, when the Roman monarchy was first established, and one thousand two hundred and twenty-nine since the foundation of Rome. Most writers observe, that the empire began with Augustus, and ended in a prince of the same name. Of the state of Italy under Odoacer, till he was overcome and slain by Theodoric the Ostrogoth, and under the Ostrogoths, from Theodoric to their expulsion by Narces, we shall speak hereafter; and in the mean time pursue the Roman history, that is, the history of the Constantinopolitan Roman empire, in which were preserved the same marks of sovereignty, the same ceremonies, titles, titles, and employments, that had been first established at Rome.

C H A P. XXXII.

The Roman history, from the dissolution of the western empire, to the death of Justinian the Great.

At the same time that the Roman empire failed in the west, it was usurped in the east by Basiliscus, who, upon the flight of Zeno, the lawful prince, had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, and his son Marcus to be acknowledged Cæsar. Zeno fled into Ispuria, whither he was pursued by Illus and Trocondes, two of the usurper's generals, who having easily defeated the few troops he had with him, forced the unhappy prince to shut himself up in the castle, which they immediately invested. But in the mean time, Basiliscus having by his cruelty, avarice, enormous extortions, and, above all, by his unseasonable zeal for the doctrine of Eutyches, highly disoblige the senate and people of Constantinople, as well as the soldiery, the two generals, informed of what passed in the metropolis, and privately encouraged, as some write, by the senate, instead of pursuing the siege, openly declared for Zeno; and joining him with all their forces, bent their march to Constantinople. Basiliscus no sooner heard of their revolt, than he dispatched Harmatius or Armatus, his kinsman, with a very numerous army against them, after having obliged him to swear, by his baptism, that he would not betray him. But, notwithstanding this oath, he had no sooner passed the Bosphorus, than he joined Zeno, encamped with Illus and Trocondes, in the neighbourhood of Nice, upon that prince's promising to appoint him general of the troops of his household, and to continue him in that office during his life; to which his son, by name Basiliscus, who was yet very young to the dignity of Cæsar, and to leave him the empire after his death: Zeno, Zeno, thus reinforced, marched directly to Constantinople, which he entered without opposition, the usurper flying for refuge, with his wife Zenonides and his children, to the great church, where he is said to have laid down his crown upon the altar. Zeno ordered them to be immediately stripped of all the marks of the imperial dignity; and having soon after got them into his power, being either betrayed a second time by Harmatius, as Candidus Itaaurus writes, or delivered up, as we read in Procopius, by Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, he confined them to a castle in Cappadocia, where he perished.

Basilichus, taken, and confined to a castle in Cappadocia, where he perishes.

Thus ended the usurpation of Basilicus, after it had lasted, according to most writers, twenty months, that is, from October 475, to June of the present year 477. Zeno, pursuant to his promise, raised Harmatius to the post of general of the troops of his household, and his son Basilicus to the dignity of Cæsar; but soon after, dishonoring the father, on account of his treachery and ingratitude to Basilicus, who had preferred him to the first employments in the state, he caused him to be murdered in the palace, employing for that purpose one Onoulus or Onoulphus, by birth a barbarian, but brought up in the family of Harmatius, and by his interest raised from a mean condition to the dignity of count, and the post of general of Illyricum. As for Basilicus, the son of Harmatius, he was deposed from the dignity of Cæsar, and made reader in a church near Constantinople. He was afterwards ordained bishop of Cyzicus, the metropolis of Hellepont, which church he governed with great prudence and piety, and assisted in 518, at the council of Constantinople. During the usurpation of Basilicus, a dreadful fire happened at Constantinople, which consumed great part of the city, with the library, containing an hundred and twenty thousand volumes, and the works of Homer, written, as it is said, in gold characters on the great gut of a dragon, an hundred and twenty foot long. In the following year, 478, when Illus alone was consul, Theodoric, the son of Triarius, who had espoused the cause of Basilicus, broke into Thrace with a numerous army of Goths, and advanced within four miles of Constantinople; which so terrified the emperor, that he concluded a peace with with him upon his own terms; whereof one of the articles was, that Theodoric should be appointed commander in chief of the Roman horde. The next year, Zeno being consul the third time, Marcian, the son of Anthemius, who had reigned in the west, claiming the empire in right of his wife Leontia, the eldest daughter of the late emperor Leo, attacked unexpectedly the imperial palace in Constantinople, at the head of some malecontents prepared for any desperate attempt. The emperor’s guards, endeavouring to make head against them, were either dispersed or cut in pieces, and Zeno himself shut up with a small number of officers in the palace. Had Marcian pursued his design, and without loss of time forced the gates of the palace, which in that consternation he might have easily done, the emperor must have fallen into his hands. But the attack being with the utmost imprudence put off till the next morning, Zeno in the mean time gained over, what with pretexts, what with promises, most of Marcian’s men, who, thereupon dismounting the rest, withdrew all on a sudden, and took sanctuary in the church of the apostles, whence he was dragged by the emperor’s orders, ordained priest, and confined to a monastery in the neighbourhood of Caesarea in Cappadocia. As Zeno had not for some years paid the Ostrogoths in Pannonia their annual pension, Theodoric, their king, no sooner heard of the revolt of Marcian, than he broke into Macedonia; and from thence advancing into Epirus, made himself master of Duras on the Adriatic sea, that important place being betrayed to him by a Goth named Sidimont. But Sabinianus, an officer of great experience and address, having surprized and cut in pieces a strong reinforcement that was marching to the assistance of Theodoric, under the conduct of his brother Theudimont, and taken all their baggage and two thousand waggons loaded with provisions, the Goths, abandoning Duras, retired in great haste into Pannonia. The following year 480, when Basilus, surnamed the younger, was consul, Zeno, not only concluded a peace, but entered into an alliance with Huneric, the son and successor of Genseric, dead three years before. In 481, when Placidius or Placitus was consul, Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, renewed his ravages, laying waste the provinces of Macedonia and Thessaly, which obliged Zeno in the end to comply with with his demands, that is, to yield to him part of Lower Dacia and Moesia; to give him the command of the troops of the household, and to name him consul for the ensuing year 483. Upon these terms he withdrew in 482, when Severinus and Troadundus were consuls, out of Macedon and Thessaly, restored Larissa, the metropolis of the latter province, which he had taken, and promised to employ, when required, all his forces in defence of the empire. The following year, when Theodoric was consul at Constantinople, and Venantius at Rome, (for Odoacer made no change in the government or magistrates of the city) Leontius, a native of Chalcis in Syria; and commander of the troops in that province, revolted, some say at the instigation of the empress Verina; caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. Against him Zeno immediately dispatched Illus, captain of his guards: But he, instead of opposing Leontius, joined him; and having ravaged the provinces of Syria and Isauria, advanced to Antioch, with a design to seize on that metropolis. Longinus, the emperor's brother, met them in that neighbourhood, at the head of a considerable army; but his troops were all to a man cut in pieces by the rebels, and he himself taken prisoner. After this victory, Leontius and Illus entered Antioch in triumph; Zeno, upon the defeat and captivity of his brother, dispatched John, an officer of great valor, and experience in war, into Syria, with what troops he could assemble, and prevailed upon Theodoric, the Ostrogoth, to join him with a numerous army of Goths. These two commanders were attended with better success; for meeting Leontius and Illus in the neighbourhood of Seleucia, they gained a complete victory, and the following year, when Symmachus was consul, obliged the two ringleaders of the revolt to fly for refuge to the strong castle of Papyra in Cilicia, which John immediately invested, while Theodoric returned, as the war seemed now ended, with his troops to Constantinople. Troadundus, the brother of Illus, taken prisoner by John, as he was attempting to make his escape out of Syria, in order to stir up the barbarians, was, by his orders, beheaded. The same year, Theodoric, up to some disgrace, withdrew from Constantinople, and returned to Pannonia. Evagrius writes, that Zeno, jealous of the glory.

Theodoric the Ostrogoth breaks into Thrace.

glory he had acquired by his late victory, and of the great esteem persons of all ranks shewed him, attempted privately to dispatch him. However that be, it is certain, that Theodoric, after having spent the following year, when Longinus and Decius were consuls, in raising troops and making other military preparations, as if he designed to make war upon the barbarians, broke suddenly into Thrace at the head of a numerous army; and putting all to fire and sword, advanced within fifteen miles of Constantinople; but, instead of laying siege to that metropolis, as was apprehended, he marched back to Pannonia, in virtue of a private treaty between him and Zeno, by which the emperor yielded to him, as some authors write, all the provinces of Italy, held then by Odoacer, encouraging him to rescue them out of the hands of that barbarian, and promising to acknowledge him king of Italy. The Romans afterwards pretended, that Zeno had sent Theodoric to conquer Italy, not for himself, but for the emperor of the east, to whom of right it belonged. On the other hand, the Goths maintained, that Zeno had yielded it to be held for ever by the Goths. Some authors write, that, in virtue of this treaty, Theodoric was to hold Italy during his life-time, but that upon his death it was to be reunited to the empire. However that be, Theodoric, in the beginning of the autumn of this year 487, when Boetius was consul, returned to Novae in Moesia, which city he had chosen for a place of residence; and having spent the winter in military preparations, he set out the following year, when Sisidius and Dinanius were consuls, at the head of a powerful army for Italy, and entering that country, overcame Odoacer in several battles, and established a new monarchy there, as we shall relate at length hereafter. About the end of this year, Leontius and Illus, after having defended with incredible bravery the castle of Papyra for the space of four years, were in the end taken by treachery, and put to death. Their heads were sent to Constantinople, and there exposed for several days to the view of the public. In the following consulship of Anicius Probinus and Chronion Eusebius, Zeno caused several persons of great distinction to be put to death, and banished others, confiscating their estates, under pretence that they had favoured

...yourd Leontius and Illus... The following year, when Longinus was consul the second time with Faustus, Zeno, raging with more cruelty than ever, caused Pelagius, a par-

fon but because he had been told by an astrologer, that he was to succeed Zeno... The emperor did not long survive him; for in the month of April of the following year 491, when Olybrius was consul, he was seized with violent pains in his bowels, which carried him off in a few days after he had lived sixty-five years and nine days, and reigned seventeen years and three months... The more modern Greek writers, and amongst the rest Cedrenus, tell us, that being seized with an epileptic fit, he was buried alive, his wife Ariadne, who hated him, and was in love with Anastatus, whom she immediately married, not suffering him to be relieved, tho' he made a dreadful noise in his tomb; which being afterwards opened, he was found to have devoured the flesh of his own arms, and even his buffkins... But of this tragical end no mention is made by the more antient writers. He is painted by the antients as one of the most wicked and debauched princes recorded in history, as a person desitute of every good quality requisite in a prince, and equally incapable of governing a state and commanding an army... Of the writers, who flourished about this time, we shall speak in note (U).

(U) Theodulus, a native of Syria, published in the reign of Zeno, several pieces against the Manichees and other heretics, a commentary on the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans, and a poem on the miracles related in the old testament, and on the fables of the poets (1) His comment has reached our times (2) John the grammarian published a book against the Eutychians, which has been long since lost (3). He was still alive, according to Gennadius, in 424 (4). Malus or males, by profession a sophist, wrote the history of Zeno and Basiliscus: but of that work only some fragments have reached us (5). Candidus by birth an Iaurian, comprised in three books a very particular and distinct account of what

Upon the death of Zeno, his brother Longinus laid claim to the empire; but, he being universally abhorred on account of his lewdness and cruelty, Ariadne, widow to the deceased emperor, easily prevailed upon the senate to acknowledge Anastasius for emperor, who was accordingly crowned on the eleventh of April in the circus, according to some by Ariadne a, according to others b, by Euphemius, patriarch of Constantinople, who absolutely refused to place the imperial crown upon his head, till he had bound himself by a solemn oath to protect the catholic church, and to hold the doctrine of the two councils of Nice and Chalcedon. He was no sooner proclaimed emperor, than he married Ariadne, being then in the sixtieth year of his age c. He was a native of Duras, the metropolis of New Epirus in Illyricum d. All we know of his family is, that his father was born in the same city; that his mother was a Manichee, and Clearchus, her brother, an Arian e. As for Anastasius himself, he is by some styled a Manichee, by others an Eutychian f. Magna, whom some will have to have been the emperor's sister, others to have been wife to his brother, named Paul, was a zealous catholic g. Anastasius had not yet attained to the rank of senator, when he was raised to the empire, being at that time one of the great chamberlain's officers, named Silentiarii, whose what happened from the election of Leo to that of Anastasius. A short abstract of his work has been conveyed to us by Photius (6). Evagrius, in speaking of Zeno, often quotes and highly commends one Eunapthius, a native of Philadelphia, who wrote an abridgment of the Roman history, from Æneas to the twelfth year of Zeno's reign (7). The same historian is mentioned by Nicephorus (8). Photius speaks of one Victorinus, who wrote some orations in commendation of the consuls, and of the emperor Zeno (9). He was a native of Antioch, and the son of Lampadius. Photius commends the elegance, clearness, and propriety of his style (10).

whose province it was to cause due silence to be observed in the palace. He is said to have led, while a private man, a very abstemious life, and to have given signal instances of his integrity, whence, upon his receiving the purple and diadem in the circus, the people, applauding his promotion, cried out with one voice, Reign, Anastasius, as you have lived. And truly the beginning of his reign was not undeservedly applauded by persons of all ranks; for he immediately remitted what ever to that time was due to the exchequer, and utterly abolished the infamous tax called chryfargyrum, which was levied every fifth year upon those, even common beggars not excepted, who sold any thing, of how little foever, whence it was called the gold of tribulation. To pay it, parents were often obliged to sell their children, after they had been stripped of every thing else. It was not only raised on all traders, in what kind so ever of merchandize they dealt, but on the public prostitutes, who, by paying to the prince a considerable share of what they earned by their infamous profession, seemed to have purchased a right to pursuie with impunity their scandalous practices. Alexander Severus being abashed, the pagan, to suffer the money thus raised to be lodged in the exchequer, ordered it to be kept apart, and to be employed in repairing the public edifices. Theodotius the younger utterly suppressed this infamous tribute in 439, but it was soon after revived through the avarice of his successors. Zosimus will have the tax to have been first established by Constantine the Great; which is denied by Evagrius as a calumny, without any other foundation but the implacable hatred which that pagan writer bore to the deliverer of the christian religion. And indeed it is evident from the antient writers, that long before Constantine's time a tax was laid on all traders, as well as infamous women; but that Constantine, to save charges, caused it to be levied, not annually, as it had been till his reign, but every fourth or rather fifth year. However that be, Anastasius, looking upon it as no less burdensome to the people than shameful in the prince, not only utterly abolished it, with the consent and approbation of the senate, but, to prevent its ever being revived, caused all the papers relating to it to be publicly burnt in the circus. This abolition of the chryfargyrum is recorded by all the historians, who speak of Anastasius, as an action truly great, heroic, and almost divine, worthy of being transmitted to the latest posterity, and capable of covering the many faults, which are but too deservedly laid to that prince’s charge. Timotheus of Gaza wrote a tragedy on the chryfargyrum, which he ascribed to Anastasius. Cedrenus, who styles that writer a man of universal knowledge, tells us, that the emperor was in great measure induced by the reading of that piece to propose to the senate the suppressing of such an infamous tax. The same writer adds, that Anastasius abolished two kinds of chryfargyrums, one of which was raised on the poor, on the beggars, slaves, freemen, harlots, and divorced women, who, without distinction of sex, age, or condition, paid every fourth year a certain sum for themselves, and another for their horses, mules, dogs, asses, oxen, &c. At the same time, the new prince drove all informers out of Constantinople, and put a stop to the enormous abuse introduced by Zeno of exposing to sale all public offices, and bestowing, to the great oppression of the unhappy people, the best governments on the highest bidders. Anastasius having, by these and several other acts of generosity and good-nature, gained the affections of the people, they all to a man joined him against Longinus, the deceased emperor’s brother, who in the beginning of the following year 492, when the emperor Anastasius and Rufus were consuls, raised some disturbances in Constantinople, but was immediately seized, deprived of all his employments, and sent back into Ifauria, his native country, with orders to continue there. With him were driven out of Constantinople all the Ifaurians, who had borne great sway in the late reign. The Ifaurians, thus banished the city, espoused the cause of Longinus, and, openly revolting, kindled a civil war in the bowels of the empire. They were headed by Longinus, the late emperor's brother, by another Longinus, surnamed Selinontius, no doubt from the city of Selinus in Ifauria, the place of his nativity, by Indus, Theodorus, Ninilinghus, and several other Ifaurians of great distinction, who had been raised by Zeno to the first employments in the state. Conon, bishop of Apamea in Syria, abandoning his flock, joined his countrymen, for he was by birth an Ifaurian, and became one of the ringleaders of the the revolt. Under these heads the rebels seized on an immense quantity of arms, and vast sums lodged by Zeno in a strong hold of Isauria, which enabled them to raise and arm above an hundred and fifty thousand men. The emperor, alarmed at the progress they made, dispatched the flower of his troops against them, under the conduct of two of the most renowned generals of that age, viz. John the Scythian, and John, surnamed Gibbus, or the hunch-backed, who coming up with the rebels in the neighbourhood of Cotyce in Phrygia, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to take refuge amongst the inaccessible mountains of Isauria, where they maintained themselves for the space of six years, in spite of the utmost efforts of the best generals of the empire. Ninilungus, one of the chief leaders, was killed in the above-mentioned battle. The following year, when Eusebius was confid the second time with Albinus, surnamed the younger, the emperor, who, notwithstanding the genrosity he affected on his accession to the empire, was naturally of a most avaricious temper, laid an heavy tax on the inhabitants of Constantinople, called by Evagrius chryaotelia, which, as it was no-ways expected, incensed them to such a degree, that, rising all on a sudden, they pulled down the emperor's statues, and dragged them through the chief streets of the city with those of the empress Ariadne, uttering most injurious invectives both against her and Anatafius. How this tumult ended, we are no-where told. The same year Theodoric the Goth, having completed the conquest of Italy, by the reduction of Ravenna after a three years siege, as we shall relate more at length hereafter, caused himself to be proclaimed king of that country, without waiting the return of the embassadors, whom he had sent to Constantinople for the ensign of royalty. However, he dispatched Festus, or Faustus, and Ireneus, two persons of rank, to solicit the emperor's approbation, and excuse the liberty he had taken. Anatafius received his excuses, promised not to moleft him in the possession of the country he had conquered, and sent him the ensigns of the royal dignity. Hence it appears, that he acknowledged in some degree, as Odoacer had done, the authority of the emperor. Besides, he suffered the Romans to receive the confullhip from the emperor of the east. "This true he named in 511, one Felix to that dignity; but at the same time he wrote to Anastasius, begging him to confirm what he had done. In 494, when Afterius and Presidius were consuls, Diogenes, one of the emperor’s generals, having surprized the city of Claudopolis in Isauria held by the rebels, he was closely besieged in it by the bishop Conon, and reduced to such frights, that he must have soon either perished with hunger, or been cut in pieces with all his men, had not John, surnamed Gibbus, opening himself away over mount Taurus, and falling unexpectedly upon the rebels, obliged them to retire with great slaughter. The bishop, fighting with great resolution and intrepidity at the head of his men, received a wound of which he died soon after.

The two following years, in the first of which Viator, or, as some style him, Victor, was consul, and in the other Paul, the emperor’s brother, some inconsiderable advantages were gained over the Isaurian rebels, who were utterly defeated the following year, when the emperor Anastasius was consul the second time, by John the Scythian. Longinus, brother to the late emperor Zeno, and Theodorus, or Athenodorus, being taken prisoners, they were both put to death by that general’s orders, and their heads sent to Constantinople, where they were exposed to public view in the suburbs called Syce. The head of Athenodorus was afterwards sent to Tarfus, and set up on a pole before the gate of that city.

The other ringleaders of the rebellion, namely Longinus Selinontius and Indus, were taken the following year, when John the Scythian was consul with Paulinus, and sent loaded with chains to Constantinople. Longinus was afterwards racked to death at Nice. As several cities in Isauria were utterly ruined during this war, which had lasted six years, the inhabitants of Isauria were removed into Thrace, and the annual pension of five thousand pieces of gold, paid to them by Zeno, taken away for ever. This year the emperor narrowly escaped being murdered in the circus by the populace, upon his refusing to cause some prisoners to be set at liberty, who had been concerned in a late riot. It was with the utmost difficulty that the guards screened him from the fury of the enraged multitude, and the flowers of stones discharged against him. When the multitude found themselves selves repulsed by the soldiery, they set fire to the hippodrome, which consumed that and several other stately edifices, with a square of Constantinople, in which not a single building was left standing. The same year, the Arabs and Saracens, named Scenitae, broke into Palestina and Syria Euphratesiana; but in Syria they were defeated by Eugenius, who commanded the Roman troops there, and in Palestina by Romanus, governor of that province, who on that occasion recovered to the empire the Island of Jotape in the Red Sea, which the Arabs Scenitae had seized, and re-established there the Roman merchants trading to India.

In 499, when Joannes Gibbus and Asclepius were consuls, the Bulgarians breaking into Thrace, Arius, commander of the troops in Illyricum, marched against them at the head of fifteen thousand men, engaged them on the banks of the Zura or Zorta; but was defeated with the loss of four thousand men, among whom were the counts Nicostatus, Innocentius, and Aquilinus, and several other officers of distinction. The barbarians, after having plundered all the open places in Thrace, returned of their own accord beyond the Danube. The same year, Neocæarea and several other cities in Pontus were almost utterly ruined by an earthquake. The year 500, when Patritius and Hypatius were consuls, is quite barren of events. In the following consuls-ship of Pompeius and Avienus, the blue and green factions quarrelling in the circus of Constantinople, above three thousand of the former were killed. The following year, Probus and Avienus being consuls, the Bulgarians breaking anew into Thrace, and the Saracens into Palestina, committed dreadful ravages in those two provinces. The same year Cabades, king of Persia, being highly provoked at the emperor’s refusing to lend him a certain sum, which he owed to the king of the Nephthalite or Ephthalite Hunns, entered unexpectedly Armenia at the head of a numerous army; and having easily reduced the cities of Theodosiopolis and Martyropolis, laid close siege to Amida, which the inhabitants (for there was no garrison in the place) defended with such vigour and resolution, that the king, despairing of being ever able to reduce it, had already ordered his troops to retire; but the inhabitants, especially some women, probably bly common prostitutes, reviling and rallying him from the walls in a manner not to be expressed by a modest writer, he resolved at all events to pursue the siege, which he did accordingly, and in the end made himself master of the place, after having lain before it eighty days, or as others write, four months. Most of the inhabitants were put to the sword, and the town pillaged. In the mean time, Anastasius dispatched a powerful army against the enemy, commanded by Patricius, Hypatius, and Areobindus, who had married Juliana, the daughter of the emperor Olybrius. Under them commanded Celer, Justin, afterwards emperor, his son Vitalianus, Patriiolus, Romanus, and several other officers of distinction. But the Persians having reduced Amida before they reached that place, they divided the army into two bodies, the one, under the command of Patricius and Hypatius, attempting to make an irruption into the enemy’s country on the side of Amida, and the other marching, under the command of Areobindus, to Nisibis, with a design to surprise that important place. In the mean time, Cabades, having drawn his troops together, went to meet Areobindus, who, upon his approach, abandoning his camp and baggage, fled in the utmost confusion to Constantinople, after having prefled in vain Hypatius and Patricius to join him, and with their mutual forces to oppose the enemy, who was far superior in number to either of the parties they commanded. Areobindus being thus put to flight, Cabades, without loss of time, marched against Hypatius and Patricius; and coming upon them unexpectedly, cut their whole army in pieces, the two generals having with much ado escaped by a timely flight the common slaughter. Cabades, having now no enemy to oppose him, over-ran Mesopotamia, extending his ravages to the very borders of Syria, till he was obliged, by the approach of winter, to return into Persia. The following year, when Ctesheus was confin, Celer, entering the province of Arzanene, belonging to the Persians, at the head of a considerable army, laid it waste far and near, while the other generals undertook the siege of Amida, the Persians being diverted by a sudden irruption of the Hunns. The place held out till both the Romans and Persians being quite tired out with the fatigue of a siege in the depth of winter, it was agreed, that the Persians should deliver up the city to the Romans.

Romans, upon their paying to the king of Persia fifty talents, which was immediately done. Thus the Romans recovered the important city of Amida, in the consulship of Sabinianus and Theodorus, after it had been held two years by the Persians. Upon their entering the place, they found that the enemy had not sufficient provisions to support them seven days longer, though they had lived very sparingly during the siege. Not long after, a truce for seven years, which lasted about twenty, was concluded between the two empires, Cabades being engaged in a war with the Caduceans, Hunns, and other barbarians. The same year one Mondon or Mondo, by, nation a Goth, having settled with some of his countrymen, in such places beyond the Danube as he found uninhabited, seized on a strong hold called Herta; and thence, by frequent incursions into the Roman territories, continued for some time harassing the subjects of the empire, giving himself the title of king. Anastasius dispatched against him Sabinianus, the son of the famous general of that name, at the head of ten thousand chosen men, which obliged Mondo to have recourse to Theodoric, the Goth king, of Italy, who the year before had reconquered Pannonia, and recovered Sirmium out of the hands of the Gepidæ. As Mondo had entered into an alliance with Theodoric, Pitzia, one of that prince's generals, marched to his assistance, defeated Sabinianus in a pitched battle near Margus in Lower Dacia, and obliged him to shut himself up in the castle of Nato. This occasioned a misunderstanding between Theodoric, and Anastasius, as we shall relate in the history of the Ostrogoths in Italy. The next consuls were Arcobindus and Mellala, who were succeeded in 507, by the emperor Anastasius, the third time consul, and Venantius. This year Anastasius, to defend not only the city of Constantinople, but the adjacent country, against the sudden irruptions of the barbarians, built the famous wall, called the Long-wall, and the wall of Anastasius, of which frequent mention is made by the Byzantine historians. It was distant from Constantinople two hundred and eighty furlongs, extended from sea to sea, being four hundred and twenty furlongs round, and inclosed not only the metropolis, but the city of Selymbria, and the neighbouring country, which was a continued garden, with an incredible number of stately villas and houses of pleasure, richly furnished and adorned. The wall was twenty foot in breadth, and defended by towers at small distances from each other; by which means the inhabitants, upon the shortest warning, had an opportunity of putting themselves in a posture of defence, and repulsing with great ease the barbarians. In the following confusilhip of Celer and Venantius, styled the younger, Anastasius caused the city of Daras, a frontierto town towards Persia, to be repaired and fortified, in order to prevent the Persians from breaking into the empire on that side. Daras stood on the Cardus, about fifteen miles from Nisibis, and three from Carrae. The same year Clovis, king of the Franks in Gaul, having gained a complete victory over Alaric, king of the Vilgoths in Languedoc and Aquitain, Anastasius, who was at variance with Theodoric, whose daughter Alaric had married, sent embassadors to the king of the Franks, to congratulate him upon his victory, and to present him with the consulular ornaments, and a diadem, which he received in the church of St. Martin at Tours, taking upon him thenceforth the title of consul, and likewise that of Augustus. He removed soon after from Tours to Paris, where he fixed his residence, declaring that city the metropolis of his kingdom. Nothing remarkable happened the two following years 509, 510, in the first of which Importunus was consul, and in the second the famous Boetius, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the history of the kingdom of Italy. In 511, when Secundinus and Felix were consuls, the Heruli, after having long roved about from one country to another, passed the Danube, and were received the following year, when Paulus and Muschianus were consuls, into Thrace, where lands were allotted to them, upon their promising to serve with fidelity in the Roman armies, when required. In the next consulship of Probus and Clementinus, the emperor, at the instigation of the Eutychians, whom he favoured, drove Macedonius, the orthodox patriarch of Constantinople from his see, and preferred one Timotheus, an avowed follower of Eutyches, in his room, who, by attempting to introduce novelties in the public worship, raised great disturbances in in Constantinople. Many of the inhabitants, some say ten thousand, were killed in a tumult between the catholics and Eutychians; and several houses burnt, amongst the rest that of the prefect Martinus, with its rich furniture, he himself having narrowly escaped being consumed in the flames. The following year 514, when Cassiodorus Senator was consul, Vitalianus, one of the emperor's generals, espousing the cause of Macedonius, and the other orthodox bishops, persecuted by Anastasius, approached Constantinople, at the head of a numerous army, raised in three days time, threatening to depose the emperor, if he did not restore the banished bishops to their sees, and drive out the Eutychians. Anastasius, who was a zealous patron of the doctrine of Eutyches, refusing to comply with his request, he made himself master of Moesia and Thrace, took Cyril, governor of the latter province, prisoner, defeated Hypatius, the emperor's nephew, who likewise fell into his hands, and returning before Constantinople with his victorious army, Anastasius, who was no-ways in a condition to oppose him solemnly promised to comply with his demands, viz. to put an end to the persecution, which he had raised against the catholics, to restore Macedonius, and the other orthodox bishops, to their sees, and to call an ecumenical council, and stand to the decisions of the prelates of the church. Anastasius had no sooner signed these articles, than Vitalianus withdrew from the neighbourhood of Constantinople; and dispersing his troops, sent Hypatius, whom he had taken prisoner, back to his uncle, and retired to his government in Thrace. Anastasius thus delivered from his fears, pursued the persecution against the catholics with more cruelty than ever, as the reader will find related at length by the ecclesiastical writers. In 515, when Anthemius and Florentius were consuls, and 516, when Petrus alone bore that dignity, nothing happened which historians have thought worthy of notice. In 517, when Anastasius was consul the fourth time with Agapetus, the northern barbarians, called by Marcellinus Getæ, breaking into Illyricum, laid waste Macedon and Epirus, defeated Pompeius, the emperor's nephew, in the neighbourhood of Adrianople; and penetrating as far as Thessaly, returned from thence beyond the Danube unmolested, with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. The follow-following year, when Magnus alone was consul, the emperor Anastasius was found dead in his chamber on the ninth of July. Authors vary as to the circumstances of his death: some write, that a violent storm arising, the dread and terror with which he was seized, as being conscious to himself of many cruel and unjust murders, put an end to his life; others suppose him to have been killed by a flash of lightning. He died in the eighty-eighth year of his age, after having reigned twenty-seven years, and three months, wanting two or three days. No prince perhaps was ever more beloved in the beginning, nor more hated in the end of his reign. He gave at first several instances of generosity, good-nature, moderation, and application to public affairs, seeming to have nothing so much at heart as the welfare of his subjects. But he soon abandoned himself to all manner of wickedness, selling the publick offices, and sharing with the governors of provinces the spoils of the unhappy people, whom he suffered them to oppress with most enormous exactions. The ecclesiastic writers paint him in the blackest colours imaginable; but as he persecuted the catholics, and countenanced, to the utmost of his power, the Eutychians, they were perhaps so far prejudiced against him as to overlook the few good qualities, which other authors allow him, and take notice only of his vices.

Anastasius being dead, Justin, then praefectus praetorio, was by the soldiers of the household proclaimed emperor in his room. He was descended of an obscure and mean family in Thrace, having been in his youth employed in keeping cattle. He afterwards lifted himself among the troops that guarded Thrace; and having on several occasions given signal proofs of an extraordinary valor, and address, he was raised from the low station of a common soldier to the post of a tribune, and from that soon after to the office of praefectus praetorio, which he held when he was preferred to the empire. Evagrius writes, that Aman- tius, the deceased emperor's great chamberlain, having intrusted Justin with large sums to purchase the votes of the soldiery in favour of Theocritus, his intimate friend, Justin distributed the money in his own name; and having by that means secured the army to his interest, he was by them saluted

Saluted with the title of Augustus, as soon as the death of Anastasius was known. Thus Evagrius, whose account does not at all agree with what we read in the letters said to have been written by Justin himself to Hormida bishop of Rome soon after his promotion; whereas he tells him, that he had been preferred, contrary to his expectation, and against his will, to the imperial dignity. But by what means ever he attained the purple, he governed with great equity and moderation; and by his steady adherence to the orthodox faith, and prudent administration healed in great measure the divisions which had long rent the church, as well as the state, into factions and parties. He was scarce warm in his throne, when Amantius, Theocritus, and several of the deceased emperor’s relations, persons of great interest and authority in the empire, conspired against him; but the conspiracy being discovered by some who were privy to it, the chief authors of it, and among the rest Amantius and Theocritus, were publicly executed, to the great satisfaction of the people, who hated them as the avowed patrons of the Eutychians, and the chief promoters of the late persecution against the catholics. The following year 519, Justin being consul with Eutharic, the son-in-law of Theodoric, king of Italy, all the orthodox bishops, who had been banished by Anastasius, were by the emperor’s orders restored to their sees, and several synods assembled, in which the doctrine of the church was establishe, and that of Eutyches condemned. The following year, Vitalianus, of whom we have made mention above, was raised to the consulship with Rusticus, but was soon after dispatched in the palace by the emperor’s orders, upon his attempting to gain over some of the chief officers, with a design to depose Justin, and cause himself to be proclaimed emperor in his room. He had espoused the catholic cause in the reign of Anastasius; but his caballing against Justin, a zealous patron of the true faith, and his courting the Eutychians, convinced the world, that it was not merely on account of religion he had taken arms against his sovereign. The following year, Justinian, the emperor’s nephew, being consul with Valerius, Cabades, king of Persia, sent a solemn embassy to Justin, offering to conclude a lasting peace with him, provided he would adopt Cosroes, the Persian king’s youngest youngest son, whom, to the prejudice of his eldest son Caesus, he had declared his successor. This he looked upon as the only means of engaging the Roman emperor to espouse his cause, and of firmly establishing him in the kingdom. The proposal was received at first with great joy both by Justin and his nephew Justinian; but Proclus, the quaestor, a man of great integrity, and well skilled in the laws, demonstrating, that, in virtue of that adoption, Cosroes might claim the Roman empire as his inheritance, it was rejected; which so piqued Cavades, that he immediately entered Iberia, with a design to invade from thence the Roman territories. Gurgenes, king of the Iberians, had recourse to Justin, who dispatched a body of troops to his assistance, under the conduct of Sittas and the famous Belisarius, who was then but a youth, and served in the guards of Justinian, lately declared commander in chief of all the forces of the empire. Sittas and Belisarius broke into that part of Armenia which belonged to the Persians, and laid it waste; but being met by Narces and Aratius, they were by them put to flight, and obliged to retire into the Roman dominions. Narces and Aratius revolted soon after from the Persians, and served under Belisarius in Italy. The emperor, well pleased with the conduct of Belisarius gave him the command of the forces in Daras, on the frontiers of Persia. These things happened in the third consulship of Severinus Boëtius, and the first of Symmachus, who were succeeded in 523, by Maximus alone in the west, and he by Justin, the second time consul, and Opilio, during whose consulship we find nothing tranacted in the empire that deserves notice. In 525, when Probinus or Probus, and Philoxenus, were consuls, Justin, by an edict, deprived the Arians of all their churches in his dominions; which occasioned a misunderstanding between him and Theodoric, king of Italy, who was a zealous patron of the doctrine of Arius. But what relates to that prince, we reserve for the history of the Ostrogoths in Italy. The same year the city of Antioch was almost utterly overturned by an earthquake, and great numbers of the inhabitants buried, with their bishop Euphrasius, under the ruins. The cities of Epidamnus, Corinth, and Anazarbus in Cilicia, underwent the same fate, but were at a vast expense restored, as well as Antioch;

Antioch, to their former condition by the good-natured emperor, who was so affected with their misfortune, that putting off the purple, and laying aside the diadem, he appeared for several days in sack-cloth. In § 26, Olybrius alone was confus, and succeeded in that dignity by Mavortius, during whose confuship, Justinian, on the first of April, declared his nephew Justinian his partner in the empire. He was the son of Sabatius, by Bigleniza, the sister of Justin, called by the Romans Vigilantia. He was a native of Tauresium, but brought up at Bederina, the birth-place of his uncle Justin, both cities on the confines of Thrace and Illyricum; whence he is by some styled a Thracian, by others an Illyrian. He was sent, when a youth, by Justin, then commander in chief of the Roman army, as an hostage to Theodoric, king of Italy, who, upon the news of his uncle's preferment, suffered him to return to Constantinople, where he was immediately honoured with the title of nobilissimus, and upon the death of Vitalianus, raised to the chief command of the army in his room. Some authors write that Justinian, at the request of the senate, took him for his partner in the empire; whereas others pretend, that the senate were awed by threats and menaces. Be that as it will, it is certain that Justinian was this year declared emperor; and upon his entering the circus with the purple, and other ensigns of the imperial dignity, the populace received him with loud acclamations: he was then as Zonaras observes, in the forty-fifth year of his age. The emperor Justin died about four months after, that is, in the latter end of September, or the beginning of August, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, after having reigned nine years, one month, and some days. His death is generally ascribed to a wound received in battle many years before. He could neither read nor write, having been employed by his parents in keeping cattle, till he lifted himself in the army; but was nevertheless a man of extraordinary penetration, and uncommon address, in the management of the most difficult affairs, well skilled in the art of war, and in every respect equal to the high station to which he was raised.

Justinian, now sole master of the empire, made it his first and chief business to secure the frontiers towards Persia. With this view he ordered Belisarius, commander of the troops troops in Daras, to build a fort in the neighbourhood of Mindon, which might be as a curb upon the Persians, and prevent them from breaking into the empire on that side. Belisarius had no sooner begun the work, than Cabades, who still reigned in Persia, after having attempted in vain, by threats and menaces, to divert him from it, dispatched a body of troops against him. On the other hand, Justinian ordered the two brothers Curtzes and Buzes, who commanded the troops quartered in the neighbourhood of mount Libanus, to join Belisarius. But notwithstanding this reinforcement the Romans, in the battle which ensued, were utterly defeated, and great numbers of them taken prisoners, and among the rest Curtzes, to whose rash and imprudent conduct the defeat was chiefly owing. After this victory, the Persians, finding the fort abandoned by the Romans, levelled it with the ground. War being thus declared, Justinian appointed Belisarius, general of the east, ordering him to make an inroad into Persia. Perozes, the Persian general, met him at the head of a very numerous and powerful army in the neighbourhood of Daras; whereupon a battle ensuing, the Persians were defeated, with the loss of five thousand men. As the Persians fled in great confusion, the Romans would, in all likelihood, have cut most of them in pieces, had not Belisarius, apprehending they might rally, and return to the charge, founded a retreat. The like successes attended the Roman armies in Armenia, where Mermereos, who commanded another army, consisting of Perfarmanians, Sunites and Hunns, was surprized and defeated by Dorotheus, the Roman governor of Armenia, and Sittas, general of the forces quartered in that province. Mermereos, being put to flight, the Romans made themselves masters of several strong holds in Perfarmania, and among the rest of Pharamgium, which commanded the royal mines, and was betrayed to them by one Simeon. About this time, Narces and Aratius, two brothers, who, in the latter end of Justin's reign, had commanded the Persian army in Armenia and gained some advantages over Belisarius and Sittas, as we have related above, revolted from the Persians, came over to the Romans, who were now masters of the greatest part of Perfarmania, their native country. Narces, the emperor's questor in those parts, who was likewise a Perfarmanian, received them with extraordinary marks of kindness and esteem, making them rich presents.

presents in the emperor's name, which encouraged their younger brother, by name Ibaac, to follow their example, after having held a private correspondence with the Romans, till he found an opportunity of delivering up to them a strong-hold in the territory of Theodosiopeolis, named Bolus. Justinian, notwithstanding the advantages gained by his troops in Mesopotamia and Armenia, dispatched embassadors to Cabades, with proposals for an accommodation; but the treaty being soon broken off, the Persians, early in the spring of 530, invaded the Roman territories under the command of Azarethes, who was joined by an incredible number of Saracens, commanded by Alamundarus their king, who, as he was a person of great experience in war, and well acquainted with the country, advised the Persians to break into the Roman territories, not by the way of Mesopotamia and Ostrhoene, as they usually did, but to march directly into Syria, which country they might lay waste, and plunder Antioch itself, before the army in Mesopotamia could receive the least intelligence of their motions. The Persian generals approving the scheme, the army began to march; but Belisarius, apprised of their design, flew with a strong detachment to the frontiers of Syria, where the Persians finding him, to their great surprize, ready to dispute their passage, they resolved to proceed no farther; but rather to retire, thinking it dangerous to hazard a battle. On the other hand, Belisarius, judging it imprudent to provoke a flying enemy, far superior to him in numbers, was for suffering them to retire unmolested. But his men upbraiding him with cowardice, he led them on against the enemy, by whom, after a most obstinate dispute, they were put to the rout, Belisarius, with a small body of horse, who were ashamed to forfear him, keeping the field, and by that means preventing the enemy from pursuing the fugitives. The next day the Persians, who had lost in the engagement the flower of their army, not thinking it advisable to venture a second battle, retired in good order, the Romans, who were greatly disheartened by their defeat, not daring to attack them. The following year 531, Justinian being desirous of concluding a peace with the Persians, that he might be at leisure to make war upon the Vandals, and reunite to the empire the many rich provinces they had seized, dispatched Hermogenes to the king of Persia, with very reasonable proposals. But Cabades, instead of hearkening to them, sent early in the spring a fresh army into Mesopotamia.

potamia under the command of Chanaranges, Aspendes, and Mermeroes, who, after having ravaged the country, putting all to fire and sword, sat down before Martyropolis, a city about thirty miles north of Amida on the river Nimphius, which parted the Persian and Roman dominions. The place was no ways in a condition to maintain a siege, being destitute both of soldiers and provisions. The emperor had recalled Belisarius to advise with him about a war with the Vandals, on which he was chiefly bent; and Sittas, who had succeed in the command of the troops in the east, had not sufficient strength to attempt the relief of the place. While affairs stood thus, the emperor was informed, that a numerous army of Maflagetes was marching into Persia, with a design to invade from thence the Roman dominions. This intelligence Justinian turned to his great advantage, by persuading the Persian defeter, who brought it, to spread a report in the army before Martyropolis, that the Maflagetes were in the Roman pay, and their true design was to fall upon the Persians, and raise the siege. This report, with the news that was soon after brought of the death of Cabades, inclined the Persian generals to hearken to the overtures that were made by Sittas and Hermogones, with whom they first concluded a truce, retiring from before Martyropolis, and soon after a peace upon the following terms: 1. That the Roman emperor should pay to Cosphoes, who had succeeded his father Cabades, a thousand pounds weight of gold. 2. That both princes should restore the places they had taken during the war. 3. That the commander of the Roman forces in Mesopotamia should no longer reside at Daras, but at Constantinople, as he had formerly done. 4. That the Iberians, who had sided with the Romans, should be at liberty to return to their own country, or stay at Constantinople. Upon these terms the Romans and Persians concluded an eternal peace, as it was styled, in 532, the sixth year of Justinian's reign, which, as it was without confuds, as the preceding year had been, is thus marked in the sactilis; The second year after the confullsion of Lampadius and Orestes. About this time happened at Constantinople the greatest tumult we find mentioned in history. It began amongst the different factions in the circus, but ended in an open rebellion, the multitude, highly dissatisfied with the conduct of

John the praefectus praetorio, and of Trebonianus, then quaestor, forcing Hypatius, nephew to the emperor Anastasius, to accept the empire, and proclaiming him with great solemnity in the forum. As the two above-mentioned ministers were greatly abhorred by the people, on account of their avarice, the emperor immediately discharged them, hoping by that means to appease the tumult; but the populace growing more outrageous, and most of the senators joining the rebellious multitude, the emperor, alarmed and disheartened, would have abandoned the city, and made his escape by sea, had not the empress Theodora, with a manly courage, persuaded him to part with his life, rather than with the empire, by seasonably putting him in mind of the old saying, How glorious a sepulchre is a kingdom! Justinian, thus encouraged, resolved to continue in the palace, and, with the affiance of the few senators who had not yet abandoned him, defend it to the last. In the mean time the rebels, having attempted in vain to force the gates, carried Hypatius in triumph to the circus; where while he was beholding the sports from the imperial throne, among the shouts and acclamations of the people, Belisarius, who had been recalled from Persia, entering the city with a considerable body of troops under his command, and apprized of the usurpation of Hypatius, marched straight to the circus, fell sword in hand upon the disarmed multitude; and being seasonably joined by Mundus, governor of Illyricum, at the head of a band of Heruli, cut above thirty thousand of them in pieces, took Hypatius the usurper, and Pompeius, another of the nephews of Anastasius, prisoners, and carried them to the emperor, by whose orders they were both beheaded, and their bodies cast into the sea. Their estates were confiscated, and likewise the estates of such senators as had joined them; but the emperor caused great part of their lands and effects to be afterwards restored, together with their honours and dignities, to their children. Marcellinus supposes that this tumult was raised by Hypatius, Pompeius, and Probus, all three nephews to the emperor Anastasius, each of them setting up for himself; by which means the city was rent into factions, an incredible number of citizens was murdered, and many stately buildings laid in ashes. The tumult being thus appeased, and a peace concluded with the king of Persia, the emperor applied his thoughts wholly to the war in Africa, which he had been long bent upon. But of the wars that were by the renowned Belisarius

Ifarius carried on with amazing success in the reign of Justinian, first with the Vandals in Africa, and afterwards with the Goths in Italy, we shall speak at length hereafter. These two wars lasted from 533, to 541, a year remarkable for the triumphant return of Belisarius to Constantinople, and no less on account of its being the last that is marked by consuls, time being thenceforth computed, not by consuls, the consuls were still created for some time, but by the years of the emperor's reign. During the war with the Goths in Italy, the Huns, probably stirred up by them, passed the Danube, and entered Illyricum, laid waste the whole country, took above thirty-two castles, destroyed Cassandria, and returned home un molested, carrying with them an immense booty, and an hundred and twenty thousand captives. At the same time the Armenians, shaking off the Roman yoke, gained some advantages over the emperor's forces in that province; which, with a groundless report spread abroad, that the emperor, grown jealous of Belisarius, would no longer trust him with the command of his armies, encouraged Cosroes to invade the Roman dominions with a very powerful army, in defiance of the treaty solemnly concluded a few years before. Buzes, who commanded in the east, instead of assembling his forces, and providing for the defence of the provinces, disappeared all on a sudden, and retired, no one knew whither, leaving the enemy at full liberty to plunder the country at their pleasure. As Cosroes met with no opposition, he bent his march to Syria; and having taken and plundered Berzea, Hierapolis, and several other cities, he laid siege to Antioch itself, which he soon mastered, and gave up to be plundered by his soldiers, who, without distinction of sex or age, put all they met to the sword. The king himself seized on all the gold and silver vessels belonging to the great church; caused all the valuable statues, pictures, and other pieces of art, to be taken down, and conveyed into Persia: and having thus stripped the proud metropolis of the east of all its wealth and ornaments, he ordered his men to set fire to it, and lay it in ashes; which was done accordingly, none of the buildings, even without the walls, being spared by the outrageous and insulting enemy. Thus perished the most wealthy, beautiful and populous city of the east. Such of the inhabitants as escaped the common slaughter, and afterwards fell into the enemy's hands, were carried into captivity, and held in Persia to the highest bidder. Justinian, upon the first first news of the Persians entering the Roman territories, had dispatched embassadors to Cosroes, to put him in mind of the articles of the treaty concluded a few years before. The king alledged several frivolous pretences for the hostilities he had committed, in order to lay the whole blame on Justinian; but after he had wasted Syria, and enriched himself and his army with the spoils of that province, and its wealthy metropolis, he began to hearken to an accommodation; and accordingly a peace was concluded on the following terms: 1. That the Romans should, within two months, pay to the Persian king five thousand pounds weight of gold, and an annual pension of five hundred. 2. That the Persians should relinquish all claim to Daras, and maintain a body of troops to guard the Caspian gates, and prevent the barbarians from breaking into the empire. 3. That, upon the payment of the above-mentioned sum Cosroes should immediately withdraw his troops out of the Roman territories. The treaty being signed, and the stipulated sum paid, Cosroes began to march back; but in his retreat plundered, as if the war was still continued, the cities of Apamea and Chalcis; and crossing the Euphrates, laid waste Mesopotamia, carrying with him from thence an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. Hereupon Justinian, now well apprised, that with Cosroes no treaties were binding, resolved to pursue the war with the utmost vigour, and with that design sent for Belisarius, then employed against the Goths in Italy, and, upon his arrival at Constantinople, appointed him general against the Persians. While that brave commander was making the necessary preparations to take the field early in the spring of the ensuing year 542, the Lazians, no longer able to brook the arbitrary and tyrannical conduct of the commander of the Roman troops in that country, revolted to the Persians, and delivered up to them all their castles and strong-holds. Lazica, formerly part of Colchis, lay between the Euxine and Caspian seas, and was governed by its own kings, who were under the protection of the Roman emperor, and received at his hands the ensigns of royalty. Their present king’s name was Gobazes, who had served the Romans with great fidelity, and continued attached to their interest, till Joannes Tzibus, commander of the Roman troops quartered in his dominions to awe the neighbouring Iberians, by erecting a fort, as a curb upon the Lazians, and exacting exorbitant contributions for the pay-ment.

ment of his soldiers, forced, in a manner, both the prince and his subjects, tho' otherwise well affected to the empire, to have recourse to the king of Persia, who, upon the first invitation, entered their country, and being assisted by the natives, drove out the Romans, and placed every-where Persian garrisons in their room. In the mean time Belisarius, not apprised of the revolt of the Lazians, entered Persia at the head of a powerful army; and having made himself master of a strong-hold called Silifranum, laid waste Assyria; but was obliged, by the violent heats, and the distemper that began to rage in his army, to return, before the end of the summer, into the Roman dominions. Cothenes was no sooner informed of the invasion of Belisarius, than quitting Lazica, he hastened into Assyria; but being informed on his march, that the Romans were retired, he put his army into winter quarters, and withdrew to Ctesiphon. The spring following, he invaded anew the Roman territories, bending his march through Comagena, with a design to enter Palestine, and enrich himself with the spoils of that fertile and wealthy province. Belisarius, who was returned to Constantinople, upon the first news of this invasion, flew to Europus on the Euphrates, and there drew together what forces he could some time after Cothenes had passed that river; which so alarmed the Persian king, dreading an enemy at his back, that he thought it advisable to drop his intended expedition into Palestine, and return to his own dominions, before Belisarius was in a condition to cut off his retreat. The emperor being soon after obliged to recall Belisarius, and send him into Italy, where the Goths had gained great advantages over the Romans as we shall relate hereafter, Cothenes resolved once more to invade the Roman territories, notwithstanding the dreadful plague that raged in Persia, being encouraged thereunto by the magi, and by a shameful overthrow of thirty thousand Romans, who, attempting to break into Perfarmania, had been defeated by four thousand Persians. Upon this success he invaded Mesopotamia, and sat down before Edessa; but not being able to master the place, after several unsuccessful attempts, he agreed to raise the siege, and soon after concluded a truce for five years, upon the emperor's paying him two thousand pounds weight of gold, and sending him a celebrated physician, by name Tribunus, who had formerly cured him of a dangerous distemper. Not long after the conclusion of the truce, Cothenes, hoses, observing the Lazians no-ways pleased with their late change, and apprehending they would soon revolt from him to the Romans, resolved to prevent a second revolution, by causing Gabazes their king to be murdered, and transplanting the natives into Persia, and populating the country, which opened him a passage into the Euxine sea, with Persians, and other nations well affected to his interest. But his design being discovered to Gabazes, by those who were to put it in execution, that prince had recourse, in the most submissive manner imaginable, to Justinian, who, forgetting his past conduct, received him anew under his protection, and, without loss of time, dispatched eight thousand men, under the command of Dagistäus, to his assistance, who being joined by a numerous body of Lazians, laid siege to Petra, one of the strongest places of Lazica, defended by a Persian garrison, and stored with all manner of provisions. Cosroes, alarmed at this sudden revolution, sent a powerful army, under the conduct of Mermeroes, to the relief of the place. At their approach, Dagistäus, who was a young unexperienced officer, abandoning his camp and baggage, fled in the utmost consternation towards the Phasis. Upon his retreat, Mermeroes advanced to Petra, the garrison of which place, consisting at first of fifteen hundred men, was now reduced to three hundred and fifty, of whom an hundred and fifty were quite disarmed, and unfit for service. Mermeroes repaired with great expedition the breaches in the walls, garrisoned the place with three thousand men, and returned with the rest of his army into Persarmenia, not thinking it safe to continue in Lazica; whither, he was informed, fresh forces were marching, under the conduct of Recithangus, by birth a Thracian, who had served in the army from his childhood, and was deemed one of the best commanders of his age. At his departure he left a body of five thousand men encamped on the banks of the Phasis, to watch the motions of the Romans and Lazians. Of these Gabazes and Dagistäus surprized one thousand, as they were straggling about in quest of booty; and having cut them all off to a man, fell unexpectedly in the dead of the night upon the main body, put most of them to the sword, and obliged the rest to save themselves by a precipitious flight. The Romans made themselves masters of their camp, in which, besides their ensigns and baggage, they found a great quantity of arms, and a considerable number of mules and horses. They pursued the fugitives to the confines of Iberia, intercepted several other parties that were conveying provisions into Petra; and having having blocked up all the avenues leading to the place, returned with their booty and captives. Cosroes was no sooner informed of this overthrow, than he dispatched Corianes, with an army of Alans as well as Persians, into Lazica. But Corianes was attended with no better success than the other Persian generals; for being met on the banks of the Hippus in Colchis by Gubazes and Dagistæus, his army was, after a most obstinate dispute, utterly defeated, and he himself slain 1. These advantages were chiefly owing to the courage and conduct of Gubazes, at whose request Dagistæus, who had shamefully abandoned the siege of Petra, as we have related above, was recalled, and Bessas, an officer of great experience appointed to command in his room. He immediately invested Petra, and in the end reduced that important place, tho' defended by the Persian garrison with such obstinacy, as favoured of madness and despair. Bessas ordered Petra to be disimanted; and leaving only twelve thousand men in Lazica, viz. three thousand in Archæopolis the metropolis, and nine thousand encamped on the banks of the Phasis, under the command of Odonachus, he retired with the rest into Armenia, his own government. Upon his retreat, Mermereos entered Lazica; and having first obliged Odonachus to withdraw into the Roman territories, he laid siege to Archæopolis, which however he was forced to raise, having, in several assaults, being repulsed with great loss by the garrison. Notwithstanding these hostilities, the Persian embassadors, who had been sent to Constantinople the preceding year, continued still there, and soon after the reduction of Petra, concluded a five years truce with the emperor upon his paying to the Persian king an immense sum, which raised great complaints among the people, who were rather for pursuing the war, than submitting to pay a tribute, as they styled it, to the king of Persia 1. But Justinian was glad to come to an agreement with the Persians upon any terms, that he might not be diverted from pursuing the advantages he had gained over the Goths in Italy, of which we shall speak in a more proper place. The truce was no sooner expired, than the Persians, invading anew Lazica, took by stratagem the strong castle of Telephus; and then falling upon the Roman army, which lay encamped at a small distance, put them to flight at the first onset. Gubazes, king of Lazica, provoked at the cowardice of the Roman generals, acquainted the emperor with their shameful behaviour, which incensed them to such a degree, that they agreed to dispatch him: and accordingly, having accused him at court of treachery, as if he privately corresponded with the Persians, by wrestling the instructions sent them by the emperor, they murdered him, giving out, that he designed to betray them, and deliver all the Romans into the hands of the Persians. The Lazicans, highly incensed against the authors of his death, would have revolted from the Romans, and joined the Persians, had not Juffinian appeased them, by causing all those, who were any-ways accessary to the murder, to be publicly executed, and the deceased king's brother to be immediately proclaimed in his room. In the mean time the Persians, to the number of sixty thousand men advanced, under the command of Nachoragan, into Lazica, and laid siege to Phasis, but Juffin, who commanded the Roman troops, falling upon him unexpectedly, cut twelve thousand of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest, with their general, to save themselves within the Persian dominions. This defeat so disheartened Cofhros, that he immediately dispatched embassadors to Constantinople to sue for a peace, which was accordingly concluded upon terms equally honourable to both princes. The public rejoicings for the peace with Persia, after such a long and destructive war were disturbed by a dreadful earthquake, which continued for several days, and overturned a great many flately edifices, and several churches, in which perished an incredible number of people, who had crowded to them during the public confusion. About the same time the plague, which had raged a few years before with great fury all over the empire, broke out anew at Constantinople, and swept off many thousands of people. The same year 558, the Hunns, passing the Danube in the depth of winter, marched in two bodies directly for Constantinople, and laying waste the countries through which they passed, came, without meeting with the least opposition, within an hundred and fifty furlongs of the city. But Beliarus, tho' now weakened by old age to such a degree, that he was scarce able to hold a shield, or brandish a sword, marching out against them with a handful of men, put them to flight, and delivered both the emperor and the city from the dangers that threatened them. However the emperor, to prevent them from breaking anew into the Roman dominions, agreed to pay them an annual pension, upon their promising to defend the empire against all other barbarians, and to serve, when required in the Roman armies. This was the last exploit performed by Belisarius, who upon his return to Constantinople, was disgraced, stripped of all his employments, and confined to his house. Agathias ascribes his disgrace to the malice of his enemies at court, who, envying him the great reputation he had deservedly acquired, and the favour he was in with the people, persuaded the emperor, whose jealousy encreased with his years, that Belisarius aspired at the sovereignty; that the people, who preferred him to the most renowned heroes of antiquity, were all to a man ready to second him in his ambitious views; that the soldiery were still more attached to him than the people, &c. Upon these malicious and groundless insinuations, the emperor, forgetting the past services of the most deserving of all his subjects, of one who had been the bulwark of the empire, and the restorer of the antient military discipline, recalled him, according to Agathias, without so much as suffering him to pursue his late victory over the Huns; and upon his arrival at Constantinople, which he desired to enter in triumph, confined him to his house, after having, with the utmost ingratitude, devested him of all his authority, honours and employments. The more modern writers pretend, that Justinian caused his eyes to be put out, and reduced him to such poverty, that he was forced to beg from door to door in the streets of Constantinople. But the antient authors assure us, that the year following, the emperor, fully convinced of his innocence, restored him to all his employments, which he enjoyed, without any farther disgrace, to his death. About this time, three of the emperor’s chief officers, viz. Ablavius, Marcellus, and Sergius, conspired against him, upon what provocation we know not; but the plot being discovered by some persons, whom Ablavius had attempted to draw into it, the conspirators were feizted, before they could put their design in execution. Marcellus, after having defended himself with great resolution against the officers who were sent to arrest him, stabbed himself with his own sword. Ablavius and Sergius were publicly executed, and the rest of the conspirators conspirators banished. The emperor escaped the conspiracy; but did not long outlive it, being soon after carried off by a natural, but sudden, death, in the thirty-ninth year of his reign, that is, according to the most probable opinion, after he had reigned thirty-eight years, and seven months. His public works, the wars which were, in his reign, carried on with surprising success by his two renowned generals Belisarius and Narres, and the new form which he gave the Roman jurisprudence, have deservedly procured him the surname of Great. Of his public buildings the reader will find a distinct account in Procopius, who assures us, that there was scarce a city in his dominions, in which he did not erect some stately edifice, nor a province, wherein he did not build or repair some city, fort, or cattle. In war he recovered, and reunited to the empire, Africa and Italy, after they had been long held, the former by the Vandals, and the latter by the Goths, as we shall relate in the history of these two nations. In peace he signalized his reign by many excellent laws, but chiefly by the famous code, called from him the Justinian code. In the very beginning of his reign he published an edict, directed to the senate of Constantinople, for the compiling of a new code. For this work he chose the most famous and learned men of his age, at the head of whom was the celebrated civilian Tribonianus, who were to collect into one volume all the constitutions contained in the Gregorian, Hermogenian, and Theodosian codes, and join to them such as had been published by Theodosius the younger, and the other lawful emperors his successors, down to Justinian himself. Whatever in those laws seemed superfluous was to be retrenched, with the prefaces; their sense and meaning was to be rendered more clear, and the names of the princes who published them, the place, the time and the persons to whom they were directed, to be prefixed to each constitution. In this form and method was the new code compiled in a little more than a year; so that it was published in the beginning of the third year of Justinian’s reign, with an edict, commanding that code alone to be quoted by pleaders at the bar, and declaring all laws that were not contained in it to be of no force or authority. It was divided into twelve books, and contained the constitutions of fifty-four emperors, from Adrian to Justinian; whereas the Theodosian code began with Constantine the Great. Justinian, not satisfied with the code alone, undertook soon after a more noble, and far more difficult work, which was to collect, and digest into order, the opinions and answers of all the celebrated civilians, their remarks and comments on the Roman laws, especially on the edictum perpetuum, their different treaties, &c. in all above two thousand volumes. This hard and crabbed task was completed in the space of three years by Tribonianus and sixteen other able civilians, and called by the Latins digesta, because the opinions of the ancient civilians were there digested into order, and by the Greeks pandectae, as containing all the antient jurisprudence.

When this great work was near completed, Justinian ordered Tribonianus, Theophilus and Dorodeus to compile, for the benefit of the youth, the institutes, or first principles of the law, which were published about a month before the pandectae. As many things were found to be wanting in the code, and Justinian himself had, after the publication of it, enacted several laws, in the eighth year of his reign, that is in 534, he ordered a second code to be made, in which were inserted all the constitutions, about two hundred in number, which he had enacted since the publication of the first, and several others contained in the former code, either corrected or annulled. This second code, styled de repetita praecognitione, was published five years after the first, and at the same time a decree, declaring the first to be of no force, and forbidding any constitutions or laws to be quoted in the courts of justice, that were not contained in the new code de repetita praecognitione. Thus was the first code, in a manner, abolished, and all authority given to the second, viz. to that which has reached our times, divided into twelve books, and seven hundred and seventy-six articles, containing the constitutions of fifty-four emperors, from Adrian to Justinian. After the publication of the institutes, pandects and code, Justinian enacted several laws, which were joined together in a distinct volume, called the novelle constitutions. These were published from time to time by Justinian; not in the Latin, excepting some few, but in the Greek tongue, tongue, and collected into one volume after his death. Justinian is not only commended for his indefatigable care in reforming the Roman jurisprudence, but for his piety, prudence, justice, clemency, and every virtue becoming a person in his high station. As for the secret history, filled with most bitter invectives against Justinian, and the empress Theodora, it is, by the ablest critics, looked upon as not the work of Procopius, but as a scandalous libel fathered upon that writer. It is true, he loaded the people with heavy taxes; but the money thus raised was neither hoarded up by him, nor applied to the gratification of any unlawful passion, but employed in paying his numerous forces; in carrying on the many wars in which he was engaged; in repairing the public buildings, and embellishing with stately edifices the cities of the empire. In the latter end of his reign, he seemed to countenance the Eutychians, no doubt, at the instigation of the empress Theodora, who held their doctrine; which has given occasion to many bitter invectives against her memory. Justinian may deservedly be called the last Roman emperor; for in his reign the majesty of the empire seemed to revive, but soon vanished again, as we shall see in the sequel of the present history.

C H A P. XXXIII.

The Roman history, from the death of Justinian the Great, to the deposing of Irene, and the promotion of Nicephorus.

Justinian dying without issue, Justin, the son of his sister Vigilantia, whom, in his life-time, he had designed for his successor, was by the senate proclaimed emperor, and crowned, with great solemnity, by John patriarch of Constantinople. As the people were highly displeased with the decafed emperor, for abolishing the office of consul, the only mark they had left of their antient liberty, Justin promished to restore it; and accordingly took upon him that title on the first of January of the year 566, distributing on that occasion large sums amongst the people, according to the ancient custom. During his consulship, the Avari, or Abari, a Scythian nation, sent embassadors to demand the pension formerly paid them by Justinian; but the Mausagetes, who at this time began to be called Turks, and inhabited the country bordering on the Tanais to the east, pressing the emperor not to comply with the demands of the Avari, their declared enemies, nor take them under his protection, Justin not only refused to pay them the usual pension, but threatened to make war upon them, if they offered to disturb the peace of the empire. The courage and resolution which the emperor exerted on this occasion, gave so great satisfation to the people, that they began to prefer him even to Justinian, who, they said, had, with the spoils of his own subjects, enriched the barbarians, the avowed enemies of the empire. But Justin soon forfeited, by his cruelty, and infatiable avarice, the good opinion which the people entertained of him; for the following year, he caused Justin his kinsman to be seized in his house, and conveyed to Alexandria, where he was, by his orders, inhumanly murdered, for no other crime but because he was beloved by the people. The empref Sophia, niece to the late empress Theodora, a woman of a cruel, haughty and suspicious temper, is thought to have put him upon this, and several other bloody executions.6

The following year 569, is remarkable for the irruption of the Lombards into Italy, where they founded a new kingdom, which continued for the space of two hundred years, and upwards. But of their wars with Justin and his succes-fors, till the total reduction of Italy, and of the kings of the Lombards who reigned there from Alboin to Desiderius, taken prisoner by Charlemagne, we shall speak at length hereafter. Italy was anew dismembered from the empire, and great part of it lost in the reign of Justin; but some amends was made for so great a loss by the acquisition of Persarmenia, the inhabitants, who were cruelly persected by the Persians, on account of the chrisitian religion, which they professed, flaking off the yoke, and recurring to the protection of the Roman emperor, to whom they submitted, upon certain articles sworn to by both parties. Cofrohoes, informed of their revolt, dispatched embassadors to Constanti-noble, to divert the emperor from espousing their cause, which, he said, was contrary to the treaties subsisting between the two empires. Justin, despising their menaces, resolutely answered, that the truce was expired, and that he could not deny his protection and assistance to a brave nation, who, professing the same religion with himself, were on that score cruelly persecuted and oppressed. Hereupon Cochos, having with incredible expedition raised a powerful army, divided it into two bodies, ordering the one to march directly into Syria, under the conduct of Artabanus, while he himself with the other invaded Mesopotamia. Justin in the mean time, utterly neglecting the necessary preparations to oppose so formidable an enemy, wallowed in his usual pleasures, till news was brought him, that the Persians had already broken into his dominions. He then dispatched Martianus, captain of his guards, into the east, but without men, money or arms; so that he was forced to inroll such vagabonds, thieves and robbers, as offered themselves to him in his way. With these, however, he surprised and put to flight a small body of Persians, and elated with that advantage, however inconsiderable, he had the confidence to sit down before Nisibis, the inhabitants, who scorned to shut their gates, rallying him from the walls, and asking him, Whether he had been placed there with his men to watch sheep, or besiege the town? The emperor nevertheless, highly incensed against him for protracting, as he said, the siege, deprived him of his command, and sent one Aecius to succeed him; which so displeased the officers, who were well acquainted with the haughty and imperious temper of Aecius, that they abandoned the siege, and retired into Syria. In the mean time Artabanus, having passed the Euphrates, advanced to Antioch; but not being able to reduce that metropolis, he sat down before Heraclea, which he took by assault, and laid in ashes. From Heraclea, he marched to Apamea, which submitted upon terms; but was nevertheless by his orders pillaged and burnt. After the reduction of Apamea, he joined the king, who had undertaken the siege of Daras; which being now carried on with fresh vigour, the garrison was in the end obliged to submit, after having held out with great resolution and intrepidity for the space of five months. The loss of Daras, a place of the utmost importance, and the wonderful progress of the Lombards in Italy, affected the emperor, now convinced of his imprudent conduct, to such a degree, that he was seized with a kind a kind of madness, which rendering him altogether incapable of managing the public affairs, Tiberius, by birth a Thracian, who had discharged, with great reputation, the first employments in the state, was, by the advice and interest of the empress Sophia, with the unanimous consent of the senate, appointed to govern in his room. Tiberius immediately dispatched Trajan, a person highly esteemed for his wisdom and address, to Cosshoes, with a letter from the empress Sophia, wherein she acquainted him with the misfortune that had befallen her husband, laid before him the deplorable state of the empire, and conjured him by all that was sacred, to forbear insulting an helpless woman, or invading a weak and defenceless state. She ended her letter by putting him in mind of the humanity formerly shewn him by the emperor Justinian, who, upon his being feized with a dangerous malady, sent the best physicians of the empire to attend him. Cosshoes was so sensibly affected with this letter, that looking upon it as highly ungenerous to pursue the war, he immediately contented to a truce for three years. The following year 573, the emperor, who continued still indigotated, by the advice of the empress Sophia, raised Tiberius to the dignity of Caesar, resigning to him the whole management of affairs, and receiving for himself the bare name of emperor. Tiberius’s first care was to put himself in a condition of making head against the Persians, who, he apprehended, would not fail to invade the empire, as soon as the truce was expired. With this view he raised a very numerous and formidable army; but at the same time endeavoured, by means of his embassadors, to change the truce into a lasting peace, and to establish a good understanding between the two empires. Cosshoes, deaf to all proposals, would not so much as admit the embassadors to his presence, being bent upon recovering Perarmenia; which accordingly he over-ran upon the expiration of the truce, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties, and was already marching to Cappadocia, with a design to besiege Cæsarœa, the metropolis of that province; but Justinian, the brother of Justin, who had been basely murdered at Alexandria, as we have related above, meeting him at the head of a numerous army, obliged him to venture an engagement, in which great numbers of his troops were cut in pieces, and the rest forced to save themselves by a precipitous precipitous and disorderly flight. Cosroes was so grieved for this overthrow, that he fell sick, and died, after a long and glorious reign of forty-eight years. Justinian in the mean time, entering Persia with his victorious army, continued there, putting all to fire and sword, till the latter end of June, when he returned in triumph to the Roman territories. The following year, the emperor Justin died after having reigned sixteen years, nine months, and some days. He is painted by all the writers of that age as a voluptuous prince, so addicted to his pleasures, as utterly to neglect public affairs; whence the state is said to have suffered no less from his inacitivity and indolence, than from the tyranny and cruelty of any of his predecessors. Upon his death, Tiberius, who had for some years governed the empire with an absolute sway, was by the senate and people declared emperor. The new prince immediately conferred the title of Augusta upon Anastatia, whom he owned for his wife, to the extreme disappointment of Sophia, who, having greatly contributed to his preferment, upon a presumption that he would marry her, grew his implacable enemy, when she found him married to another, and attempted to raise Justinian to the empire. But the plot being seasonably discovered, the emperor caused all her treasures to be seized, which was the only punishment inflicted upon her; and depriving Justinian of the command of the army in the east, sent Mauritius to succeed him. Mauritius was descended from an ancient Roman family; but born in Arephius, a city of Cappadocia, had served in the army from his infancy, and was no less esteemed for his exemplary piety, and attachment to the orthodox faith, than for his courage and experience in war. Upon his arrival in the east, he found Hormidla, who had succeeded Cosroes in the kingdom of Persia, obstinately bent upon war, and deaf to the advantageous proposals offered him by the emperor. Hereupon, having drawn together his forces, he marched with incredible expedition to the confines of Persia, and falling unexpectedly upon the Persian army, commanded by the king in person, gave them a total overthrow, took their camp, with all the royal plate and treasure, which he immediately sent to Constantinople, and made an incredible number of prisoners, who were likewise sent to the emperor, by whose orders they were richly cloathed.

the and suffered to return to Persia, Tiberius hoping, by that generous behaviour, to incline the young prince to an accommodation. But Hormifida, determined to pursue the war at all events, dispatched his two generals, Tamochosfores and Aduasmanes, to the borders, at the head of the most numerous army that had been seen for many years in Persia. Mauritius, however, according to the succinct and confused account which Evagrius gives us of this war, gained a complete victory over them, dispersed their numerous forces, took several castles, strong-holds, and towns, enriched his army with an immense booty, and made such numbers of captives, as were sufficient to people the islands and countries that had been long uninhabited, and to form armies against other nations at enmity with the empire. Upon his return to court, he was received with the greatest demonstrations imaginable of esteem and affection by Tiberius, who soon after gave him in marriage his daughter Constantina, and raised him to the dignity of Caesar; which was declaring him his successor. In the mean time, Hormifida, quite disheartened after the great losses he had sustained, sent embassadors to sue for peace, which was in the end concluded; but not long observed by that faithless prince, as we shall see anon. The year following the Avari or Abari, dwelling on the banks of the Danube, made a sudden invagination into Pannonia, under the conduct of their chagan, or king, and made themselves masters of Sirmium. The chagan, elated with this success, dispatched embassadors to Constantinople to demand the annual pension, which the emperor had neglected to pay the year before, and besides an immense sum by way of interest. But Tiberius, highly provoked at the arrogance of the embassadors, instead of complying with their exorbitant demands, ordered his troops to take the field. The Avari, not caring to venture an engagement, retired beyond the Danube, watching an opportunity of invading anew the Roman territories. The year following, that is, according to the most probable opinion, in 536, died the emperor Tiberius, after having reigned four years alone, and three years and eleven months with Justin. All the antients speak of him as a prince of extraordinary abilities, and one who proved a true father to his people. Some time before his death, he had caused Mauritius to be declared emperor, in the presence fence of John the patriarch of Constantinople, of all the nobility and the chief citizens, as a person the best qualified in the whole empire for that high station. Hormida, king of Persia, no sooner heard of the death of Tiberius, than he broke into the empire at the head of a numerous and powerful army, pretending that the peace he had lately concluded with Tiberius was no longer binding. Against him the emperor dispatched one John a Thracian, who at first gained some small advantages over the enemy; but being soon after defeated, he was recalled, and Philippicus, who had married the emperor’s sister, sent in his room. The new general was attended with better success; for having engaged the Persians, who, encouraged by the predictions of their magi, and confiding in their numbers, advanced to the battle as to a certain triumph, he obliged them to retire with great loss to their camp. The next morning the Persians renewed the fight, but were again defeated with a far greater loss than they had sustained the day before. After this victory, Philippicus detached Heraclius, his lieutenant, with part of his army, ordering them to enter and lay waste the enemy’s country. The Persian general, named from his office Car-dariga, being informed by some defectors that the Roman army was divided, rallied his forces; and falling in the dead of the night upon Philippicus, put him to flight, and took a great number of prisoners. Heraclius, in the mean time, having passed the Tigris, laid waste the country far and wide, made himself master of several strong-holds, and then returned, loaded with booty, to Philippicus, who was drawing all his forces together with a design to retrieve the reputation of the Roman arms with some remarkable exploit. But in the mean time the emperor, being informed of his late misconduct, ordered him to resign the command of the army to Priscus, and return to Constantinople. Priscus was an officer of great courage and experience; but as he was universally abhorred by the soldiery, on account of his severity and imperious temper, a few days after his arrival, they rose up in a general mutiny against him, plundered his tent, and would have cut him in pieces, had he not saved himself by a timely flight, and taken refuge in the neighbouring city of Edessa. Upon his retreat the mutineers obliged Germanus, governor of Phoenicia, to take upon him the command of the army, which he had not held long, before the emperor, informed of the mutiny, sent Philippicus again into the east to bring them back to their

their duty. Germanus was for resigning the command to him; but the mutinous soldiery openly declaring they would obey no other leader, he was forced, both against his own will and the emperor’s, whom he was unwilling to disoblige, to continue in the post to which they had raised him. In the mean time, the Persians, taking advantage of these disturbances, broke into the empire, destroying everything with fire and sword. But Germanus, marching against them, engaged them, according to Evagrius, with such success, that scarce one was left alive to carry the news of their defeat into Persia. Not long after this victory, the mutiny was at length appeased, after it had lasted a year and upwards, by Gregory, bishop of Antioch, a person greatly beloved and revered by the soldiery for the sanctity of his life, and the kindness he had on several occasions shewed them. Moved by his tears and eloquence, they submitted in the end to Philippicus, who, after having published a general act of oblivion, marched without loss of time against the Persians, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, in which the general himself, by name Marazas, and almost the whole army, were cut in pieces, only two thousand two hundred of so great a multitude having escaped the general slaughter. The same year, the city of Antioch was once more almost utterly destroyed by a dreadful earthquake, in which above thirty thousand persons were either buried under the ruins, or swallowed up by the earth. The following year 588, Sittas, one of the citizens of Martyropolis, having betrayed that important place to the Persians, Philippicus early in the spring laid siege to it; but not being able to reduce it, he was recalled, and Commentiolus appointed to command in his room, who falling upon the Persians soon after his arrival, gained a complete victory over them, made himself master of a castle called Ochas, built on an high rock over-against Martyropolis, and from thence so annoyed the garrisson with his warlike engines, that they were in the end obliged to submit, and deliver up the place. Hormisdas, ascribing the bad success of his arms to the cowardice of his general, by name Barames, deprived him of his command, sending him at the same time the habit of a woman, as more becoming him than the military attire. Barames, to revenge this affront, conspired conspired against Hormida, who was universally hated on account of his cruelty; and having easily gained over the greatest part of the army, and amongst the rest Ferroachines, who had been sent to command in his room, he fell upon the king with the other conspirators, and pulling him down from his throne, tore the diadem from off his head, and conveyed him under a strong guard to the public prison. The next day the nobility, whom he had provoked with his cruelties, ordered his wife, and one of his sons, to be sawed asunder in his presence; and then putting out his eyes, they threw him into a dungeon, where he was treated with great humanity by his eldest son Cohshoes, whom the rebels had raised to the throne. But the deposed king, not able to bear so great a change, instead of acknowledging the kindness shewn him by his son, who dared not release him, trampled under foot whatever was sent him; which provoked Cohshoes to such a degree, that in the transport of his passion he caused him to be beaten to death. Though the Persians abhorred Hormida, yet the aversion they conceived against Cohshoes, on account of this unnatural murder, was so great, that the nobility, people, and soldiery, conspiring against him, drove him from the throne, and obliged him to take refuge in the Roman dominions. Mauritius, touched with compassion, and reflecting on the uncertainty of all human grandeur, received him at Constantinople with all possible demonstrations of kindness, entertained him in a manner suitable to his condition, and having presented him with immense sums, sent him back at the head of a powerful army, which, entering Persia, defeated the rebels in a pitched battle, obliged Barames, their ringleader, to take refuge among the neighbouring barbarians, and, restoring the banished prince to the throne of his ancestors, returned in triumph to the Roman territories. Upon the restoration of Cohshoes, a profound peace ensued in the east, so that the emperor was at leisure to pursue the war against the Avari, who, passing the Danube, had entered Thrace, and made themselves masters of several strong-holds in that province. Mauritius marched against them in person at the head of the army lately returned from the east; but after several battles fought with dubious success, he was in the end obliged to purchase a peace, which, however, the king of the Avari did not long observe: for entering into an alliance with the Gepidæ, the the Scævi, and other neighbouring barbarians, he returned the following year, bragging that he would utterly abolish the Roman name, and establish a new empire over all people and nations. After he had laid waste Thrace, he approached Constantiople with his numerous army; which struck such terror into the inhabitants, that they were for quitting Europe, and retiring with their families and effects to Chalcedon, and other places in Asia. But the emperor, unmoved at the impending storm, prevailed upon them not to abandon their native country to the fury of the barbarians, assuring them, that heaven would not suffer the peace, which the chagan had confirmed with the most solemn oaths, to be thus violated with impunity. The citizens, encouraged by the words and example of the pious prince, began to prepare for a vigorous defence: but at this juncture their preparations proved unnecessary; for a violent plague breaking out in the enemy's camp, swept off daily great numbers of them, and among the rest seven of the chagan's sons; which terrified the barbarians, that they resolved to abandon the Roman territories, and return beyond the Danube. The chagan, when upon the point of departing, offered to set at liberty the Roman captives, of whom he had twelve thousand, for a very considerable sum an head. But the emperor refusing to ransom them, because they had been for the most part concerned in the mutiny, which happened in the beginning of his reign, the chagan, transported with rage, put them all to the sword. This occasioned a mutiny in the army, and a great tumult at Constantiople, where the populace insulted the emperor in a most outrageous manner 9. The following year, the Avari, under the conduct of their warlike king, renewed their ravages, but were in five successive battles overthrown by Priscus, with the loss of above thirty thousand men, and obliged to quit the Roman dominions. Priscus returned to Constantiople; but Peter, the emperor's brother, who commanded an army on the Danube, was ordered to cross that river, and winter in the enemy's country. This order the soldiers, who had conceived an irreconcilable aversion to Mauritius ever since he refused to ransom the captives, would by no means comply with, looking upon it as given on purpose to expose them to new hard-hardships. Hereupon a general mutiny ensuing, they declared a centurion, by name Phocas, emperor, bestowing upon him, with repeated acclamations, the title of Augustus. News of the revolt of the army, and the promotion of Phocas, being brought to Constantinople, the populace, ever fond of change, rose against Mauritius, who finding himself abandoned by his guards, embarked on a small vessel with his wife and children, proposing to retire in disguise to some place of safety; but being driven back by contrary winds, he took refuge in the church of the martyr Autonomus, about an hundred and fifty furlongs from Constantinople. In the mean time, Phocas, arriving with his army, entered the city amidst the loud acclamations of the populace, and was solemnly crowned in the church of St. John Baptist, with his wife Leontia, by the patriarch, after he had promised to maintain the rights of the church, and to defend the faith of the councils of Nice and Chalcedon. The following days he exhibited public sports, during which warm disputes arising between the two factions, viz. the blue and the green, Phocas sent his guards to appease the tumult, who having used roughly a tribune of the blue faction, those of the same party, threatening the emperor, cried out, that Mauritius, who would do them justice, was not yet dead. This awakened the jealousy of the tyrant, who thereupon immediately ordered Mauritius to be dragged from his asylum to Chalcedon, where, by the tyrant's orders, five of his children were first inhumanly murdered in his presence, and then he himself beheaded. He beheld the death of his children with such firmness and Christian resignation, as can hardly be matched in history, frequently repeating the words of the royal prophet, 'Just art thou, O Lord, and righteous in all thy judgments'; nay, he was so far from uttering any complaints, that the woman, who was charged with the care of his little children, having concealed one of them, and placed her own in his room, the emperor would not suffer this kind fraud to take place, but discovered it to the executioners. The heads of the emperor and the young princes were for some days left exposed to public view, and then buried with the bodies near the tomb of St. Mamas. Such was

was the end of Mauritius, after he had lived sixty years, and reigned sixteen years, three months and some days. The tyrant, not satisfied with the death of Mauritius, caused Petrus his brother, Commagienus, who had the chief command of the army, George the son of Philippicus, and Præfentinius, an officer of great distinction, and much attach-ected to the family of the deceased emperor, to be inhumanly mangled. Theodotius, the eldest son of Mauritius, had been sent by his father in the beginning of the troubles to solicit succours from Cosroes, whom he had restored to the throne of his ancestors; but before the young prince reached the confines of the empire, he was seized, and executed at a place called Leucacæta, at a small distance from Niceæa in Bithynia.

Phocas, thus proclaimed and acknowledged at Constantinople, sent, according to custom, his own image, and that of his wife Leontia, to Rome, where they were received, in the month of April of the preënt year 603, with loud and joyful acclamations, the people there being highly incensed against Mauritius, on account of the cruel executions of the exarchs, and his other ministers in Italy. Gregory, surnamed the great, then bishop of Rome, caused the images to be lodged in the oratory of the martyr Cæsius, and wrote letters to the new emperor, congratulating him upon his advancement to the throne, which he said was effectuated by a particular providence, to deliver the people from the innumerablc calamities and heavy oppressions, under which they had long groaned. Had we no other chaacter of Phocas and Leontia, but that which has been conveyed to us in Gregory’s letters, we should rank him amongst the best princes mentioned in history. But all other writers paint him in quite different colours; and his actions, tran-mitted to us by several historians, evidently speak him a most cruel and blood-thirsty tyrant. He was of middling stature, says Cedrenus, deformed, and of a terrible aspect: his hair was red, his eye-brows met, and one of his cheeks was marked with a scar, which, when he was in a passion, grew black and frightful: he was greatly addicted to wine and women, blood-thirsty, inexorable, bold in speech, a stranger to compassion, in his principles an heretic. His wife Leontia was no better than he; in their reign therefore, continues the

the same writer, the unhappy people were overwhelmed with all manner of calamities, both public and private; great numbers of people were swept off either by famine or pestilence; the earth refused her fruits in season; the winters were severe, that the seas were frozen, and the fish destroyed. He endeavoured in the beginning of his reign to gain the affection of the people by celebrating the circenfian games with extraordinary pomp, and distributing on that occasion large sums amongst the people; but finding that, instead of applauding, they reviled him as a drunkard, he ordered his guards to fall upon them, who wounded some, killed others, and seizing great numbers of them, dragged them to prison: but the populace rising, set them at liberty, and thenceforth conceived an irreconcilable aversion to the tyrant *. The death of Mauritian was no sooner known in the east, than the celebrated Narès, who at that time commanded the troops quartered on the frontiers of Persia, revolted; and seizing on the city of Edessa, easily persuaded Cosroes to join him, in order to depose the tyrant, and revenge the death of a prince, to whom he was indebted for his crown. Cosroes, upon the first invitation, entered the Roman territories at the head of a mighty army, and over-ran without opposition all Mesopotamia. Hereupon Germanus was sent into the east; but Narès meeting him not far from Edessa, engaged him, and put him to flight. Germanus dying a few days after of a wound he received in the engagement, Leontius, who was sent to succeed him, having upon his arrival, suffered himself to be surprised by Narès, was in like manner defeated, and his army dispersed; which provoked the tyrant to such a degree, that he not only recalled him, but ordered him to be led about in chains, exposing him thus to the outrages and insults of the populace. Phocas, despairing of success so long as Narès continued in the Persian interest, left no stone unturned to gain him over; but after he had in the end, with the most solemn oaths, and repeated assurances of indemnity and favour, persuaded him to return home, he no sooner had him in his power, than, unmindful of his promises and engagements, he caused him to be burnt alive, to the great grief and dissatisfaction of the Romans, by whom he was in a manner adored on account of the eminent services he had rendered the empire, and to the no less satisfaction of the Persians, who dreaded the very name of Narès, and besides were highly provoked against him for his having lately forsaken them.

them r. Though defitute of so renowned a leader, they pursued the war with great vigour, over-ran this year all Mesopotamia and Syria; and having committed every-where enormous cruelties, returned home with an immense booty, without meeting with the least opposition. Phocas finding himself universally hated by the people on account of his cruelties at home, and the advantages gained by the enemies of the empire abroad, to strengthen and secure his authority by alliances with the nobility, in the fifth year of his reign, that is, in 607, married his daughter Domitia to Priscus, a patrician, and captain of the guards. But in the magnificent shews that were exhibited on occasion of the nuptials, the people having saluted the bride and bridegroom with the title of Augusti, the jealous emperor ordered Theophanes and Pamphilus, who superintended the sports, and had exposed the images of Priscus and Domitia, without any evil design, to be beheaded in the circus; and would have likewise put Priscus to death, had not the people interposed in his behalf z. The jealousy of the tyrant being thus awakened, one Peronia, who was privy to all the secrets of Constantina, the widow of Mauritian, informed the emperor, that the maintained a private correspondence with Germanus, a man of great authority in the former reign, with a design to raise her son Theodosius, whom she believed still living, to the empire. Hereupon Constantina was immediately seized, and being put to the rack, confessed, that Romanus, by rank a patrician, was privy to the conspiracy. Romanus discovered upon the rack several others, and among the rest Theodorus, prefect of the east, Heliacidas, John, Ziza, and many other persons of great distinction, who were all, by the emperor's orders, put to death, together with Romanus and Germanus, the tyrant not sparing even the daughter of the latter. As for Constantina, she was carried to the place where her husband had been put to death five years before, and there publicly executed with her three daughters a. The jealousy of the suspicions tyrant being heightened by these discoveries, incredible multitudes of persons of all ranks were daily dragged to prison, which by that means was so crowded, that great numbers died daily suffocated with the stench and noisomeness of the place, till a pious matron, touched with compassion for the unhappy persons detained there, yielded her house adjoining to it to enlarge it b. While Phocas thus raged at homes

Cosroes in the east laid waste without opposition Syria, Palestine and Phenicia, putting all to fire and sword; and the following year having put to flight the troops that were sent against him, he entered Galatia, and committing dreadful ravages both in that province, and in Paphlagonia, advanced as far as Chalcedon. In the mean time Phocas, instead of protecting his people against any implacable and insulting enemy, waged with greater fury than Cosroes himself; for this year, the sixth of his reign, he not only put to death all those who were any-ways related to Mauritius, but caused Commentiolus, governor of Thrace, and one of the best officers of the empire, with several other persons of great distinction, to be inhumanly murdered. These cruelties alarmed Priscus, son-in-law to the tyrant, who, apprehending sooner or later the same fate, resolved by some means or other to provide for his own safety, and to rid the world of so great a plague. Accordingly, being informed that Heraclius, governor of Africa, was privately carrying on a conspiracy in that province, instead of discovering it to his father-in-law, he drew over the chief men in the senate to the party of the conspirators, and at the same time dispatching perions, in whom he could confide, to Heraclius, advised him to send, without loss of time, his son Heraclius, and Nicetas, the son of Gregoras his lieutenant, with what forces he could spare, to support the people and nobility, who were ready to revolt. Phocas, in the mean while, not apprized of the danger that threatened him, dispatched Bonofus, whom he had lately appointed count of the east, with a considerable army to make head against the Persians; but while he was on his march, he received fresh letters from the emperor, enjoining him to hasten to Antioch, where the Jews, rising against the christians, had massacred great numbers of them, and among the rest Anastasius, the celebrated patriarch of that city, whose dead body they had ignominiously dragged thro' the streets, and insulted in a most outrageous manner. Bonofus having attempted in vain to appease the tumult by fair means, fell upon the mutineers sword in hand, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and drove the rest out of the city. Thus was the tumult suppressed at Antioch; but at the same time far greater disorders happened at Constantinople, where the people, reviling the emperor at the public shews for his cruelty, drunkenness drunkenness and debaucheries, provoked him to such a degree, that, transported with rage, he caused several of them to be seized, who were either beheaded on the spot, or by his orders thrown headlong into the sea; which so enraged the rest, that they set fire to the palace, and the public prison; by which means those who were detained there made their escape. The tyrant's own court growing at length tired of him, a conspiracy was formed against him by those in whom he most confided. The chief authors of it were Theodorus, a Cappadocian, the praefectus praetorio, Helpidius, who had the care of the warlike engines, and Ana斯塔ius, the comes larginionum. These, with several others of great authority near his person, agreed to fall upon him in the hippodrome; but the conspiracy being discovered by Ana斯塔ius, the emperor ordered all those who had been privy to it, Ana斯塔ius himself not excepted, to be put to death.

Phocas escaped this danger; but the following year 610, the eighth of his reign, he was overtaken by the bloody doom he had long deferred. For Heraclius, the son of the governor of Africa, who bore the same name, taking upon him the title of emperor, and being acknowledged as such by the people of Africa, sailed from thence with a mighty fleet, and a powerful army on board, for Constantinople, while Nicetas marched thither by the way of Alexandria and the Pentapolis. Heraclius feathered his course to Abydus, where he was received with great demonstrations of joy by several persons of rank, who had been banished by Phocas. From Abydus he failed to Constantinople, where he engaged and utterly defeated the tyrant's fleet. Phocas took refuge in the palace; but one Photinus, whose wife he had formerly debauched, pursuing him with a party of soldiers, forced the gates, dragged the cowardly emperor from the throne, and having stripped him of the imperial robes, and cloathed him with a black vest, carried him in chains to Heraclius, who commanded first his hands and feet, then his arms and privy parts, and at last his head, to be cut off. The remaining part of his body was delivered up to the soldiers, who burnt it in the forum. We are told, that Heraclius having reproached him with his evil administration, he answered with great calmsness.

It is incumbent upon you to govern better. Such was the deferred end of this cruel and bloody tyrant, after he had reigned seven years and some months. Upon his his death, Heraclius was with loud acclamations proclaimed emperor; and being crowned by Sergius, the patriarch of Constantinople, he placed the imperial crown on the head of Fabia, thenceforth called Eudocia, the daughter of Rogatus, an African, who had been formerly betrothed to him. Heraclius was descended of a noble and opulent family in Cappadocia, of a majestic aspect, well skilled in the art of war, courageous, and able to bear the fatigues attending a military life. The people, who had long groaned under the tyrannical yoke of his predecessor, were highly pleased with the change: but their joy was somewhat allayed by dismal tidings from the east, where the Persians made themselves masters of Edessa and Apamea, and penetrating as far as Antioch, cut off almost to a man a body of Romans, who attempted to stop them, committing everywhere, without control, most dreadful ravages, and unheard-of cruelties. Heraclius, to answer the expectation the world had conceived of him, caused new levies to be made throughout the empire, the old corps being so entirely exhausted, that, of the many thousands who had seven years before revolted from Mauritius, and declared for Phocas, only two soldiers were now living, the rest being cut off, says Cedrenus, by the avenging hand of providence, for their treachery to their lawful prince. The new raised troops were sent into Cappadocia under the command of Crispus, who nevertheless could not prevent the Persians from over-running that province the following year, and making themselves masters of Cæsarea, which they sacked, and laying waste both that province and Armenia, returned home loaded with booty, and carrying with them an incredible number of captives. On the third of May of the same year 611, the empress Eudocia was delivered of a son; but she died soon after, and was interred with extraordinary pomp. The son was called Heraclius, and afterwards Constantine the younger. Heraclius, not finding himself in a condition to restrain the Persians by force of arms, dispatched embassadors to Cosroes, offering to pay him a yearly pension, and to conclude a peace upon his own terms. But Cosroes, deaf to all proposals, sent the next year a formidable army into Syria, under the conduct of Roshmizus, who, after having ravaged without opposition that country, broke into Palestine, and took the city.

city of Jerusalem, where they committed unheard of cruelties. They are said to have sold ninety thousand christians to the Jews, who purchased them, not with a design to use them as slaves, but to vent their inveterate hatred, and implacable rage against the christians, by racking them with all the torments cruelty itself could invent. Zacharias, the patriarch, was carried into Persia, with an immense booty, and part of the crosses, as was believed, on which our Saviour suffered. The same year Heraclius married Martina, his brother’s daughter, and caused her to be crowned with the usual pomp by Sergius, the patriarch of Constantinople. To this incestuous marriage Zonaras and Cedrenus ascribe all the calamities that afterwards befell him. The following year the Persians over-ran all Egypt, took and pillaged the city of Alexandria, and advancing from thence, as they met with no opposition, into Africa, laid siege to Carthage; but not being able to reduce it, they returned unmolested into Persia, carrying with them infinite numbers of captives, and the spoils of the several provinces through which they passed. Heraclius, who continued all this time at Constantinople, where he created his son Constantine Cæsar, and gave the title of Augusta to his daughter, being well apprised, that he had not sufficient strength to make head against so formidable an enemy, sent once more embassadors to Cosroes, putting him in mind of the kindnes formerly shewn him by Mauritius, and offering to conclude a lasting peace with him upon what terms he himself should judge reasonable. But Cosroes, elated with his success, and aiming at nothing less than the utter destruction of the Roman name, returned the embassadors the following blasphemous answer: Let your master know, that I will hearken to no terms, till he has, with all his subjects, renounced his crucified God, and adored the sun, the great god of the Persians. Heraclius, by this impious and insulting answer, awaked as it were from a lethargy, concluded a peace with the chagan or king of the Avari; and having, with the consent of the clergy, coined into money the gold and silver vessels belonging to the churches, as the treasury was quite drained, he raised a powerful army, consisting not only of Romans, but of Hunns, Avari, and other barbarous nations. With these forces he resolved to march in person against Cosroes; and accordingly having appointed appointed his son to govern in his absence, and under him Sergius the patriarch, and the patrician Bonus, a person of great wisdom and experience, he set out from Constantinople the day after Easter, training on his march such of his men as were raw and unexperienced. In the mean time Saes, the Persian general, who had ravaged all Cappadocia, taken by storm the city of Ancyra, and penetrated as far as Chalcedon, hearing that Heraclius was advancing with a mighty army, sent deputies to him to invite him to an interview, which he hoped, said the treacherous Persian, would end in a lasting peace between the two empires. The emperor complied with his request; and believing him in earnest, sent seventy persons of distinction on an embassy to the king of Persia. But these the Persian general, with the utmost treachery, loaded with chains, and carried them thus bound into Persia, where they were thrown into prison, and treated with great inhumanity by Cosroes. Saes met with the punishment his treachery deferred; for the king, highly provoked against him for having seen the Roman emperor, and not brought him away prisoner with the rest, caused him to be slain alive. One Sarbaras was appointed to command in his room, who entering Asia at the head of a numerous army, made a dreadful havoc in that province. Heraclius, in the mean time, bent his march to the confines of Armenia; and having put to flight a party of Persians, who guarded the strongholds leading into that province, he pursued his rout towards Pontus. As the year was far spent, the Persians, imagining he designed to take up his winter quarters in Pontus, withdrew to theirs; which they had no sooner done, than Heraclius broke into their territories, destroying all before him with fire and sword. This sudden irruption obliged the Persians to quit Cilicia, which they had entered, and hasten to the defence of their own country. Heraclius, apprised of their approach, drew together his men dispersed about the country, and offered them battle, which they readily accepted, but were entirely defeated, the Romans remaining masters both of their camp and baggage. The emperor being, by the season, that was already far advanced, prevented from pursuing the advantages of this victory, put his forces into winter-quarters, and returned himself to Constantinople. The following year Cosroes sent...

sent early in the spring Sarbarazas or Sarmanazaris to lay waste the Roman provinces, which obliged Heraclius to quit Constantinople, and hasten into the east. Upon his arrival in Armenia, he dispatched embassadors to Cosrhoe with new proposals for an accomodation; which being by the Persian monarch rejected with great pride and arrogance, he invaded Persia anew, took several towns, which he levell-ed with the ground, and ravaged the country without con-troul. Being informed, that the king lay encamped with forty thousand chosen men near the city of Gazacum or Gazacotics, he directed his march thither with a design to surprize him. But Cosrhoe, receiving timely notice of his approach, instead of making the necessary preparations to receive him, betook himself to a precipitous flight. Upon his retreat, the emperor entered Gazacum without opposition, where he is paid by Theophanes and Cedrenus to have found the im-menfe treaures of Cælus, king of Lydia, which he seised; and having secured them, with the many rich ornaments of a celebrated temple of the sun, he set fire to the city, and marching with all possible expedition in pursuit of the king, he arrived at Thebatman, where Theophanes places the above-mentioned temple; and laying waste the coun-tries through which he passed, continued his march to the frontiers of Media. But the summer being far spent, he thought it advisable to give over the pursuit. Accordingly having set apart three days to return public thanks for the success of this glorious campaign, and implore the further protection of heaven, he opened the book of the gospels, pursuant to a custom which began to obtain about this time; and imagining he was enjoined there to winter in Albania, he directed his march to that province. In his retreat the Persians, desirous of recovering the immense booty which he carried with him, fell often upon his rear, but were con-stantly repulsed with great loss. As the weather proved very severe, and the captives, fifty thousand in number, were more affected with it than the rest, as being accustomed to a warmer climate, the good-natured emperor ordered them all to be released without ransom, giving them leave to re-turn unmolested to their respective countries 9. The fol-lowing campaign proved no less successful to the Romans, Heraclius, having defeated the enemy in two pitched bat-tles, and cut off great numbers of them, with their general Sarablaes, tho’ the Lazians and other auxiliaries had shame-fully fully abandoned him, and marched home. Encouraged with this success, he took the field next year early in the spring; and crossing the Euphrates, made himself master of Samosate, and several other places. Sarbarazas, at the head of a numerous army, attempted to check the progress of his arms, but was utterly defeated on the banks of the Sanis. In this last battle the emperor gave signal proofs of his conduct, and personal courage. After this victory, Heraclius took up his winter-quarters at Sebastia, placing his troops in the neighbouring towns. Cosrhoes, transported with rage on seeing his armies thus shamefully defeated, seized on the wealth of all the churches within his dominions, and, out of hatred to Heraclius, raised a cruel persecution against the catholics, sparing none but such as embraced the doctrine of Nestorius. At the same time by his embassadors, he engaged in his cause the Avari, the Hunns, the Scclavonians, and other barbarous nations, who, by invading Thrace, and laying siege to Constantinople, were to divert the emperor from pursuing the war in Persia. Heraclius, apprised of these negotiations, tho' carried on with secrecy, divided his forces into three armies, of which one was appointed to defend the city of Constantinople; the second under the conduct of Theodorus, the emperor's brother, was to watch the motions of Sais, who threatened to invade Asia, while the emperor himself led the third into Lazica, in order to invade from thence the Persian dominions. Pursuant to this plan, Heraclius advanced into Lazica, and being there joined by forty thousand Chazari, or, as Cedrenus calls them, eastern Turks, he entered Persia in the depth of winter; and meeting with no opposition, laid waste several provinces. On the other hand the chagan, or king of the Avari, and the other barbarous nations in alliance with the king of Persia, breaking into Thrace, committed dreadful ravages there, and in the end laid siege to Constantinople; but being in several attacks repulsed by the garrison, and having lost the flower of their army, they thought it advisable to drop the enterprise and retire. About the same time Sais, who had under his command the flower of the Persian army received a dreadful overthrow from Theodorus, who left but a very small number of men. The following year 626, Heraclius, invading Persia in the depth of winter, advanced as far as Nineveh, where he was met by Razaftes, to whom Cosrhoes, distrusting his other generals, had committed the whole management of the war. Hereupon a battle ensuing, the Persians, after an obstinate dispute, were put to flight, and their general himself slain, the Romans having left on that occasion but fifty men; which the ecclesiastic writers ascribe to the miraculous assistance of heaven. In this battle the emperor behaved with his usual bravery, having killed three Persian commanders with his own hand. Cofrhes, upon the news of this defeat, fled to Seleucia on the Tigris, and there shut himself up with his wives, children and treasures, while Heraclius, having now no army to oppose him, made a dreadful havoc of the most fertile provinces of the Persian dominions, destroying all with fire and sword. At Diftagera he found the ensigns and standards, which at different times had been taken from the Romans, and in other places rescued incredible numbers of Roman captives. In the meantime Sarbarazes, to divert Heraclius from ravaging Persia, laid siege to Chalcedon; but, after he had continued some time before the place, without being able to reduce it, Cofrhes sent private orders to Chardash, another officer, to murder the general, and lead the army back into Persia. But the king's letter was intercepted, and brought to the emperor's son at Constantinople, by whom it was immediately sent to Sarbarazes, who thereupon revolted with his whole army. About the same time the king, being taken ill, declared his younger son Mardafa his successor; which Siroes, his eldest son no sooner understood, than he joined Chardash; and being assisted by the Roman captives, whom he set at liberty pursuant to the advice given him by Heraclius, he seized on his father, and loading him with chains, threw him into a dungeon, where he was inhumanly murdered with Mardafa, and his other children, after he had been, by the orders of his unnatural son, most outrageously insulted by all the nobility. Siroes, thus raised to the throne, concluded a perpetual peace with Heraclius, upon terms no less honourable than advantageous to the empire; for he restored all the provinces that had been seized by his predecessor, with three hundred ensigns, and the wood which was supposed to have been part of the cros which our Saviour died, and had been carried by Cofrhes in triumph from Jerusalem into Persia. He likewise set at liberty all the Roman captives, and among the rest Zacharias patriarch of Jerusalem. A peace peace being thus concluded, Heraclius returned to Constantinople, which he entered in a kind of triumph, being met at some distance by his son Constantius, the patriarch, and almost all the nobility and people, who attended him to the palace with songs of triumph, and repeated acclamations. And truly no prince ever deserved better of the empire; for in the space of six years he recovered the several provinces which had been dismembered from it by the Persians, fully revenged all the indignities offered to the Roman name by that haughty nation, obliged their king, and his numerous armies, to fly before him, and brought the most potent and formidable of all the enemies of the empire to such a low ebb, that they were never afterwards capable of attempting any memorable exploit. These things Heraclius performed, though, upon his accession to the empire, he found it over-run by several barbarous nations, the exchequer quite drained, the military discipline decayed, and the army consisting of raw and unexperienced levies, scarce deserving the name of soldiers. Heraclius, having passed the winter at Constantinople, in the spring of the following year 628, took a progress to Jerusalem, carrying with him that part of the cross which had been taken by the Persians fourteen years before. He entered the city in great pomp; and having returned in the chief church solemn thanks to the Almighty for the many signal victories he had been pleased to grant him, and for choosing him to rescue that sacred pledge out of the hands of the enemies of the Christian name, he restored it with great solemnity to its former place. Upon this occasion was instituted the festival of the exaltation of the holy cross, which is celebrated to this day by the church of Rome on the fourteenth of September. Of the miracles that are said to have happened on this occasion, the reader will find a particular account in Cedrenus, and other ecclesiastical writers. When the ceremony was over, the emperor published an edict banishing all the Jews from Jerusalem, and forbidding them under severe penalties, to come within three miles of the holy city. From Jerusalem, Heraclius took a farther progress into the eastern provinces. Upon his arrival at Hierapolis in Phrygia, he received news of the death of Siroes, the new king of Persia, murdered, according to some, by Sarbaras, one of his generals, according to others, by his own son Ardefer, who succeeded him, but was assassinated.

nated in the seventh month of his reign by Barrazas, whom the Persians, a few months after, deposed and put to death, raising Barahanes, the son of Coshaes, to the throne in his room. Barahanes, after a short reign of seven months, was succeeded by Hormidas, the last Persian king of the race of Artopernes; for in his reign the Saracens put an end to the Persian monarchy, and established the kingdom of the Arabs in its room, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place. From Hierapolis the emperor removed to Edessa, where he received embassadors from the king of India in the east, and from Dagobert, king of the Franks, in the west, sent to congratulate him on his late success against the Persians, and to court his friendship and alliance. While the emperor continued at Edessa, Athanasius, the patriarch of the Jacobites, a man of great address, having insinuated himself into his favour, brought him by degrees to acknowledge but one will in Christ, which created a dangerous schism in the church, and gave rise to warm disputes. Heraclius ever after maintaining it to the utmost of his power, and countenancing the Monothelites, that is, those who acknowledged but one will in Christ. This herey, however, did not prove so prejudicial to the church as the pestilent and impious doctrine of the impostor Mohammed, which was first broached in the reign of Heraclius, and by him suffered to take so deep a root, that his successors were never able to suppress it. The impostor died this year, the twenty-first of the reign of Heraclius, and 630th of the Christian era, after having reduced, with the assistance of the rabble, whom he had seduced, and of the Saracens, who had joined him, the cities of Mecca and Medina, and part of Arabia, Heraclius, in the mean time neglecting the affairs of the state, to promote and establish the herey of the Monothelites, which he had lately embraced. Mohammed, who, by a double usurpation, had declared himself both the king and prophet of the Saracens, was succeeded by Eububezer his kinsman who reduced great part of Persia, and breaking into Palestine in 632, laid waste the territory of Gaza, after having defeated and cut in pieces the governor of that province, with all his troops. The following year Eububezer died, and was succeeded by Haumar, who made himself master of Bosra, and several other cities of Arabia, and gained a complete victory over Theodorus, the emperor’s brother, sent to

to oppose him. Hereupon Heraclius appointed Boanes to command in the room of his brother, and at the same time dispatched Theodorus Sacellarius into Arabia. The latter was met near Emefa, by the Saracens, under the command of Haumar; but he prudently declined an engagement, being informed, that the emperor had enjoined Boanes, who lay encamped at Damascus, to join him. In the mean time Heraclius, dreading the issue of the war, leaving Edessa, hastened to Jerusalem, and repaired from thence to Constantinople, carrying with him the cross, and what ever else was of value in the city, which, he feared, would soon fall into the enemy's hands. The following year Boanes having engaged the Saracens, was by them entirely defeated, Heaven itself seeming to espouse their cause; for a violent wind arose in the beginning of the engagement, which blowing the dust in the faces of the Romans, rendered them quite incacpable of managing their arms; so that they were driven headlong into the Jerinochta, in which river most of them perished. After this victory they made themselves masters of Damascus; and advancing from thence into Phoenicia, reduced that province without meeting with the least opposition. Haumar, encouraged with this success, took the field early next spring; and dividing his numerous army into two bodies, he sent one to invade Egypt, and led the other in person against Jerusalem. They were met upon the borders of Egypt by Cyrus, bishop of Alexandria, who, by promising in the name of the people to pay them an annual pension of two hundred thousand denarii, prevailed upon them to spare the country, and retire. This agreement was observed for three years, during which the Saracens never offered to molest the Egyptians. But in the mean time the emperor being advised to break the agreement, one Manuel, by birth an Armenian, was appointed governor of Egypt, and sent thither with a strong body of troops; so that the commissioners from the Saracens, when they came at the year's end to demand the usual pension, were received with contempt and disdain by the governor, who told them, that he was not a priest, but a Roman general, at the head of an army, and therefore would not submit to such ignominious conditions.
The Saracens, provoked at this answer, flew to arms; and invading Egypt, put Manuel to flight, and made themselves masters of the whole country. The emperor not having sufficient strength to drive them out, sent Cyrus to them, promising to stand to the former agreement, provided they withdrew out of Egypt. But the Saracens, refused to quit upon any terms their new conquest*. The loss of Egypt, which had continued subject to the empire ever since the time of Augustus, happened in the twenty-fifth year of Heraclius's reign, and 634th of the Christian era. Egypt being thus reduced, the troops which had been employed in that expedition were by Haumar sent into Syria; which province they conquered in the space of two years, making themselves masters of all the strong holds there, and of Antioch itself, the metropolis of the east. Haumar in the mean time entering Palestine, marched without opposition to Jerusalem, which city he took in 636, after a two years siege. Thus were the most wealthy and beautiful provinces of the empire torn from it by the Saracens, an upstart nation, hitherto looked upon with a contempt suitable to their original. But of them we shall speak at length in a more proper place. Heraclius in the mean time, who wanted neither courage nor abilities to check the progress of this new enemy, was so taken up with unfeasonable disputes about religion, with public festivals and entertainments, that he had not time, or perhaps was unwilling, to reflect on the dangers that threatened him. The ecclesiastic writers look upon his supine and unaccountable security, as a punishment inflicted upon him by heaven for countenancing the Monothelites, and persecuting the Catholics: for, not satisfied with holding the doctrine of those heretics himself, he endeavoured to establish it in all the provinces of the empire, by the famous edict called ectheses, or exposition. But, before he could put this wicked design in execution, he died of a dropsey, which was attended with strange and unaccountable symptoms. His death happened in the month of May, after he had reigned thirty years, and some months.

Heraclius was succeeded by his son Constantine, who died after a short reign of seven months, poisoned, as was supposed, by his step-mother Martina, to make room for her own son Heracleonas; who was accordingly proclaimed, and crowned with the usual solemnity. But he had not held the empire quite six months, when the senate revolted, depo-

fled into Africa. The senate having thus delivered the empire from the usurper Heracleonas, advanced Constans, the son of Constantine, and grandson of Heraclius, to the throne. The first years of this prince's reign are almost quite barren of events; for Theophanes, and the other Greek writers, only tell us, that, in his second year, Haumar began to build a temple at Jerusalem; that in his third happened an eclipse of the sun, and violent storms in his sixth; which were looked upon as the forerunners of more violent concussions: for the same year the Saracens, not satisfied with Syria, Mesopotamia, Egypt, Phoenicia, Arabia, and Palestine, broke, like a torrent into Africa; and having defeated the imperial prefect, by name Gregory, made themselves masters of that spacious and fruitful country. The following year 648, Mahias or Mahuvias, one of their captains, with a great fleet, fell upon the island of Cyprus; which he easily reduced, and laid in ashes the city of Constantia. From Cyprus he sailed to the island of Aradus, which he took, together with the city; and from thence steering his course to Rhodes, made himself master of that island, destroying the famous colossus of the Sun, one thousand three hundred and sixty-six years after it had been set up by Laches or Cares. It had been overthrown sixty-six years after it was erected, by a violent earthquake, which shook the whole island; and the Rhodians, pretending the prohibition of an oracle, had never attempted to erect it anew; yet looking upon the brash as in a manner sacred, they had never presumed to apply it to any other use; but Mahuvias caused it to be broken to pieces, and sold it to a Jewish merchant of Emesa, who, with the metal, loaded nine hundred camels. While Mahuvias was thus employed in the island of Rhodes, his countrymen, breaking into Armenia, laid waste that country far and wide, the emperor in the mean time continuing idle at Constantinople, or busying himself only in matters of religion, and promoting, as his grandfather had done, the doctrine of the Monothelites, which he had imbibed from his infancy. His supine negligence, and unaccountable indolence, encouraged Mahuvias to make an attempt upon Constantinople itself. With this view he fitted out a strong fleet at Tripolis in Phoenicia, and would, in all likelihood, have succeeded, had he not been prevented by two brothers, both christians and the sons of a Grecian trumpeter, who having found means to break open the public prison, crept with christian captives, with their assistance killed the ameras, as the Saracens called him, or the governor of the place, set fire fire to the fleet, destroyed all the naval preparations, and then escaped, in a ship provided for that purpose, into the Roman dominions. Mahuvias, having with incredible expedition fitted out another fleet, failed to Phænice in Lycia, where he engaged and defeated the imperial navy, commanded by Constans in person, who with much-ado escaped in disguise to Constantinople 2, whence to retrieve his reputation, he marched the following year against the Scavi or Scalavonians, who had feized on that country, which to this day is called from them Scalovnia. The emperor defeated them in several encounters; but not being able to drive them quite out, he returned to Constantinople, where he found embassadors from the Saracens, now divided among themelves, come to solicit a peace; which the indolent and un-warlike prince readily granted them, yielding to them the many provinces they had feized, upon their paying to him and his successors, by way of tribute, a thousand nummi a year, with a horse and a slave. The following year 659, the emperor, looking with a jealous eye upon his brother Theodorus, who, on account of his virtue and integrity, was the darling of the people, caused him to be ordained deacon, and received the holy cup at his hands; but his fears not being yet quite appeased, he ordered him soon after to be murdered; which he had no sooner done, than he was feized with dread and terror, imagining that he saw his brother constantly standing before him, with a cup of blood in his hand, commanding him to quench his inhuman thirst. Haunted and terrified with this imagination, and the remorse of his conscience, he left Constantinople, where the murder had been committed, and repaired to Sicily, resoluing to transfer the seat of the empire to Syracuse; but the inhabitants of Constantinople, apprised of his design, kept in that metropolis his wife and children. From this time forward he wandered, like a second Cain, from place to place; but his guilt purifying him whithersoever he went, he became an object of compassion even to his most inverteate enemies. In the mean time Mahuvias, who had caused his competitor Hal to be murdered, and now reigned alone, without any regard to the late treaty, sent his son Izod to lay waste the Roman territories, who advancing as far as Chalcedon, and having made himself master of Amorium, a strong city of Phrygia, left a garrison in the place, and returned with an immense booty to his father. Amorium however, was soon after surpriused, prisef, and retaken by Andreas, one of the emperor's officers, who put all the Saracens he found in the place to the sword. During the emperor's stay in Sicily, a war broke out between the Franks and Lombards; which he looking upon as a favourable opportunity of driving the latter out of Italy, fitted out a mighty fleet, and landing at Tarentum, marched directly to lay siege to Beneventum, taking Luceria, and several other cities belonging to the Lombards, in his way. But Grimoald, duke of Beneventum, marching after a signal victory over the Franks, to the relief of the place, the emperor, raising the siege in great haste, retired to Naples.

Not long after, a body of twenty thousand Romans was almost entirely cut off, with Saburros their general, by Romoald the son of Grimoald *. After this defeat, the emperor, laying aside all thoughts of dispossessing the Lombards of that part of Italy which they held, took a progress to Rome, which he entered in great pomp, being met six miles from the city by Vitalianus, bishop of the place, and his clergy. After he had continued twelve days in Rome, and caused the most remarkable rarities he found there to be removed to Constantinople, he returned to Naples, and from thence to Syracuse, where he resided for the space of five years, oppressing his people with most enormous exactions, and even plundering the churches of their rich ornaments, and sacred vessels. Having thus rendered himself most odious and contemptible to all his subjects, one Andrew the son of Troilus, resolved to rid the world of so great a plague; and accordingly dispatched him in the bath of Daphne at Syracuse, by repeated blows on the head with the vessel that was made use of to pour hot water upon him. Thus perished Constans II. in the twenty-seventh year of his reign, and 668, of the Christian æra. Upon his death, the people of Syracuse proclaimed one Mezizius, by birth an Armenian, who had no other qualifications to recommend him to their favour but the comeliness of his person. The news of his promotion sooner reached Constantinople, than Constantine, the son of the deceased emperor, having, with the utmost expedition, equipped a fleet, failed to Sicily; and having defeated, taken, and put to death the usurper, caused himself to be acknowledged emperor in his room *. He must have continued some time in the west, settling the provinces that were still subject to the empire there; for we are told by Zonaras, that he was, by

by the people of Constantinople, surnamed Pogonatus, because, at his departure from thence, only a little down appeared on his chin; whereas he returned with a beard. The people of Constantinople received him, on his return from Sicily, with loud acclamations; but he had not been long in the city, when some, misled by a strange notion, that as there were three persons in the trinity, so there ought to be three emperors on the throne, pressed him to take his two brothers, Tiberius and Heraclius, for his partners in the empire. This alarmed the young emperor, who, having got the broachers of this new doctrine into his power, put them to death, and caused the noses of his two brothers to be cut off, that deformity rendering them incapable of the empire. While these things passed at Constantinople, the Saracens, entering Africa, where the people had insulted some of their garrisons committed unheard-of barbarities, and having ravaged the country returned with eighty thousand captives. The following year they made a descent upon Sicily, took and plundered the city of Syracuse, and over-ran the whole island, destroying every thing with fire and sword. They laid waste in like manner Cilicia; and having passed the winter at Smyrna, they entered Thrace in the month of April of the following year 672, and laid siege to Constantinople itself; but were received with such vigour and resolution by the emperor, who had already, with indefatigable pains, reformed both the court and army, that they thought it advisable to withdraw in the month of September to Cyzicus. However, the ensuing spring they renewed the siege, continuing thus to attack the city in the summer, and retire to Cyzicus in the winter for the space of seven years, say the Greek writers, though from some of them it appears, that in the fourth year of the siege, a peace was concluded between the Romans and Saracens, as we shall relate anon. In this long siege, the Saracens lost incredible numbers of men, and many ships consumed by sea-fire as it was called, because it burnt under water, being the invention of one Callinicus, a native of Heliopolis in Egypt. The enemy at length despairing of success, abandoned the enterprise; but as they were returning home, their fleet was shipwrecked off the Scylian promontory. About the same time three of the emperor’s lieutenants, viz. Florus, Petronius, and Cyprianus, gained a signal victory in Syria over Supidianus who commanded there a numerous body of Saracens; but lost in the engagement thirty

Chap. 33. thirty thousand of his men. These misfortunes encouraged the Mardaites, or Maronites to seize on mount Libanus, where they fortified themselves; and being joined by multitudes of chriiffian captives flocking to them from all parts, they reduced the whole country between mount Taurus and Jerufalem, made frequent incursions into Syria, and so harassed and terrified the Saracens, that Mahuvian, not thinking himself able to contend with them and the Romans at the same time, sent embassadors to treat of a peace with Constantine; which was in the end concluded upon the following terms: 1. That it should be inviolably observed by both nations for the space of thirty years. 2. That the Saracens should retain the provinces they had seized. 3. That they should pay yearly, by way of tribute, to the emperor and his successors three thousand pound weight of gold, fifty flaves, and as many choice horfes. This peace was thought as affairs then stood, very advantageous and honourable to the empire. It was scarce concluded, when the Bulgarians, leaving their native feats on the banks of the Volga or Bulga, whence some think they took their name, advanced as far as the Danube, which they paffed without opposition, to the number of one hundred thousand persons; and entering the territories of the empire, ravaged far and wide the countries through which they paffed. The emperor sent a considerable army against them; which being put to flight by the barbarians, he chose rather to conclude a peace, by promising to pay them an annual pension, than to pursue an expensive and doubtful war. The emperor, being now diverted by no wars either foreign or domestic, laboured with indefatigable pains to establish in the church that peace and tranquillity which reigned in the state. In order to this, he assembled the sixth general or oecumenical council, which was opened at Constantinople on the twenty-second of November of the year 680. In this council, the doctrine of the Monothelites was condemned, and by that means tranquillity, in a great degree, restored to the church, the abettors of that doctrine not daring, under a prince who had so much at heart the purity of the faith, to raise disturbances, as they had done under the preceding emperors. Constantine enjoyed the remaining part of his reign in that peace and quiet, which his piety, justice and moderation well deserved, the Saracens religiously observing the treaty between them and the empire, and the Lombards being, by their intestine broils, diverted from from extending their conquests in Italy. In the beginning of the year 685, he was seized with a lingering distemper, of which he died in the month of September, after having reigned seventeen years and some months *.

He was succeeded by his son Justinian, a youth but sixteen years old. With him Abdelmelech, the new prince of the Saracens, confirmed the peace made with the empire, and at the same time proposed by his embassadors a new treaty, in virtue of which Justinian was to reprefe the Maronites, who by their frequent excursions from mount Libanus, greatly harrassed the Saracens; and Abdelmelech to pay him for this service a thousand nummi a day, an horfe, and a slave. To this treaty the young and unwise prince readily agreed, and immediately dispatched Magistrianus, with a chosen body of troops, againfl the Maronites, whom he overcame, and put out of a condition of molesting the Saracens for a long time after. In the second year of his reign, he marched in person against the Bulgarians, who had been allowed to settle in Lower Macdia, from them afterwards called Bulgaria, and without any regard to the treaty concluded with them by his father, ravaged their country, and took several of their strong holds. But the Bulgarians, soon recovering from their consternation, drew together their forces; and falling upon the emperor, drove him out of their country, and obliged him to abandon the places, and restore the captives, he had taken. He was attended with better success against the Scavi or Scavonians, whom he defeated in several battles; which encouraged him to break the treaty he had lately concluded with the Saracens, tho’ Abdelmelech had faithfully performed every thing required of him by that agreement, and did all that lay in his power to prevent a rupture. At length, finding the emperor oblinately bent upon a war, he raised a powerful army, and gave the command of it to one of his generals named Mohammed; who causing the articles of the late treaty to be carried before his men on the point of a spear, met the emperor in the neighbourhood of Sebafopolis; but in the engagement that ensued, was obliged to give ground, and retire to his camp, where he must have perifheed with hunger, or submitted to the conqueror, had he not in the mean time gained over the commander of the Scavi in the emperor’s service; whose unexpected defeftion, with twenty thoufand of his men, caused such a confternation in the Roman army, that

that they immediately betook themselves to a precipitous flight, being pursued with great slaughter by the enemy.

The emperor with much-ado reached Leucate, where transported with rage, he caused the Sclavi or Sclavini who had continued with him, to the number of ten thousand, to be cut in pieces, with their wives and children, and their bodies to be thrown into the sea. From Leucate he returned to Constantineople, where, without betraying the least concern for his late disgrace, or attempting to restrain the victorious Saracens, by whom the abandoned provinces were harried in a most cruel manner, and Armenia entirely reduced, he was wholly taken up in embellishing his metropolis with new buildings. Among the rest he erected a magnificent banquetting-house, from him called Justinianeum, and a theatre near the palace, causing a church dedicated to the virgin Mary, to be pulled down to make room for it. This unchristian and unpopular action gained him the ill-will of the people, whose aversion to him was heightened by the tyrannical, arbitrary and cruel conduct of his two chief ministers Stephen and Theodotus. The former, by nation a Persian, caused several persons of distinction to be put to death, upon suspicions altogether groundless; and in the end came to such a pitch of arrogance, as to threaten in a most disrespectful manner Anastasia Augusta, the emperor’s mother. Theodotus was by profession a monk; but being by the emperor taken out of his cell, and intrusted with great power, he exceeded in cruelty Stephen himself, causing under various pretences, such of the nobility as seemed to despise him, to be put to no less cruel than ignominious deaths. The emperor, dreading the dangerous effects of the hatred, which the people had on several occasions shown to him, and his two favourite ministers, resolved to be before-hand with them; and accordingly ordered Stephen the eunuch, and Rufus one of his generals, to fall upon the inhabitants of Constantineople in the night-time, and massacre them in their houses, beginning with the patriarch Callinicus. But this bloody and inhuman massacre was happily prevented in the following manner: Leontius, a patrician, and formerly commander of the forces in the east, after he had been by the jealous emperor kept three years in prison, was at this time set at liberty, and appointed governor of Greece, with orders to embarque immediately for his government; but while he was waiting for a favourable wind, several of his friends came to visit him, and among the rest two monks, Gregory the superior of a monastery, and Paul, who, as they were skilled in Astronomy,

... Astronomy, says Cedrenus, had foretold him, while he lay in prison expecting every moment his last doom, that he should attain to the empire before his death. These, upon his expostulating with them for having deceived him with vain promises, encouraged him to lay hold of the present opportunity to make good their prediction; which, they said, he might easily do, the emperor being universally abhorred, both by the nobility and people, and ready to receive him as their deliverer. Leontius hearkened to them; and taking with him his own soldiers, that is, those who had been appointed to attend him into Greece, he broke open the prison and being joined by many others, who had been long detained there, he led them to the forum, inviting the people, as he went, to meet him in the church of St. Sophia; which being soon crowded, the patriarch appearing, cried aloud to the assembled multitude, This is the day which the Lord hath made. The people, thus animated by the patriarch, proclaimed Leontius emperor, and hastening to the palace, seized on Jullinian, carried him to the circus, and there, after many other indignities, cut off his nose, and with one voice banished him to Cherbona. At the same time Theodotus and Stephen were dragged to the forum, where they were burst alive. This revolution happened in the tenth year of Jullian's reign, and 694th of the Christian era.

The first year of Leontius's reign, was not disturbed by any foreign wars or domestic troubles. In the second Sergius, who commanded the Roman troops in Lazica, betrayed that province to the Saracens, who the following year invaded Africa, made themselves masters of Carthage, and over-ran the whole country; but they were driven out by John the patrician, a man of great valour, and experience in war, whom the emperor had sent against them. The Saracens, to repair the great losses they had sustained, equipped another fleet, and returning to Africa, obliged John to fly to the sea-coast, where he embarked with the troops under his command for Constantinople. But the fleet having touched at Crete, some of the chief officers, apprehending the emperor would call them to an account for thus abandoning Africa to the enemy, prevailed upon the soldiers to revolt, and proclaim Apismar one of Leontius's generals emperor. Apismar, or, as he was afterwards called, Tiberius, readily accepted the imperial dignity, and falling without loss of time to Constantinople, surprized the city, took Leontius prisoner.

prisoner, and having caused his nose to be cut off, confined him to a monastery in Dalmatia, after he had reigned in the palace three years. Tiberius, thus raised to the empire, sent his brother Heraclius into Cappadocia, to watch the motions of the Saracens. He, taking advantage of some divisions that reigned among them, penetrated into Syria as far as Samo-fata, waiting all before him, and returned to Cappadocia loaded with booty, after having put to the sword, as we are told, no fewer than two hundred thousand of the enemy. Notwithstanding this loss, the Saracens broke into the Roman territories the following year, and laid siege to Antara-dus in Syria; but not being able to master that place, they sat down before Mopueltia in Cilicia, which they reduced and fortified. In the fourth year of Tiberius's reign, Boanes, surnamed Heptadæmon, betrayed Armenia to the Sa-racens. The same year Tiberius banished Philippicus a pa-trician, to whom he was chiefly indebted for his promotion, into Cephalenia, for relating a dream, which Tiberius in-terpreted, as portending the empire to him. The following year, the nobility of Armenia, taking arms against their new masters, drove them out with great slaughter, and sent to Tiberius, demanding his assistance. But in the mean time Mohammed, entering Armenia with a mighty army, recovered the country; and having got the authors of the revolt into his power, burnt them alive. Encouraged with this success, they invaded Cilicia once more, under the conduct of Azar; but were, to the number of ten thousand either cut in pieces by Heraclius, or taken prisoners, and sent in chains to Constantinople. In the mean time Justinian, the deposed emperor, who had been confined to a monastery at Chersona, having betrayed a great desire of recovering his former dignity, the inhabitants of the place, dreading the indignation of Tiberius, and the evils attending a civil war, resolved to prevent them, by either killing Justinian, or sending him in chains to Constantinople; but he, suspecting their design, fled privately to the chagan or king of the Chazari, who received him in a manner suitable to his rank, and gave him his sister Theodora in marriage. But being soon after gained by the rich presents and large promises of Tiberius, he undertook either to deliver up to him the un-fortunate fortunate prince alive, or to send him his head. The design was revealed by one of the king's domestics to Theodora, and by her to her husband, who thereupon fled to Trebelis king of the Bulgarians, by whom he was received with great demonstrations of kindness. We are told, that being overtaken, on his flight from the country of the Chazari, by a violent storm near the freight of Daenaprium, Myaces, one of his domestics, apprehending the vessel to be in imminent danger, and therefore conjuring him to make a vow, that he would forgive his enemies, if it ever pleased Heaven to restore him to his throne, he answered sternly, Let God drown me this moment, if I spare any of them. Trebelis not only entertained the fugitive prince with extraordinary magnificence, but, having raised a powerful army, marched with him straight to Constantinople, and laid siege to that metropolis, the inhabitants, who looked upon their city as impregnable, rallying and reviling both princes from the walls; but the third day of the siege, some Romans having got into the city through an aqueduct, opened the gates to the rest; which Tiberius no sooner knew, than he fled with his treasure to Apollonia, leaving Justinian once more master of the imperial city and the empire. Being thus restored to his former dignity, he dismissed Trebelis, loaded with rich presents, and bestowed upon him part of the Roman dominions, called afterwards Zagoria. Having, after a diligent search, got into his power Tiberius, Leontius, by whom he had been driven out, and Heraclius the brother of Tiberius, he led the two former in triumph through the city, and carrying them to the circus, beheld the shews sitting on the imperial throne, with his feet upon their necks, the inconstant multitude repeating in the mean time that verse of the psalmist, Those shalt tread upon the lion and adder, &c. After this inflicting pageantry, he caused their heads, and that of Heraclius, to be cut off. As for Callinicus the patriarch, he ordered his eyes to be put out, and then banished him to Rome, that he might have the cruel mortification of depending for his subsistence upon the bishop of that city, whose authority he had always opposed to the utmost of his power.

The emperor, having now got rid of those whom he most dreaded, began to rage with implacable fury against all who had adhered to them, putting to death incredible multitude of citizens and soldiers, and dispeopling, in the heat of his revenge, whole provinces at once. In the third year of his restoration restoration, unmindful of the obligations which he owed to Trebelis, king of the Bulgarians, he broke the alliance concluded with that prince, and invaded Thrace, at the head of a mighty army, with a design to recover the country he had yielded to him. But he was attended with no better success than his ingratitude deserved; his army being utterly defeated, and he himself obliged to make his escape in a light vessel to Constantinople. The following year he equipped a mighty fleet, not with a design to oppose the Bulgarians, who ravaged the provinces of the empire without control, but to be revenged on the inhabitants of Cherona and the Bosphorans, who had resolved to dispatch him, or deliver him up to Tiberius, while he lived in exile among them. On board this fleet was embarked a numerous army, with express orders to put all the inhabitants of those parts to the sword, without distinction of sex or age, of guilty or innocent. These cruel orders were executed with the utmost barbarity; multitudes of that unhappy people were put to the sword; some were by the cruel soldiery roasted alive, others cast into the sea, &c. The children, however, were spared; which the inhuman emperor no sooner understood, than, transported with rage, he dispatched fresh orders to his officers, commanding them not to leave a child alive in the place. They were accordingly all massacred; but some of the leading men among the Bosphorans having made their escape and taken refuge in the country of the Chazari, with the assistance of that neighbouring nation, they defeated in several encounters the emperor's forces; and, renouncing their allegiance to him, proclaimed Philippicus, the son of Bardanes, who had been banished by Tiberius to Cephalenia, as we have related above, but happened to be then at Cherona. The troops that were sent against them by Justinian, finding they could not reduce the city of Cherona, pursuant to his orders, and dreading the implacable humour of the tyrant, resolved to consult their own safety, by acknowledging Philippicus; which they did accordingly, joining those against whom they had been sent. Philippicus, thus proclaimed and supported by two powerful armies, marched strait to Constantinople, which he entered without opposition, the emperor being then at Sinope in Paphlagonia with a body of Thracians, against whom Philippicus dispatched Elias prince of the Bosphorans; who, having gained over the Thracians, took the emperor prisoner, and cutting off his head, sent it to Philippicus, by whose orders it was conveyed to Rome. Tiberius, the emperor's son by Theodora, took sanctuary in a church; but was dragged Philippicus. Philippicus had no sooner taken possession of the throne, than, openly espousing the cause of the Monothelites, he summoned a council of bishops, who were all infected with that heresy, and consequently easily prevailed upon to condemn and revoke all the acts of the sixth general council. The emperor was induced to summon this council by a Monothelite monk, who had foretold him he should one day attain the empire, if Cedrenus is to be credited, and now promised him a long and happy reign, provided he abolished the sixth general council, and established the doctrine of the Monothelites. But while Philippicus was thus baying himself in matters relating to religion, the Bulgarians, breaking unexpectedly into Thrace, advanced to the very gates of Constantinople; and, having laid waste the country, and put to the sword an incredible multitude of people, returned, without meeting with the least opposition, loaded with booty. At the same time, the Saracens, invading the Roman territories, committed dreadful ravages, took the city of Medea and several other places, and returned likewise un molested, carrying with them great numbers of captives. These calamities rendering Philippicus odious to the people, one Rufus, at the instigation of two patricians, viz. Theodorus, and Georgius commander of the troops in Thrace, entering the palace with a company of Thracians, while the emperor was rejoicing after dinner, put out his eyes, and withdrew undiscovered. Nicephorus writes, that Rufus, seizing the emperor, dragged him to the hippodrome, and there caused his eyes to be plucked out. Be that as it will, the next day, being Whitunday, the people, assembling in the great church, proclaimed Artemius, chief secretary to Philippicus, emperor; who was accordingly crowned by the patriarch. Artemius, or, as he was afterwards called, Anaftasius, was a man of great learning, and had been from his youth employed with uncommon success in the management of public affairs. As he was a zealous catholic, he made it his chief study to heal the divisions of the church, without neglecting the affairs of the state; for, in the very beginning of his reign, he appointed Leo, an Isaurian, a person of great experience i war, commander in chief of all his forces, and sent him with a powerful army to the frontiers of Syria, to protect Asia Minor against the inroads of the Saracens. Being informed, that the Saracens designed to lay siege to Constantinople, he caused a great number of light ships to be built, the walls to be repaired, and having filled the public granaries, ordered such of the citizens as had not laid up provisions for three years, to depart the city. But news being brought in the mean time, that the enemy's fleet was failed to Phoenicia, he ordered his to assemble from the different ports of the empire at Rhodes, appointing John, deacon of the great church, his admiral. The fleet met accordingly; but the admiral punishing with more severity than prudence some refractory seamen, the rest mutinied and killed him; and being well apprised they could by no other means avoid the punishment due to their crime, but by openly revolting, they declared Anastasius unworthy of the empire, and obliged one Theodosius, a person of a mean extraction and then receiver of the revenue at Adramyttium to accept of the purple. Anastasius, upon the first notice of the revolt, fled to Nice in Bithynia, leaving a strong garrison in Constantinople; which city Theodosius immediately besieged by sea and land, and reduced, after having continued six months before it. He had no sooner entered the city, than he dispatched the magistrates and the patriarch to acquaint Anastasius with what had happened, who, upon promise of his life, renounced all claim to the empire, and, taking the habit of a monk, delivered himself up to the new prince, by whom he was banished to Theßalonica, after he had enjoyed the title of emperor about two years. But Leo, whom Anastasius had appointed commander in chief of all his forces, refusing to acknowledge Theodosius, drew together all the forces in the east, with a design, as he gave out, to restore the deposed emperor; but being persuaded by Masanthias, prince of the Saracens, to assume the purple, and powerfully assisted by Artavasdes, an Armenian, a man of great interest in that country, he marched, at the head of a considerable army, to Nicomedia, where he met, defeated, and took prisoner the son of Theodosius, who had been sent against him. From Nicomedia he pursuèd his march to Constantinople, being acknowledged emperor in all the places through which he passed. Hereupon Theodosius finding it was in vain to contend with so powerful a rival, dispatched dispatched to him Germanus the patriarch, and some of the chief men in the senate, offering to resign the purple, on condition his life was spared. To this Leo readily agreed; and Theodosius, deposing himself of the purple, entered, with his son, into orders, after having reigned one year. Thus Theophanes and Cedrenus. But Nicephorus writes, that the officers of the army, finding Theodosius unequal to the high station to which he had been raised, persuaded him to abdicate, and choose Leo in his room. Be that as it will, Leo was received with loud acclamations at Constantinople, and crowned on the twenty-fifth of March of the present year 716, by the patriarch Germanus, after he had bound himself by a solemn oath to preserve, and, to the utmost of his power, defend, the orthodox faith. He was a native of Jaulia, of a mean extraction, and had served some time in the low station of a common soldier, from which he was raised by Justinian II. and admitted on account of the tallness of his stature and comeliness of his person, amongst the spatarii, that is, the emperor's guards. Anastasius appointed him commander in chief of all his forces, which post he held when he assumed the purple. He is distinguished from the other emperors bearing the name of Leo by the surname of Iconomachus, which was given him on account of his combating the worship of images. In the first year of his reign, Masalmias, prince of the Saracens, at whole instigation he had assumed the purple, took by surprize the city of Pergamus; which is looked upon by the historians, as a punishment justly inflicted by Heaven upon the wicked and barbarous inhabitants, who hearing the Saracens were preparing to invade Atra, had ripped up the belly of a woman big with child, and boiling the infant in a kettle, had dipped their right hands in the water, being pursued by a magician, that they would by that means become invincible, and defend their city against all the attempts of the enemy. In the second year of Leo's reign, Solyman, one of the generals of the Saracens, broke into Thrace; but he dying, Hauam was appointed to command in his room, who lost most of his men by the severity of the winter. However, in the following spring he approached Constantinople, and invested it by land, while Sufhiam and Izeth, arriving with two mighty fleets, the one from Egypt and the other from Africa, blocked it up by sea; but most of their ships being destroyed.

Smyrd, either by the artificial fire, of which we have spoken above, or by storms, they thought it advisable to abandon the enterprise, and retire, after having lain before the city thirteen months, or, as others will have it, two years. The calamities, which the inhabitants suffered during the siege, can hardly be expressed; thirty thousand of them are said to have perished with hunger, and the like number to have been swept of by the plague. Haumar, prince of the Saracens, highly provoked at the disappointment of his armies and fleets before Constantinople, began to rage with great fury against the Christians in his dominions, forbidding them at first the exercise of their religion, and soon after commanding them, on pain of death to renounce it, and embrace the abominable sect of Mohammed. Many, to avoid death, made an outward profession of the religion, if we may so call it, of their insulting masters, while some few, notwithstanding the ignorance and depravity of that age, maintained, with unshaken constancy, the true religion, at the expense of their lives. The same year, Sergius, governor of Sicily, revolt and declared one Basilius, the son of Onomagulus, emperor, changing his name into that of Tiberius, but Paul, an officer of the houehold, who was sent against the usurper, having got him into his power and caused his head to be struck off, restored the island to its former tranquility. Sergius, the chief author of the revolt, took refuge amongst the Lombards in Italy. The same year, the empress Maria was, to the unspeakable joy of the emperor and the inhabitants of Constantinople, delivered of a son, named Constantine, and commonly nicknamed Copronymus, from his having defiled the sacred font at his baptism. Theophanes, the true author of the history intituled micaella, which is ascribed to Paulus Diaconus, tell us fallly, that Germanus the patriarch foretold from that accident, that the infant would one day prove a great plague to the church. The joy for the birth of the young prince was somewhat allayed by the approach of a numerous army of Bulgarians headed by the late emperor Anastasius, who, weary of a private life, had prevailed upon those barbarians to acknowledge him for emperor, and support his claim to the crown. They laid siege to Constantinople, hoping, by means of the partizans of Anastasius, among whom were several persons of great distinction, distinction, to make themselves soon masters of the city; but meeting, contrary to their expectation, with a vigorous opposition, they seized on the unfortunate Anastasius, and delivered him up to the emperor, who put him to death, with all his accomplices, among whom was the bishop of Thessalonica. Leo, having happily weathered this storm, caused his son Constantine to be solemnly crowned emperor, in order to secure the empire to his posterity. The ceremony was performed by the patriarch Germanus, on Easterday in 720, the fifth of Leo’s reign. In the mean time the Saracens, under the conduct of their new prince Ized, who had succeeded Haumar, having equipped a mighty fleet, ravaged the coasts of Italy and Sicily; and landing in Sardinia, raged there with unspeakable fury, destroying all with fire and sword; but being soon after diverted from molesting the empire by the intestine divisions that arose amongst them, another Ized, surnamed Mualabis, having set up for himself in Persia, the emperor was more at leisure to reform several abusés, that had crept into the court and state under the former emperors. In the tenth year of his reign and 725th of the christian æra, he published the famous edict, commanding all images to be removed out of the churches, and forbidding any kind of worship to be paid to them. This edict was, with great vigour, opposed in the east by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, and Johannes Damascenus; but Leo, having deposed Germanus, and raised Anastasius to the see of Constantinople in his room, caused his edict to be put in execution at Constantinople, and the images to be pulled down and destroyed by his officers throughout the city, without sparing the statue of our Saviour, which had been placed above the gate of the imperial palace by Constantine the Great. The people, struck with horror in seeing the images of our Saviour and his saints thus insulted, and either torn in pieces, or burnt by the emperor’s officers, assembled in a tumultuous manner, and having first vented their rage upon Leo’s statues and images, flew to the palace; but being repulsed and pursued with great slaughter by the emperor’s guards, they were forced to disperse and suffer the edict to take place. But in the west, especially in Italy, it was had in such abhorrence, that the people openly revolted; which gave Luitprand, king of the Lombards, an opportunity of seizing on Ravenna and several other cities of the exarchate.

exarchate. He was, however, soon after driven out by the Venetians, who, at that time, made no small figure in Italy. Gregory II. then pope, or bishop, of Rome, jealous of the growing power of the Lombards, had, by a letter to Orfus duke of Venice, prevailed upon him to espouse the interest of the emperor, and lead his forces against Ravenna; which city he surprized, before Luitprand, who was then at Pavia, had the least notice or suspicion of his design. Gregory had, from the very beginning, opposed with great warmth the emperor’s edict forbidding the worshipping of images; and now, presuming upon the eminent service he had rendered the empire, he wrote a long letter to Leo earnestly entreating him to revoke it. But the emperor, well apprised, that Gregory had been prompted by his own interest, and not by that of the empire, to prevent the Lombards from making new conquests in Italy, was exasperated to such a degree against him, for continuing still to oppose his edict, that he sent private orders to his officers in Italy, especially to Paul exarch of Ravenna, and to Mauritius, governor, or, as he was then styled, duke, of Rome, enjoining them to get Gregory, by some means or other, into their power, and send him dead or alive to Constantinople. But the people of Rome, who had a great veneration for their bishop, discovering the plot, guarded him so carefully, that the emperor’s officers could never find an opportunity of putting their orders in execution. Three assassins undertook to murder him; but two of them were apprehended, and put to death, which the third escaped, by taking sanctuary in a monastery, and there embracing a religious life. Gregory, finding himself thus supported by the people of Rome, solemnly excommunicated the exarch, for publishing, and attempting to put in execution, the emperor’s edict, writing at the same time letters to the Venetians, to king Luitprand, to the Lombard dukes, and to all the cities of the empire, exhorting them to continue steadfast in the catholic faith, and oppose, with all their might, the execution of the impious, as he styled it, and heretical edict. These letters made such an impression upon the minds of the people, that the inhabitants of Italy, though of different interests and often at war with each other, viz. the people of Rome, the Venetians, and the Lombards, entering into an alliance, resolved to act in concert, and prevent, to the utmost of their power, the execution of the imperial edict. The people of Rome and those of the Pentapolis, now Marcia and Ancona, did not stop here; but pulling every-where down the emperor’s statues, openly revolted.
revolted, and refusing to acknowledge an iconoclast, that is, a breaker of images, for emperor, they chose magistrates of their own; nay, they had some thoughts of electing a new emperor, and conducting him with a strong army to Constantinople: but this scheme was opposed by the pope as impracticable. In Ravenna the people rose in defence of the images against Paul the exarch; and having killed him and all the iconoclasts in the city, submitted to Luitprand king of the Lombards, a cunning prince, who took care to improve to his advantage the general discontent that reigned among the subjects of the empire. In Naples the people took arms against Exhilaratus their duke (for Naples was then governed by dukes sent from Constantinople) and murdered him, with his son Adrian and one of his chief officers, for pressing the inhabitants to receive theedit, and conform to the religion of their prince. However, as they hated the Lombards, with whom they had been almost constantly at war, they continued firm and constant in their obedience to Leo, and received Peter, who was appointed duke of Naples in the room of Exhilaratus. The people of Rome, finding the emperor inflexible in his design against the worship of images and the life of the pope, whom he looked upon as the chief author of all the disturbances, resolved at length to renounce their allegiance to Leo, and to continue united under the pope as their head, binding themselves by a solemn oath to defend him against all the attempts both of the emperor and the Lombards, whom they had but too much reason to mistrust b. Theophanes, Cedrenus, Zonaras, Nicephorus, and other Greek writers, tell us, that the Romans, withdrawing their obedience to Leo, chose pope Gregory for their prince, taking an oath of allegiance to him. They add, that the pope accepted of the principality, forbidding the Romans to pay thenceforth tribute to the emperor; that he publicly excommunicated Leo as an heretic, absolved his subjects from their allegiance to him, and solemnly declared him fallen from the empire. Hence, say they, had the temporal and independent dominion of the pope over Rome its rise, which was afterwards enlarged by Pepin and Charles the Great, and extended to the exarchate of Ravenna, the Pentapolis, and several other cities of Italy. But it appears from Paulus Diaconus, Anastasius Bibliothecarius, Joannes Damascenus, who all flourished nearer those times, and in the places where

The things they relate happened, nay, and from the letters of Gregory himself to Leo, that he acknowledged him for his lawful sovereign as long as he lived, as did likewise Gregory III. his successor. The Latin writers take no notice of Gregory's excommunicating and deposing the emperor, or abbling his subjects from their oath of allegiance; but only tell us, that when Leo deposed the patriarch Germanus and appointed Anastasius in his room, Gregory excommunicated the latter; and rebuking the emperor by letters, earnestly entreated him not to abuse the power with which he had been trusted, to introduce innovations in the church. However, the authority of the Greek historians has been preferred to that of the Latins, by all the protestant, and most of the Roman catholic, writers; but with very different views. The protestants followed them, that they might thence take occasion to make a comparison between our favour and the pope. When the multitude, say they, offered to make our Saviour king, he rejected their offers, saying, My kingdom is not of this world: when the Romans offered the principality to Gregory, he readily accepted it, and from the servant of servants became the lord and master. Our Saviour expressly commanded tribute to be paid to Cæsar: the pope would suffer no more tribute to be paid to Leo his lawful sovereign, &c. On the other hand, the Roman catholics, by standing to what the Greeks write, think they can defend the pope from all usurpation, and establish his temporal power and jurisdiction upon a better and more plausible foundation, viz. the unanimous consent of the people, conferring upon him, freely and without constraint, the principality; not reflecting, that those, who thus chose him for their prince, had revolted from their lawful sovereign; and consequently that Gregory, by accepting the principality, became guilty both of rebellion and usurpation. But from what we shall relate in the history of the Lombards in Italy, it will plainly appear, that the pope did not acquire the sovereignty of Rome at this time, but many years after; nay, that his temporal dominion had not its rise in Rome, but in the exarchate of Ravenna and the Pentapolis, which were taken by the celebrated Pepin, from Atilphus king of the Lombards, and given to pope Stephen, whom some call the second, others the

the third, of that name. As for the sovereignty of Rome, the popes did not enjoy it, as we shall demonstrate in a more proper place, till the year 876, when it was yielded to the apostolic see, as it began then to be called, by Charles surnamed the Bald. But to return to Leo: He was wholly taken up, during the remaining part of his long reign, in suppressing the worship of images throughout his dominions, and raging with great cruelty against those, who refused to comply with his edict; while the Saracens, breaking into the eastern provinces, laid them waste without control, carrying yearly back with them an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. In the seventeenth year of his reign and 732d of the Christian æra, he married his son Constantine to the daughter of the king of the Chazari, after she had been instructed in the principles of the Christian religion, and received at her baptism the name of Irene, a word signifying in the Greek tongue peace. The same year, the emperor caused a mighty fleet to be equipped, with a design to chastize and bring back to their duty the Romans and other people of Italy, who had revolted on occasion of the edict against images; but, the fleet being shipwrecked in the Adriatic sea, Leo could by no other means be revenged on the pope, who continued to oppose the execution of his edict, than by causing the revenues of the Roman see in Calabria and Sicily to be confiscated. In the last year of Leo's reign, a dreadful earthquake happened at Constantinople, which overturned many churches, monasteries, and private houses, burying great numbers of people under the ruins. Not long after Leo died, having reigned twenty-five years, two months, and twenty days, and was succeeded by his son Constantine, who no sooner saw himself sole master of the empire, than he led an army against the Saracens, who had made an irruption into Asia. In his absence Artabazdus, who had married his sister, gave out, that he was dead; and being thereupon acknowledged by the people and proclaimed emperor, he caused the sons of Constantine to be secured; but as he was well apprised, that the report he had industriously spread of Constantine's death would be soon contradicted, he began to consult with the patriarch Anastasius, by what other means he might keep the people steady in their allegiance to him. Anastasius had been a zealous iconoclast in the late reign; but to curry favour with Artabazdus, who had a great veneration for images, and to estrange the minds of the people from Constantine,

Justinian, he assembled them in the great church, and holding in his hand the wood of the holy cross, he took the following oath: By him who died upon this wood, I swear, That Justinian one day addressed me with these words; I do not believe him to be the son of God, who was born of Mary, and is called Christ, but a mere man; for Mary was delivered of him after the same manner, as Mary my mother was delivered of me. This deposition of the patriarch, whether true or false we cannot take upon us to determine, made such an impression on the minds of the multitude, that they immediately deposed Justinian with one consent, and, with repeated acclamations, saluted Artabazdus again emperor, who took Nicephorus his eldest son for his partner in the empire. This gave rise to a civil war, the greatest, says Cedrenus, perhaps not without some exaggeration, that had happened since the beginning of the world. But all we know of it is, that Artabazdus and his son Nicephorus, being defeated by Justinian in several encounters, were in the end besieged in Constantinople; which city held out, till the inhabitants were forced by famine to submit. Artabazdus and his two sons were taken and delivered up to the emperor, who caused their eyes to be pulled out, gave the city up to be plundered by his soldiers, and either banished, maimed, or put to death all those who had been any-ways concerned in the revolt. Anastasius the patriarch was, by the emperor's orders, publicly beaten with rods, and then carried in an ignominious manner through the most frequented streets of the city on an ass, with his face to the tail. However, the time-serving prelate was continued in his see, because the emperor could not find a worse, says Theophanes, to prefer to it in his room. Justinian, having thus got rid of his enemies at home, resolved to march once more against the Saracens, who were at war among themselves. Accordingly, having raised a powerful army, he entered Syria; and having overthrown the enemy in several encounters, made himself master of Germanicia and some other strong-holds, which had been long in their hands. The Saracens, notwithstanding their domestic quarrels, to divert the emperor from pursuing his conquests in Syria, assembled a mighty fleet, which steered its course to the island of Cyprus, where it was to be joined by other ships of war and a great number of transports with land-forces on board. But the Roman fleet coming unexpectedly

The emperor was diverted from pursuing the advantages that might have accrued to the empire, by the frequent earthquakes that happened about this time, and were by far the most destructive that had been known in any age. In Syria and Pallene several cities were swallowed up, others entirely ruined, and some, if we may give credit to Nicephorus, removed, without any considerable damage, six miles and upwards from their former seats. At the same time, happened an extraordinary darkness, which lasted from the fourth of August to the first of October, there being little or no distinction during that time, between day and night. This calamity was followed by another still more terrible, viz. a plague, which, breaking out in Calabria, soon spread all over Sicily, Greece, the islands in the Ægean sea, and at length reached Constantinople, where it raged for three years together with such fury, that the living were scarce sufficient to bury the dead. The plague no sooner ceased, than Constantine, having caused his son Leo, then scarce a year old, to be proclaimed emperor, marched with what forces he could draw together into Armenia, and, taking advantage of the divisions that still reigned among the Saracens, made himself master of Miletene, Theodosiopolis, and several other places. But he was diverted from pursuing his conquests in the east, by a sudden irruption of the Bulgarians, who, provoked at the emperor’s causing some forts to be built on the frontiers of Thrace, broke into that province, and, advancing as far as the long wall, laid waste the whole country. Constantine, having recalled his forces out of the east, marched against them in person; but being surprized by the enemy in a narrow passage called Beragaba, his army was utterly defeated, and he obliged to save himself by flight to Constantinople. Soon after his return to that metropolis, he renewed the edict published by his father against images, forbidding at the same time any worship to be paid to the saints, or their relics, and commanding their images to be removed out of the churches, and publicly burnt. Such of the bishops as opposed the execution of this edict, were driven from their sees; and the monks, monks, who preached against either, sent into banishment, or sentenced to death. At the same time, an edict was published in Constantinople, and in all the cities of the empire, forbidding, under the severest penalties, any one to embrace a monastic life; nay, at Constantinople most of the religious houses were suppressed, and the monks not only obliged to marry, but to lead their brides publicly through the streets. But of this persecution the reader will find a more particular and distinct account in the ecclesiastic writers, than it may be proper for us to give in this place. The twenty-third year of Constantine's reign and 763d of the Christian æra is remarkable for an extraordinary frost, which began on the first of October, and lasted till the latter end of February. At Constantinople both seas were frozen for an hundred miles from the shore, the ice being so thick as to bear the heaviest carriages, and covered with snow twenty cubits deep. When the frost broke, mountains of ice and frozen snow being driven by the winds through the freights, did a great deal of damage to the walls and the castle of Constantinople. The reader will find a surprising account of this frost in Theophanes, who, with thirty others, passed the freights upon one of these floating islands, as he styles it. The month following, several prodigies appeared, or were thought to appear, in the air. At the same time, a comet, which the Greeks called docites, because it resembled a beam, was seen for ten days in the east, whence it moved to the west, and shone there for one-and-twenty days more, the people being struck with terror and amazement at the sight of these prodigies, and apprehending the last day to be at hand. Constantine in the mean time continued to persecute with great severity those who appeared most zealous and forward in the worship of images, till he was diverted by a new irruption of the Bulgarians; who, breaking into the territories of the empire, committed every-where unheard-of cruelties. But Constantine marching in person against them, cut them all off to a man, and then returned in triumph to Constantinople. This the emperor styled his noble war, because not one christian perished in it. However, he owed the victory, it seems, to the treachery of some Bulgarians, whom Elerich their king discovered by the following device: He wrote to Constantine, pretending a desire to resign the crown, and lead a private life at Constantinople; for which purpose he begged begg'd the emperor to send him a safe conduct, and at the same time to acquaint him what friends he had among the Bulgarians, that he might repair with them to Constan tinople, being unwilling to trust his person or design to others. Hereupon Constantine, not suspecting any deceit, sent him a lift of the names of those who held intelligence with him; which the crafty prince no sooner received, than he caused them all to be put to death. The emperor, finding himself thus deluded, resolved at all events to be revenged on the treacherous prince; and accordingly, having spent the winter in warlike preparations, he marched early in the spring against Elerich; but being seized on his march with a violent fever, he returned to Achadiopolis, whence he was conveyed to Selymbria, and from thence by sea to Strongylum, where he dyed on the fourteenth of September of the year 775, after he had reigned twenty-four years, two months, and twenty-six days. As Constantine was a most zealous iconoclast, and did all that lay in his power to suppress the worship of the saints, their images, and relics, Theophanes, Cedrenus, and the other writers of those times, paint him in the blackest colours, biased in some measure, as we may reasonably suppose, by passion, interest, and prejudice. However, standing even to the accounts of his declared enemies, we must allow him to have been a prince of great temperance and moderation, well skilled in war, and in every respect equal to the high station to which he was raised. As for the great severity which he exerted against such as continued, in defiance of his decree, to worship images, it was, no doubt, owing to his zeal for the purity of the christian religion. After all, his severity against the worshippers of images did not exceed that of other emperors, highly commended by all christian writers, against the worshippers of idols. He de-defended the empire with equal bravery and success against the Saracens and Bulgarians; but was not in a condition to prevent the loss of the far greater part of his dominions in Italy, Aftulphus, king of the Lombards, having reduced in 751, the city and exarchate of Ravenna with the Pentapolis, which were soon after wrested from him by Pepin king of France, and given to pope Stephen III. and hence sprung the temporal dominion of the pope in Italy, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place. The exarchate of Ravenna comprehended Ravenna, Bologna, Imola, Faenza, Forli, Cesena, Bobbio, Ferrara, Commachio, Adria, Creavia, Ceaviis, and Secchia; the Pentapolis, now Marca d’Ancona; comprised Rimini, Pesaro, Conca, Fano, Sinagiglia, Ancona, Osmo, Umana, Jesi, Fossolombrone, Montefeltro, Urbino, Cagli, Lucoli, and Eugubio, as appears from the grant of Lewis the Pious, confirming the donation of Pepin. The pope, thus enriched with large territories and dominions, would no longer be deemed a subject of the empire; but adding the sovereignty to the priesthood, and the sceptre to the keys, he created a new principality in Italy on the ruins of the eastern empire, to which nothing now remained in that country, except the provinces of Calabria and Brutium, with the dukedoms of Naples, Amalfi, and Gaeta. But of the state of Italy at this time, and the great revolutions that happened there, we shall speak at length in the history of the Lombards.

Constantine was succeeded in the empire by his son Leo, who, soon after his accession, took his son Constantine, whom he had by Irene, for his partner in the empire, causing him to be solemnly crowned by the patriarch in the hippodrome, and bestowing at the same time the title of nobilissimi on his two brothers, Anthemius and Eudoxius, Nicephorus, his second brother, having received that honour in his father’s life-time. Constantine was crowned in the latter end of April of the year 776, and the following month Nicephorus, Leo’s brother, formed a conspiracy against the emperor and his son; but the plot being discovered, he was apprehended, and banished with his accomplices to Chersona. The same year Elerich, king of the Bulgarians, who had done great mischief to the empire in the preceding reign, moved with an earnest desire of embracing the christian religion, resigned his crown and repaired to Constantinople, where he was received by Leo with extraordinary demonstrations of kindness and esteem, and, after he had received the sacrament of baptism, created a patrician, and married to a relation of the empress Irene. In the third year of Leo’s reign, some advantages were gained by the emperor’s forces over the Saracens, who, by way of revenge, began to persecute the christians in a most cruel manner, cauing all their churches in Syria to be pulled down and levelled with the ground. The following year, Leo, who had hitherto dissembled his real sentiments concerning the worship of images, openly declared against that superstitious, as he styled it, and idolatrous practice; reviving the edicts of his father Leo III, king of the Bulgarians, embraces the christian religion.

and grandfather, and punishing, with the utmost severity, such as presumed to pay any kind of worship to the saints, the virgin Mary, or their images. Having found two images in the closet of the empress Irene, he never after admitted her to his bed, and caused those who had conveyed them to her to be racked to death. He did not long outlive them, being soon after seized with a violent fever, of which he died on the sixteenth of September 780, after having reigned five years and ten days. Theophanes writes, that Leo, having taken out of the great church a crown, which had been deposited there by the emperor Heraclius, and was enriched with carbuncles of an inestimable value, while he was one day wearing it, a carbuncle broke out on his head, and he was at the same time seized with a fever, which, by a just judgment, soon put an end to his life.

Leo was succeeded by his son Constantine, surnamed Porphyrogenitus, because he was born while his father was emperor; but, as he was then only ten years old, his mother Irene took upon her the administration. The young prince had scarce reigned forty days, when some of the senators and great officers conspired against him, with a design to prefer his uncle Nicephorus to the imperial dignity; but Irene, having feasonably discovered the plot, caused the chief authors of it to be seized, and confined to different islands, after they had been publicly beaten with rods. Awakened by this danger, to prevent any future attempts of the like nature, she obliged all the late emperor’s brothers to take holy orders, and administer the sacrament to the people on Christmas-day, when she and her son restored to the church the crown of Heraclius, which Leo had seized. The same year 780, the Saracens, upon the news of Leo’s death, broke into the eastern provinces; but were driven back with great loss by the troops, which Irene had, upon the first notice of their motions, dispatched against them. The following year, the empress, to procure a strong alliance by the marriage of her son, sent embassadors into France, to propose a match between him and the daughter of Charles king of that country, who was afterwards surnamed the Great, and crowned emperor of the west. The proposal being well received by Charles, an eunuch, by name Lliscæus, was left at his court to teach his daughter, named Rotrudris, the Greek tongue, and instruct her in the manners and customs of the Greeks.

The same year, Helypdius governor of Sicily revolted; but was driven out of the island by Theodoreus a patrician, whom Irene had sent with a powerful fleet against him, and obliged to take refuge among the Saracens in Africa, who acknowledging him for emperor in opposition to Constantine, fell with such fury upon the eastern provinces, that Irene was glad to avert the danger that threatened the empire, by obliging herself to pay him an annual pension. The peace with the Saracens was scarce concluded, when the Scavi or Scavini, breaking into Greece and Peloponnesus, feized on those countries. Against them the empress dispatched Saturarius a patrician, who overcame them in several battles; but suffered them to continue in the countries they had feized, upon their promising to acknowledge the authority of the empire, by the payment of an annual tribute. In 788, the match between Constantine and Rotdrudris, which had been approved of by both parties, was broken off by Irene, who obliged her son, much against his inclination, to marry a woman of a mean descent, named Mary, by birth an Armenian or Paphlagonian, and the niece or daughter of one Philaretus, remarkable for his good nature and charitable disposition. Some ascribe the breaking off the match with Rotdrudris to the ambition of Irene, apprehending, that Constantine would no longer be governed by her, but by his father-in-law. Others tell us, that the empress was provoked against Charles, on account of his invading the dukedom of Benevento in Italy, which she had taken under her protection. Be that as it will, the conduct of the empress on that occasion disobliged her son to such a degree, that he was never after truly reconciled to her. The young prince’s courtiers, apprized of the misunderstanding that passed between him and his mother, and defirous of getting the power into their own hands, took care to put him in mind, that he was no longer a minor, but of an age to govern without the directions or counsels of a woman. Constantine hearkening to their insinuations, they resolved to feize on Saturarius, who governed with an absolute sway, as Irene’s first minister, and, after having banished him, to oblige the empress to resign the administration. But Saturarius, having notice of their design as soon as it was concerted, immediately im-parted it to Irene, who caused all those who had been privy to it to be beaten with rods and sent into banishment. As for her son, she chastized him with her own hands, and, hav-
The Roman History. Book III.

The Senate and soldiery, having confined him to his apartment, obliged the Senate and soldiery to bind themselves by a solemn oath not to acknowledge Constantine, but her alone, for their sovereign, so long as she lived. This oath was taken by all the forces quartered in the different provinces, except some legions in Armenia, who resolutely declared they would adhere to Constantine, pursuant to the oath which they had already taken. The resolution of the Armenian legions encouraged the rest, notwithstanding their late oath, to proclaim Constantine anew, and demand, with unanimous consent, that he might be forthwith vested with the whole power and authority. Irene, dreading the fury of the incensed multitude, immediately released her son from his confinement, who, being received with the repeated acclamations of the citizens and soldiery, took the reins of the empire into his own hands. Constantine, now at liberty to act without control, recalled and advanced to the first employments such as had been banished on his account, sending into exile Saturacius and his mother's other favourites, after they had been publicly beaten with rods. As for Irene, he led her with great respect out of the palace, and attended her in person to an house built by herself, in which she had laid up an immense treasure. The same year 790, a dreadful fire happened at Constantinople, which consumed great part of the city, with the patriarch's palace, in which were the comments of St. Chrysostom on the scripture, written with his own hand. The following year, the city was alarmed with a violent earthquake, which obliged the inhabitants to quit their habitations and retire to the open fields. The same year the emperor marched at the head of a considerable army against the Bulgarians, who had broken into the empire, and engaged them in Thrace; but with what success, is uncertain: for Cedrenus writes, that he gained a great victory; but Zonaras will have the two armies to have parted upon equal terms. Upon his return to Constantinople, the friends of Irene, what by extolling her wisdom, prudence, and experience in public affairs, what by entreaties and arguments drawn from filial duty, prevailed upon him to recall his mother to court, and restore her to her former authority; which, however, the Armenian legions could never be induced to acknowledge. Being thus reconciled to his mother, he marched anew against the Bulgarians, encouraged thereunto.

unto by some mathematicians, who promised him certain victory; but while, depending upon their vain predictions, he neglected the proper means to obtain it, the Bulgarians, taking advantage of his ill-grounded security, gave him a dreadful overthrow. Besides a great number of common soldiers, the best officers of the army and the most considerable men in the empire lost their lives in the battle, with Pancratius the mathematician, who, by his lying predictions, had given occasion to the overthrow. The emperor growing jealous and distrustful upon this defeat, some malicious and designing courtiers took care to improve that disposition, by insinuating to him, that the soldiers quartered in Constantinople had formed a design of preferring Nicephorus to the empire; which heightened his jealousy to such a degree, as he was conscious to himself of his evil conduct, that he not only caused his eyes to be put out, but those likewise of his other uncles, Nicetas, Anthemius, and Eudoxius, though nothing had been alleged against them. Alexius Mofoles, whom the Armenian legions had demanded for their leader, when they refused to consent to the restoration of Irene, was, at her instigation, treated with the like severity; which so provoked those legions, that they refused to obey Camilianus, appointed by the emperor to command them. Hereupon Constantianus, Artaferas, and Chrysochires were sent against them at the head of a strong party; but the mutinous legions, having defeated and taken them prisoners, caused, by way of retaliation, their eyes to be pulled out; which so provoked Constantine, that he marched against them in person; and having defeated them in a pitched battle; put all their officers to death, causing the common soldiers to be led in chains to Constantinople, and conveyed from thence into different islands. The Armenian legions, who had always suspected and been ready to oppose the ambitious designs of Irene, being thus broken and dispersed, she began to put the emperor, now destitute of that support, upon such measures, as, the thought, would render him odious to the people. As he had no great affection for the empress Mary, whom she had forced him to marry, contrary to his inclination, she advised him to divorce her, and marry Theodota or Theodecta, one of the maids of her chamber; who was accordingly crowned empress at Constantinople, where the nuptials were solemnized with extraordinary pomp and magnificence for three days together.
This marriage occasioned great contentions among the clergy concerning the lawfulness of it, in which Irene artfully sided with those who opposed her son, encouraging them underhand to estrange the minds of the people from him. However, the success which attended his arms against the Saracens and Bulgarians, prevented the people from revolting, tho' privately flirled up, by Irene and her emissaries, to depose him. The Saracens had broken into Cilicia; but were driven back with great loss by the troops which Constantine seasonably dispatched against them. As for the Bulgarians, Cardames their king having sent embassadors to demand a tribute, threatening to come as far as the golden gate of Constantinople, and there take it by force, if it was refused him, Constantine replied, that since he was stricken in years, he would save him the trouble of so long a journey, by coming in person to wait upon him. Accordingly he marched against him at the head of a considerable army; upon the sight of which the barbarians, struck with a panic, fled in the utmost contermination. Upon his return to Constantinople, he attended his mother from thence to the baths of Prusa in Bithynia, where he had not been long, when news was brought him, that the empress Theodota was delivered of a son; at which he was so overjoyed, that he returned in great haste to Constantinople. Irene, taking advantage of his absence, gained over the chief officers of the army, who promised to depose Constantine, and commit the government to her alone. Pursuant to this promise, some of them, returning to Constantinople, seized on the unhappy prince, and carrying him to the palace of Porphyra, where he was born, pulled out his eyes in such a cruel and barbarous manner, that he died a few days after in the utmost agony, having reigned seven years alone, and ten with his mother. Our historian observes, that five years before his uncles lost their eyes by his orders, on the same day of the same month, and in the same chamber. Nicephorus and Christoper, her husband's brothers, hearing of the death of Constantine, took sanctuary in the great church; but were dragged from thence and banished to Athens, where they are said to have been killed by the inhabitants, upon their attempting to raise disturbances in the empire. In them ended the family of Leo Isauricus; so that no one was now left to dispute with Irene her title to the empire. She no sooner received intelligence of the death of her son, than, than, leaving Prusa, she repaired to Constantinople; which she entered in a gilded chariot, drawn by four horses, being attended by several patricians, who waited as her slaves on either side, while she threw money among the people, as was usual at the solemnity of a coronation. In the meantime, the Saracens, hearing the empire was governed by a woman, broke into the eastern provinces; and having defeated the forces Irene sent against them, entered Thrace, made their excursions to the very gates of Constantinople, destroying all with fire and sword, and returned home unmolested, carrying with them an immense booty and an incredible number of captives. In 798, the second of Irene’s reign, her great favourite Saturacius, prompted by his boundless ambition, conspired against her, with a design to deprive her of the crown, and to place it upon his own head; but his design being discovered before it was ripe for execution, Irene, after upbraiding him with treachery and ingratitude, contented herself, in consideration of his former services, with forbidding any one to keep him company. The partiality which the empress shewed him, joined to a lively sense of his ingratitude to her, made such a deep impression upon his mind, that he died of grief soon after. Irene, finding she could not depend even upon those whom she thought she had most reason to confide in, made it her chief study to gain the hearts of her people. With this view she remitted an annual tribute, which had been long paid by the citizens of Constantinople, encouraged commerce, and, what most of all obliged the people, promoted, to the utmost of her power, the worship of images, causing them to be set up anew in the churches, and annulling the edicts enacted against them by former emperors. In 802, Charles, surnamed the Great, who had been crowned emperor of the west by pope Leo III. on Christmas-day of the year 800, sent a solemn embassy to Constantinople, with proposals of a firm and lasting peace between him and Irene. To these embassadors were joined legates from the pope, who were received with extraordinary pomp at Constantinople. The embassadors of Charles, among their other instructions, were ordered to propose a match between him and Irene, that the two empires might be once more happily united in their persons. Irene readily entered into the negotiation; but Aetius an eunuch, who bore the chief sway at

at court, by daily starting new difficulties, put off from time to time the conclusion of the treaty. As he was excluded from the empire himself, on account of his condition, he had been long labouring under-hand, to prefer it to his brother, by name Leo, at that time governor of Thrace and Macedonia; but being well-apprised, that his design would be unavoidably defeated, should the treaty between Irene and the powerful and warlike a prince take place, he left no stone unturned to divert the empress from it, at least to get the conclusion of it suspended, till a favourable opportunity offered of putting in execution his private design. In the meantime, the nobility, who hated Aetius, on account of his haughty and imperious conduct, suspecting his design, and apprehending the empress, over whom he had gained a great ascendancy, might by him in the end be prevailed upon to take Leo for her partner in the empire, resolved to set up Nicephorus, a patrician of great wealth and interest among the people. Accordingly, having first disposed the minds of the citizens to a revolt, by giving out, that Irene not only designed to marry Charles, but to transfer the seat of the empire to the west, by which means the eastern empire would soon become a province to the new empire of the west, they assembled one night, and went in a large body to the palace, where they seized on Irene without opposition; and confining her under a strong guard to her chamber, conducted Nicephorus, their new emperor, with the usual solemnity to the great church, where he was crowned in a tumultuous manner, the populace, whom Irene had obliged by several acts of generosity and good nature, uttering reproaches and curses against him. Nicephorus treated Irene with great civility and respect, till he had, by his obliging behaviour, prevailed upon her to discover to him the place where her treasures lay concealed; which she had no sooner done, than, contrary to his solemn promise, he confined her to a monastery, which she herself had built in an island; but soon after removed her from thence to the island of Lesbos, where she died of grief. She is greatly extolled, notwithstanding her unnatural conduct towards her son, by all the writers of those times, no doubt, on account of her zeal for the worship of images, and the great pains she took utterly to suppress the heresy, as it was then called, of the iconoclasts. She built a great many monasteries and hospitals for the relief of the poor and aged, and, by many other acts of piety, gained, if the writers of those times are to be credited, both the esteem and affections of her subjects. Her great attachment to the see of Rome, and the indefatigable pains she took to get the doctrine of the iconoclasts condemned in the second council of Nice, by her assembled for that purpose, have so far baffled some writers of that party, that they have not been ashamed to vindicate, even by texts of holy scripture, her unnatural and barbarous conduct towards her son, who perhaps well deserved such treatment, but not at the hands of his mother. Irene was thus deposed in 802, after having reigned ten years with her son, and five alone.

C H A P. XXXIV.

The Roman history, from the promotion of Nicephorus, to the death of Basilus II.

The embassadors who had been sent, as we have related Nicephorus, in the foregoing chapter, by Charles the Great to propose a marriage between him and the empress Irene, in order to unite by that means once more the two empires, were, no doubt, greatly concerned at the unexpected revolution, which happened during their stay in Constantinople, and utterly disconcerted the ambitious views of their master. However, as they were enjoined to conclude a firm and lasting peace with the eastern empire, they readily made their court to the new prince, who being well apprized of the advantages that might accrue to him from the friendship of Charles, received his embassadors in a very obliging manner, and the year following concluded a treaty with him, in virtue of which Charles was acknowledged emperor of the west, and all Italy to the rivers of Vulturnus and Aufidus yielded to him. Nicephorus, in the third year of his reign, caused Nicetas Triphyllius, to whom he was chiefly indebted for his promotion, to be taken off with poison, for no other crime but because he was beloved by the army. He gave several other instances of a most cruel, sanguinary, and covetous temper, which, as they rendered him odious to the people, encouraged Bardanes, governor of one of the eastern provinces, to revolt, and assume the the title of emperor. Michael and Leo, two officers of great reputation in the army, joined him at first; but soon after, finding him unequal to so great a charge, they abandonned him and went over to Nicephorus, who raised them to the first posts in the army. Bardanes, thus forsaken by his friends, sent a submissive message to Nicephorus, and, upon his promising to pardon him, retired to a monastery, and there embraced a religious life. The emperor, pretending to be entirely reconciled to him, invited him in a friendly manner to Constantinople; but on his way to that city, his eyes were plucked out by perfons sent for that purpose. The emperor, to prevent any future attempts of the like nature, and secure the crown to his family, took his son Saturaciis for his partner in the empire, and caused him to be crowned with the usual solemnity. Having thus settled his affairs at home, he marched against the Saracens, who had broken into the eastern provinces; but his army was utterly defeated, and he obliged to save himself by a hameful flight, having narrowly escaped falling into the enemy’s hands. The following year, the Saracens, to the number of three hundred thousand men, invaded the empire anew; and advancing without opposition as far as Tyana, the metropolis of Cappadocia Minor, made themselves masters of that city and several other fortified places, extending their ravages to the very gates of Ancyra in Galatia. Nicephorus marched against them with what forces he could raise; but not daring to venture an engagement, he dispatched emissaries with rich presents to Aaron their kalif, who with much ado was prevailed upon to grant a peace upon the following terms: That the emperor should pay to the Saracens a yearly tribute of thirty thousand pieces of gold, besides three thousand for his own head and as many for that of his son; and that he should not presume to repair such forts as had been dismantled. Ni-cephorus agreed to these terms; but the enemy was no sooner retired, than, with an open breach of the treaty, he rebuilt the forts that had been demolished; which so provoked the Saracens, that they returned the same year, and raged with more fury than ever, putting all to fire and sword, both on the continent and in the island of Cyprus, where they demoliished the churches, and put an incredible number of the inhabitants to the sword. The following year they made a descent upon the island of Rhodes, and took a great number of prisoners; but their fleet suffered much by a violent storm, which overtook them as they were returning home. The same

same year Nicephorus married his son Saturacius to Theophania, a near relation of the late empress Irene, though she had been some time before contracted to another, which gave occasion to great complaints, and encouraged some to conspire against him: but they were all detected and punished with the utmost severity; nay, many persons of great distinction, ecclesiastics as well as laymen, were, upon bare suspicions, dragged to prison, and there either put to death or racked with the greatest cruelty. In the seventh year of his reign, the Bulgarians, making an irruption into the empire, under the conduct of Crumus, their king, surprized Sardica, a city of Moesia, and put the whole garrison, consisting of six thousand men, to the sword. Nicephorus marched against them with a considerable army; but the enemy retiring with their booty at his approach, instead of pursuing them, he returned to Constantiopole, and imposed a new tribute upon the city for the repairing of Sardica; which incensed them to such a degree, that they rose in a tumultuous manner, and attacked the palace, but were repulsed by the emperor’s guards with great slaughter. In the ninth year of his reign, he raised a powerful army, and, marching at the head of it, entered the country of the Bulgarians, destroying all with fire and sword. Crumus, their king, alarmed at his approach, sent embassadors to sue for peace, which he offered to conclude upon terms highly honourable to the empire. But Nicephorus, rejecting them with indignation, pursued his ravages, wasting the country, destroying the cities, and putting all the inhabitants to the sword, who had the misfortune to fall into his hands, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. Crumus, sensibly affected with the calamities of his subjects, sent the emperor a second submissive message, offering to agree to any terms, on condition he would quit his country. But Nicephorus dismissing the embassadors with scorn, Crumus, pushed on by despair, attacked unexpectedly the emperor’s camp; and having forced it, in spite of all opposition, cut off almost the whole army, with the emperor himself, a great number of patricians, and most of the chief officers. Saturacius received a dangerous wound in the neck, but escaped in a litter to Adrianople. All the arms and baggage fell into the enemy’s hands; and the body of Nicephorus being found among the slain, Crumus caus’d his head to be cut off; and after having kept it for some time expos’d to the view of the soldiery, he inclosed the feall in silver, and made use of it instead of a cup. Such was the end of Nicephorus.

rus, after having reigned eight years, as many months, and twenty-six days. He is said to have been strongly inclined to the execrable doctrine of the Manichees, to have denied providence, and to have exceeded all the princes who reigned before him, in lewdness, cruelty, avarice, and all manner of debaucheries.

Saturacius fled, as we observed above, to Adrianople, where he was acknowledged emperor by some of the officers, who had escaped the general slaughter. But as he was not in a condition, on account of his wound, to appear in public, and at the same time knew himself to be universally hated both by the nobility and people, he resolved to confer the empire on his wife Theophania. But, in the mean time, the senate caused Michael, who had married Procopia, sister to Saturacius, to be proclaimed emperor in the circus; which Saturacius no sooner understood, than he retired with his wife to a monastery, where he embraced a religious life, and died soon after, having reigned two months and ten days. Michael, mindful of the oath he had taken to Nicephorus and his son, declined at first the imperial dignity; but being afterwards informed, that Saturacius, the better to secure the crown to his wife, had resolved to deprive him of his fight, he accepted the offer, and was crowned in the great church by Nicephorus the patriarch, after he had by a solemn promise under his own hand obliged himself to maintain the privileges of the church, and to abstain from shedding Christian blood. The new emperor a few days after caused his wife Procopia to be likewise crowned by the patriarch with his son Theophylact, whom he took for his partner in the empire. He was scarce warm in his throne, when the Saracens broke into the empire on one side, and the Bulgarians on the other. The former were defeated and driven back by Leo, who governed the eastern provinces, with the loss of two thousand men. Against the Bulgarians Michael marched in person; but having, after several slight skirmishes, ventured an engagement, his army was utterly defeated, and he obliged to fly back with shame and disgrace to Constantinople. The emperor was affected with this misfortune to such a degree, that he resolved to quit the purple, which required a person of a more warlike and active genius, and retire to a cloyster. Accordingly he earnestly pressed Leo to accept of the empire, who, as he was free from all ambition, inviolably attached to Michael.

Michael, and at the same time sensible of the dangerous state of affairs, was with much ado prevailed upon to comply with his request, though backed by the entreaties of the magistrates, the soldiery, and the patriarch. Michael no sooner understood, that Leo had in the end suffered himself to be proclaimed emperor, than he retired, with his wife Procopia and his children, to the monastery of Pharos, where he took the monastic habit on the eleventh of July 813, after having reigned one year, nine months, and as many days. Thus Theophanes, who lived at this time, and was an eye-witness of what he wrote. But Cedrenus gives us a very different account of the promotion of Leo. According to that writer, Michael had the advantage in the engagement with the Bulgarians, till Leo, who aspired at the empire, drew off the forces under his command; which so disheartened the Romans, that they betook themselves to a disorderly flight, leaving the Bulgarians masters of the field. The emperor, with much ado, escaped to Adrianople, and from thence to Constantinople, attended by a small body of horse. In his absence, Leo, by exclaiming against him as a weak, effeminate, and cowardly prince, prevailed upon the army to revolt from Michael, and offer the empire to himself; which, however, he pretended to decline, till Michael Traulus or Balbus, one of the chief officers of the army, drawing his sword, as it had been agreed on beforehand, threatened him with present death, if he did not immediately comply with the earnest entreaties of the whole army, who, he said, placed their safety and that of the empire in him alone. When news was brought to Constantinople of the revolt of the army and the usurpation of Leo, some of the emperor’s friends advised him to maintain his title, and prepare for a vigorous defence. But the good-natured emperor sharply reprimanded them, declaring, he had rather lose his life, than involve the state in a civil war, which would be inevitably attended with the effusion of much Christian blood. Accordingly he sent to Leo the diadem, the purple robes, and the scarlet shoes, the ensigns of sovereignty, requiring him to come, without the least apprehension of danger, to Constantinople, and take possession of the imperial palace. Thus Cedrenus, to whose authority we should, without the least hesitation, prefer that of Theophanes, were we sure that the latter part of the history, which goes under his name, was done by him; but as some able critics pretend, that he concluded it with the reign reign of Nicephorus, and that the remaining part was added by some other writer, who, favouring Leo, concealed his ambitious practices in obtaining the empire, we will not take upon us to decide whether Leo usurped the sovereignty, or was raised to it by the voluntary abdication of Michael. The new emperor, upon his arrival at Constantinople, took care to have Michael and his wife, who had retired to the same monastery, separated; and therefore confined him to a monastery on the island Prota, and banished Procopia, with her children, to another place, having first caused Theophylaet, their eldest son, to be cruelly maimed, that he might have no issue. He had scarce taken possession of the throne, when the Bulgarians, elated with their late successes, entered Thrace, destroying all with fire and sword. Leo having drawn together what forces he could, marched out against them, and offered them battle; which they not declining, great multitudes were slain on both sides, but at length the Romans, overpowered with numbers, were put to the rout. As they were pursued by the enemy in great disorder, Leo, who held all from a neighbouring eminence, falling unexpectedly upon the barbarians with a revery of chosen men, who attended him, renewed the fight, and in the end obtained an entire victory. Great numbers of the enemy were slain, and more taken prisoners. Some reckon the king himself, by name Crumus, among the former; but others will have him to have been only wounded. However that be, the Bulgarians were so disheartened by this overthrow, that they made no inroads into the empire for some years after. The emperor, having now nothing to fear either from the Bulgarians or the Saracens, who were at variance among themselves, applied himself wholly to the suppressing of the worship that was paid to images. In order to this, he enforced the observance of the council held at Constantinople in 754, under Constantinus Copronymus, and published an edict forbidding any worship to be paid to images, and commanding them to be removed out of the churches. Nicephorus the patriarch, Nicetas a patrician, and one of the empress Irene's relations, Theodorus a monk in great reputation, Theophanes the historian, and many others, were banished for refusing to comply with the emperor's edict. But while the emperor was wholly intent upon redressing the abuses both in the church and state, Michael, surnamed Balbus, or the flammeer, whom he had preferred to the first employments, conspired against

against him, with a design to deprive him of the crown, and place it upon his own head. But the plot being discovered, Michael was apprehended, tried, and condemned to be burnt alive. But as the officers were leading him on Christmas eve, to the place of execution, the empress Theodora, by upbraiding her husband with cruelty and irreligion for not respecting that holy time, when he was to partake of the holy sacrament, prevailed upon him to respite the execution. However, that the criminal might not in the mean time make his escape, the emperor ordered him to be loaded with irons, of which he kept the keys himself. But Michael having, by means of some religious persons, who had been admitted to him, with the emperor's permission, acquainted his accomplices, that he was determined to discover them to Leo, unless they speedily procured his release, alarmed them to such a degree, that they resolved, without loss of time, to put their design in execution. Accordingly, mixing themselves with those who performed divine service in the emperor's chapel, they were admitted early in the morning into the palace, and lay concealed in a corner of the chapel, till the emperor came to his devotions, when, upon a signal agreed on beforehand, they started up; but by mistake, as it was not yet day-light, fell upon the person who presided over the clerks, or, as we may call them, the dean of the chapel. Leo, in the mean time, well apprised of their design, retired to the altar, where he was attacked by the conspirators, now sensible of their mistake; but defended himself with the chain of the incensory, or, as some write, with the crofs, till, one of his hands being cut off, he fell to the ground, when the conspirators rushing upon him, dispatched him with many wounds, and in the end struck off his head. Such was the end of Leo IV. after he had reigned seven years, five months, and fourteen days. He is allowed, even by such as were his avowed enemies on account of his zeal in suppressing the worship of images, to have been a vigilant and active prince, and to have reformed many abuses, that had long prevailed in the state. In conferring employments, he had regard to merit alone, was quite free from avarice, and endowed with many princely qualities; whence the patriarch Nicephorus, who had been banished by him, in hearing the news of his death, could not help owning him to have been a great, though a wicked, prince. The body of the unhappy happy emperor was dragged to the circus, and there exposed for some time to public view. After this, the conspirators having seized on the empress Theodosia, confined her to a monastery, and banished her four sons, viz. Sabbatius, called also Constantine, Basil, Gregory, and Theodosius, to the island of Prota, where they were afterwards made eunuchs by Michael's orders, in which cruel operation Theodosius died. Michael, in the mean time, being set at liberty, and conducted by the conspirators from the prison to the palace, placed himself upon the imperial throne, loaded, as he still was, with his irons, the keys being no-where to be found; at length the bolts being knocked off with a hammer, he repaired to the great church, where he was crowned by the patriarch.

Michael, thus raised to the empire, was a native of Amorium, a city of Phrygia, inhabited chiefly by Jews, and such christians as had been driven from their own countries on account of their heretical opinions. Michael himself observed the Jewish sabbath, denied the resurrection of the dead, and held several other tenets condemned by the catholic church. In the first year of his reign he recalled a great number of bishops, monks, and others, who had been banished by Leo for not complying with his edict forbidding the worship of images, but at the same time summoned them to dispute in a council at Constantinople the point in question. With this summons they refused to comply, alledging, that as the worshipping of images had been already approved of and established by a general council, it could admit of no dispute. This answer greatly provoked the emperor, who nevertheless was so far from proceeding with rigor against them, that he indulged them in the use of images without the city. In the second year of his reign and 823d of the christian æra, a civil war broke out in the east, which involved the empire in endless calamities. It was raised by one Thomas, concerning whom authors are greatly divided in their accounts. According to some, he was meanly born, and at first a menial servant to a senator at Constantinople, whose wife he debauched, and then, to avoid the punishment due to his crime, fled to the Saracens, among whom, after he had continued for the space of twenty-five years, professing their religion, he obtained of their kalif a considerable body of troops, boasting, that he could easily subdue the whole Roman empire. The better to entice the Romans over to his interest, interest, he gave out, that he was Constantine, the son of Irene. Others will have him to have been a man of great power in the east, and inviolably attached to Leo; whose death he resolved to revenge, and with that view took arms. However that be, he was a man of a grave aspect, of extraordinary strength and courage, and acceptable to the soldiers on account of his affable and engaging behaviour. Being well received in the eastern provinces by the inhabitants, who hated Michael, he soon raised a very numerous army, and over-ran, without controul, all Asia, seizing everywhere on the public revenues, and plundering such cities as refused to submit to him. And now being master of all Asia and Syria, he assumed the purple and diadem, and caused himself to be acknowledged as emperor by the patriarch of Antioch. Michael, in the mean time, dispatched all the troops he could assemble against him; but Thomas, meeting them in Asia, gave them a total overthrow; and having with incredible expedition fitted out a strong fleet, he engaged and defeated that of the emperor; and then crossing over into Thrace appeared unexpectedly before Constantinople, not doubting but the inhabitants would open their gates to him at his first approach. But to his great surprize, they received him with most opprobrious language, repulsed him in two successive attacks, and in several sallies killed great numbers of his men. Thomas made the necessary preparations for a third assault, being resolved to make an utmost effort, and attack the city at the same time by sea and land. But a most violent storm arising, when he was upon the point of giving the signal, his fleet was dispersed, and his battering engines overturned and rendered quite useless. This disappointment, and some successful sallies of the besieged, obliged him, as the season was already far advanced, to raise the siege, and put his troops into winter-quarters, but with a resolution to return before the city early in the spring; which he did accordingly: but Michael having in the mean time equipped a fleet and raised a land-army, he met with far greater opposition at his return than he had done before. His army was routed with great slaughter in a sally, and his fleet driven ashore by that of the emperor. The usurper had in his army a commander of great valour and experience; named Gregory, who, having been banished by Michael to the island of Scirus, because he was a near relation of Leo, the late emperor, had in the beginning of the war declared for the usurper, and been entrusted by him with the command. of twelve thousand men; but now observing, that fortune, which had hitherto attended Thomas in all his undertakings, began to forsake him, he resolved to make his peace with Michael, the rather because his wife and children were in his hands. This negotiation was not carried on so privately, but Thomas had timely notice of it, who thereupon leaving a sufficient number of troops before Constantinople to carry on the siege, led the rest against Gregory; and coming up with him, while he was marching away with the forces under his command to join the emperor, defeated his whole party, took him alive, but put him immediately to death, and then returned in triumph to pursue the siege. But in the mean time, Mortagon, king of the Bulgarians, hearing the emperor was besieged in his metropolis, and either pitying his condition, or desirous of gaining his friendship, marched at the head of a numerous army to his assistance. Thomas, when informed of his approach, was some time in suspense, whether he should continue the siege, or march with all his forces against the barbarians, but at length resolved on the latter; and accordingly breaking up the siege, he met and engaged the Bulgarians at a place called Cedocetus, but was by them put to flight with great slaughter. Upon the news of his defeat, his fleet before Constantinople revolted to the emperor; which obliged him to lay aside all thoughts of pursuing the siege, and to retire to Diabesis, a place distant a few furlongs from the city; whence by his parties he laid waste all the neighbouring country. While he lay encamped there, the emperor ordered all his troops to march out against him, under the command of Catalas and Oblianus, whom he received with great bravery, but was overthrown by the treachery of his own men, most of whom went over to the emperor in the heat of the engagement. Thomas, with much ado, escaped to Adrianople, where he was immediately besieged by the emperor’s forces, and at length delivered up to Michael by his own people, no longer able to endure the famine and the unspeakable hardships, to which they were reduced. The emperor, having caused his hands and feet to be cut off, ordered him, thus maimed, to be carried upon an ass round the camp. He died soon after in the utmost agony. Anastafius, his adopted son, who for that honour had forsaken the monastic life, which he professed before, being delivered up to the emperor by the inhabitants of Byvia, met with the same treatment as his father had done. Pavia and Heraclea, two maritime cities of Thrace, which Thomas Thomas had seized, refused to submit, not so much out of affection to him, as out of hatred to the emperor, on account of his opposing the worship of images. But the walls of the former city were overturned by an earthquake, and the latter was taken by storm. Some other cities and castles continued to hold out for some time, but they were all in the end reduced, and the civil war entirely extinguished.

In the mean time, the Saracens, who had settled in Spain and were grown too numerous for that country, taking advantage of the distracted state of the empire, having equipped several ships, dispatched them in quest of some fruitful island, in which they might plant a colony. Apochapsus, who commanded this squadron, having ravaged most of the islands in the Mediterranean without opposition, all the ships and garrisons being gone to the assistance of Thomas, touched in the end at Crete; and being greatly taken with the fertility and pleantness of that island, described it to his countrymen upon his return as a place, to use his expression, flowing with milk and honey. Hereupon the Saracens, having equipped, during the winter, a fleet consisting of forty ships well armed and manned, put to sea early in the spring; and landing in the island, encamped on the promontory Charax, whence Apochapsus sent spies to discover the country, who upon their return informed him, that the island was quite destitute of soldiers, and that he would no-where meet with the least opposition. Hereupon he ordered the fleet to be set on fire, that his men, laying aside all thoughts of returning home, might look upon that island as their native country. The emperor, upon the first notice of this descent, dispatched Damianus with a considerable body of troops to drive the Saracens out of the island. Damianus, being joined by Photinus, advanced, as soon as he had landed his forces, against the enemy, who killed him at the first onset, and put his whole army to flight. Photinus having with much ado made his escape in a light vessel, and carried the news of the overthrow to the emperor. The Saracens, having now no enemy to oppose them, built and fortified a city in a very convenient place, called Chandax, pointed out to them by a monk. From thence they made frequent excursions, and in a short time reduced the whole island, which by its new masters was thenceforth called Chandax, and by others Candia, from the above-mentioned city. This happened in the second year of the reign of Michael Balbus and the 82d of the christian æra. Michael, thinking it would reflect eternal ignominy, if he suffered the Saracens to settle in Crete, as soon as he had put an end to the civil war, dispatched Craterus, with a powerful fleet and a numerous army, to recover the island. Craterus, having landed his men without opposition, fell upon the enemy with great resolution, who received him with equal intrepidity. The fight continued from day-break to noon, the victory inclining to neither side; but soon after the Saracens, great numbers of them being slain and more taken prisoners, began to give ground, and towards the evening fled in great confusion. Had the Romans pursued them, they might have easily, in that consternation, cut them all off to a man, and made themselves masters of their city. But, instead of following the fugitives, and afflicting, without loss of time, the place whether they had all retired, they spent the night in riot and drunkenness, as if the war had been already concluded, without so much as placing a guard or centry to prevent their being surprised. The enemy, apprised of their security, resolved, however fatigued with the duty of the preceding day, not to neglect so favourable an opportunity of being revenged on their conquerors. Accordingly sallying out in the dead of the night, they fell upon them while they were partly intoxicated with wine and partly asleep, and cut them off almost to a man. Craterus, their general, with great difficulty escaped on board a small vessel to the island of Cos. But the prince of the Saracens, not finding his body among the slain, dispatched some vessels with troops after him, who, landing on the island, surprised him, and nailed him to a cross. After this defeat, the emperor, despairing of being able to recover the island of Crete, contented himself with defending the other islands, and refraining the piracies of the Cretan Saracens. Besides the loss of the pleasant and fruitful island of Crete, severall other public calamities happened in this wicked emperor’s reign, viz. great conflagrations, destructive earthquakes, which overturned whole cities, inundations, strange phenomena in the heavens, general dearth and scarcity of provisions, violent storms, &c. which are all ascribed by Cedrenus to the contempt of images. But these calamities did not reclaim him from the loose and dissolute life which he led, without any regard to religion, or the laws. In the sixth year of his reign, his wife being dead, he forced Euphrosyne, the daughter of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, out of a monastery, where she had led from her infancy a recluse life and married.

married her. Soon after, Euphemius, an officer of great interest and authority in the army, falling in love with another sacred virgin, and encouraged by the example of the prince, took her by force out of the monastery and debauched her. Of this outrage her brothers made loud complaints to the emperor, who thereupon ordered the governor of Sicily, where the fact was committed, to examine into the matter; and if he found what was alleged against Euphemius to be true to cut off his nose. To avoid this punishment, Euphemius drew several other officers of the army into a conspiracy; repulsed the governor, when he came to execute his orders; and then flying to the Saracens in Africa, promised to betray Sicily into their hands, and pay them a large tribute, provided they would declare him emperor of the Romans. To this the Saracen governor of Africa readily consented; and having acknowledged him emperor, sent him back with a sufficient number of troops to make good his title. He landed in Sicily without opposition; and advancing to Syracuse, endeavoured, by a flattering speech, to persuade the inhabitants, who stood on the wall, to open their gates to him, and own him for emperor. Among the rest he observed two brothers, who were men of great interest in the city, to pay him great respect and hear him with more attention than the rest; which encouraged him to call them to him. But as he advanced from the rest of his company to meet and salute them, one of them, taking hold of him by the hair, held him till the other cut off his head. The Saracens, however, did not quit the advantage which he had put into their hands; but, being thus introduced by him, made themselves by degrees masters of the whole island; and passing over into Italy landed at Taranto; whence they drove the Romans, and got possession of Calabria and the adjoining provinces. The emperor died soon after of a flux, having reigned eight years, nine months, and seven days; and was buried in the church of the apostles. His death happened on the first of October 829.

He was succeeded by his son Theophylus, who, in the beginning of his reign, to gain the affections of the people and prevent conspiracies, pretended to be a strict observer of justice, and a severe averter of the laws of the empire. Though his father owed both his life and dignity to the murder of Leo, yet he resolved to punish all those who had been any-ways accessory to it, in order to deter others from attempts of the like nature. With this view he summoned the chief of the nobility, and the great officers of the empire, to attend him in the palace Magnaura, or, as it was called from the five towers, Pentapyrgium. When they were assembled, he told them, that his father had in his life-time resolved to reward the eminent services of those, who had been instrumental in his promotion; but since death had prevented him, he thought it incumbent upon himself as the executor of his father, to pay that debt. He therefore desired them to withdraw from the rest into a particular room, where he would examine the merit of each person, and reward him accordingly. Herewith those, who had been accessory to the murder of Leo, readily discovered themselves, in expectation of some great reward. But the emperor having thus got them, convicted by their own confession, into his power, he ordered one of his officers to put the laws against murder in execution, and to punish, according to their deserts, those who had not only shed innocent blood, but had inhumanly massacred the anointed of the Lord within his temple. He then dismissed the assembly, and the officer, pursuant to his orders, punished all those who had conspired against Leo as murderers. After this he sent Euphrosyne back to the monastery, from whence his father had taken her, and applied himself with great diligence to public affairs, hearing once a week all complaints that were brought against his ministers, administering justice with the utmost impartiality, and frequently visiting in person the markets, in order to settle the prices of the necessary provisions. In the third year of his reign, he married his favourite daughter, by name Mary, to Alexius Mafeles, an Armenian by birth, a person of comely and majestic aspect, then in the flower of his age, and endowed with many excellent qualities. As he repose in him an entire confidence, he conferred upon him the dignity of patrician, raised him to the proconsulship, and at last, as he had yet no issue-male of his own, created him Caesar, and sent him at the head of a numerous army to restrain the Saracens, who committed dreadful devastations in Italy. Being attended there with uncommon success, his rivals at court, jealous of the esteem he was in with the emperor and the reputation he had acquired, represented him as one who aspired at the empire, strengthening their malicious suspicions with an old prediction, that A should one day day drive out Th. This Alexius no sooner understood, than he desired leave of Theophylus to retire, and embrace a monastic life. The emperor, who gave no ear to these insinuations denied his request, and commanded him to keep his rank and power. However, Theophylus having a son soon after, and his daughter, who was married to Alexius, dying about the same time, he was at length prevailed upon, by the repeated importunities of his son-in-law, to comply with his request and suffer him to retire. Besides Alexius, the emperor had two other eminent commanders, viz. Manuel and Theophobus. The former had been raised, by Leo and the late emperor Michael, to the first posts in the army. The latter was the natural son of a Persian ambassador, descended from the blood royal of that nation, who, dying soon after the birth of his son, left him at Constantinople, where he was educated after the Roman manner. All those of the royal family of Persia being either destroyed or driven out by the Saracens, who had made themselves masters of their country, the few Persians, who had outlived the general slaughter of their nation, hearing of Theophobus, sent to the emperor, desiring him for their king. But Theophylus chose rather to raise him to the rank of a patrician, and give him one of his sisters in marriage, giving at the same time, by a law enacted for that purpose, all his subjects leave to intermarry with the Persians; which brought great numbers of that nation over to the Romans, who formed them into one body, called the Persian legion, from which the emperor promised himself no small service in the expedition, which he was about to undertake against the Saracens, who had invaded the Roman territories. Against them the emperor, attended by Manuel and Theophobus, marched in person; but in the battle which ensued, the Romans, after a most bloody and obstinate contest, gave ground and fled in the utmost confusion. The emperor, with his guard, two thousand Persians, and Theophobus, gained a neighbouring hill, where he was immediately surrounded by the enemy, who exerted their utmost efforts to take him prisoner, his own men striving with equal resolution and intrepidity to defend him. The day being thus spent, when night came on, the Romans, by the advice of Theophobus, filled all on a sudden the air with loud acclamations, founding at the same time their trumpets and other warlike instruments.

The Saracens, deceived by this stratagem, and concluding they had received some reinforcement, retired in great haste, left they should be surrounded; and gave the emperor an opportunity of making his escape to the rest of the army. The Persians were so taken with the conduct of Theophilus on this occasion, that they addressed the emperor, begging he would suffer them to serve under him in a separate body, which was readily granted. The following year, he was attended with better success; for having engaged the Saracens, he gained a complete victory, killed great numbers of them, and took above twenty thousand prisoners, whom he carried in triumph to Constantinople. This encouraged him to make another attempt the next spring; but his army was utterly defeated, and he himself in great danger of being taken prisoner, while he advanced too far into the enemy’s ranks. Manuel, apprised of the danger he was in, broke through to him with a body of chosen men, in order to bring him off. But he refusing to retire, left by his retreat he should discourage his army, Manuel presenting his sword to his breast, and telling him, that the state would suffer more by his captivity than his death, threatened to kill him, unless he retreated with him to the rest of the army. The emperor then complied, Manuel and his chosen band opening him a way through the midst of the enemy. Theophylus had, at first, a just sense of this eminent piece of service, styling Manuel his deliverer; but afterwards, envying him the reputation he had thereby acquired, and ashamed of being indebted to one of his subjects for his safety, he readily gave ear to the malicious insinuations of some courtiers, accusing him of ambitious views, and privately resolved to deprive him of his right; of which Manuel being seasonably informed by the emperor’s cup-bearer, he fled to the Saracens, and, upon condition he should not be obliged to change his religion, entered into their service, and was soon raised to the highest honours, and trusted with the command of their armies against the Cermatæ, a neighbouring nation, whom he overcame in several battles. The fame of his great exploits reaching Constantinople, the emperor, grieved for the loss of so brave and faithful a commander, resolved to bring him back by any means. Accordingly he wrote a letter to him with his own hand, inviting him home, and promising to reinstate him in all his honours and employments. This letter being privately conveyed to Manuel by a monk, he received it with unspeakable unspeakable joy, and waited only a favourable opportunity of complying with the emperor's kind invitation. He had hitherto declined fighting against the Romans; but now, pretending a desire of being revenged on those by whom he had been unjustly accused to the emperor, he desired leave of Ishmael, prince of the Saracens, to make war upon the Romans in Cappadocia. Ishmael, highly pleased with this demand, not only gave him the command of a powerful army, but, as he had already given signal proofs of his fidelity, appointed the young prince his son to serve under him. Being arrived in Cappadocia, while the army lay encamped at a convenient place for the execution of his design, he went out with the young prince, under pretence of hunting; and being met, as had been agreed on before-hand between him and the governor of the province, by some Roman troops, he acquainted the prince with his design, desiring him to return to the army and acquaint them with it. From Cappadocia he immediately repaired to Constantinople, where he was received with great solemnity by the emperor in the church of Belcherna, raised to the highest post in the army, and chosen to stand as godfather to his son Michael, whom he soon after took for his partner in the empire. The following year, the Saracens invaded Cappadocia under a general of their own nation, and the emperor marched against them in person; but both armies, seized, while they were already in flight of each other, with a panic fear, betook themselves to flight, and returned home, without coming to an engagement. The following year 837, Theophylus invaded Syria, ravaged the country far and wide, and having made himself master of several strong-holds, returned in triumph to Constantinople, leaving Theophobus to command the army. In his absence the Persians, now encreased to thirty thousand, depending upon their strength and numbers, seized on Theophobus at Sinope, and, notwithstanding all his entreaties, protestations, and arguments, declared him emperor. Theophobus gave the emperor private notice of what had passed, affurred him of his loyalty, though he had, in appearance, accepted of the imperial dignity, and laid hold of the first opportunity that offered to make his escape to Constantinople, where he was received by the emperor with the greatest demonstrations of kindness, and continued in his former honours and employments. The rebellious Persians were, at his request, pardoned and received into favour; but dispersed into several provinces a. Theophylus,

Phylus, in ravaging Syria, had, notwithstanding the earnest entreaties of the prince of the Saracens, destroyed Sozopetra, the place of his nativity; which provoked him to such a degree, that, breathing nothing but revenge, he raised a mighty army, ordering every soldier to engrave upon his shield the word Amorium, the birth-place of Theophylus and capital of Cilicia, which he was resolved, at all events, to destroy. The emperor, informed of these mighty preparations, raised what forces he could, and marched with them to Dorylaeum, distant about three days journey from Amorium. There, in a council of war, several officers advised him to decline an engagement with the Saracens, whose army was far more numerous than that of the Romans, and to remove the inhabitants of Amorium to some other place; but the emperor, imagining such a proceeding would reflect no small disgrace upon him, resolved to venture all in the defence of his native city; and accordingly sent thither a strong detachment, under the command of Actius, general of the eart, Theodorus, Craterus, Theophilus Bubutzicus, and other experienced generals. In the mean time, the prince of the Saracens dispatched his son, with ten thousand Turks and a strong party of Armenians, to try the strength of the emperor's forces. The two armies met at a place called Dazymenum; whereupon an engagement ensuing, the Saracens were at first put to the rout; but the Romans, in pursuing the fugitives, were so called by the arrows of the Turks, that they not only gave over the pursuit, but betook themselves to a disorderly flight. The Persians, however, though abandoned by the rest of the army, stood their ground, and surrounding the emperor, made head against the enemy, till night coming on gave them an opportunity of retiring. The prince of the Saracens, informed of his son's success, marched directly to Amorium, and being there joined by the young prince, laid close siege to the place, which, after a long and obstinate resistance, was in the end betrayed to him by one of the inhabitants, named Badiates, who, upon some discontent, had abjured the christian religion. The Saracens, enraged at the resolute opposition they had met with, put most of the men to the sword, carried all the women and children into captivity, and levelled the city with the ground. The emperor was so affected with the destruction of the place, that, falling into a deep melancholy, he abstained from all nourishment, drinking nothing but snow-water, which threw him into a dysentery. Being apprised that his end approached, he caused himself to be carried to Magnaura; and having summoned summoned the senate and chief officers of the empire to meet him there, he exhorted them in a pathetic speech to continue faithful to his wife and son, and protect them from all treachery. After this, sinking under the affliction of his mind and distemper of his body, he fainted away and expired, having reigned twelve years, three months, and twenty days. Joannes Curopalates, whom we have followed in the history of this prince’s reign, as the nearest to those times, tells us, that, when he was at the point of death, he commanded the head of Theophobus, who had been arrested upon some groundless suspicions, to be cut off and brought to him; and that, touching it with his hand, he expired, uttering these words, Neither shall I be henceforth Theophylus, nor thou Theophobus. But Zonaras and Cedrenus write, that he was put to death by one of the emperor’s officers, without his knowledge. He professed a greater enmity to images, and persecuted with greater severity, than any of his predecessors had done, those who worshipped them. Hence he is painted by the writers of those times in the blackest colours; but his actions, even as they are related by his sworn enemies, speak him a prince endowed with many excellent qualities, an exact observer of justice, a true lover of his people, and an utter enemy to covetousness. Of the latter Cedrenus gives us the following instance: having one day observed from his palace a ship of great burden fraught with merchandise entering the harbour of Constantinople, he asked the mariners, To whom the cargo belonged? They answering, To the empress; he replied with great indignation, God has made me a prince, and my wife a merchant! Was ever any emperor before married to a merchant? Having thus spoken, he commanded the mariners to come ashore, and fire to be set to the vessel, saying, If princes apply themselves to trade, their subjects must starve. He beautified the city of Constantinople with many stately edifices, and fortified it with new walls, which could not, on account of their height, by any art be scaled. He banished all loose and scandalous women out of the city, being a great enemy to all manner of dissoluteness, and a pattern of the antient Roman temperance, which he endeavoured to revive by several wholesome laws.

Theophylus was succeeded by his son Michael; but, Michael III., as he was then only six years old, his mother Theodora took the regency.

took upon her the administration; which she began by exerting her zeal for the worshiping of images, recalling all those who had been banished on that account in the late reign, and banishing such as differed in opinion from her. She drove from his see John the patriarch of Constantinople, and placed Methodius, a monk and zealous patron of images in his room, ordering the second council of Nice, in which the worship of images was approved of and established, to be observed throughout the empire. Having thus, in a few years, utterly suppressed the Iconocasts, whose doctrine had prevailed in Constantinople and most cities of the east, for the space of one hundred and twenty years, she fell in the next place upon the Manichees, of whom no fewer than an hundred thousand are said to have been destroyed, which drove the rest to despair and rebellion, having one Carboes of that sect for their leader; who, hearing that his father had been crucified on account of his persuasion, fled with four thousand of the same sect to the Saracens, and opened them a passage into the Roman territories, where they ravaged and unpeopled whole provinces. In the mean time, the emperor, having attained the twentieth year of his age, began to think of governing by himself, being instigated thereunto by Bardas, brother to Theodora, who promised himself mighty advantages from a change of affairs; but despairing of being able to succeed in his designs, so long as Manuel and Theoctistus, whom the late emperor had appointed tutors to his son, continued near his person, he resolved, in the first place, to remove them by some means or other. He had scarce taken this resolution, when a misunderstanding arose between those two faithful ministers; which Bardas improved with such art, that Manuel quitting the court, retired to a private life. He being removed, Bardas easily persuaded the emperor, that Theoctistus, having nothing left in view than the empire, designed to marry either the empress, or one of her daughters, and to render him incapable of governing, by depriving him of his sight. Upon these malicious, and altogether groundless, insinuations, Theoctistus was, by the young prince’s orders, apprehended, dragged to prison, and there most inhumanly murdered. Michael and Bardas resolved to finish what they had begun, by removing the empress, who, well apprized of their design, to spare them the crime of shedding more blood, determined to retire of her own accord. Accordingly, having summoned the senate, she laid before them the present condition of the treasury, to obviate, by

by that means, the extravagant expences of her son, and at the same time to shew them how careful and frugal she had been during her administration; for she had, by a commendable economy, not only spared the immense treasure left by her husband, but greatly improved it. After this, she resigned her power, and quitted the court, to the great satisfaction of her brother and son, now at liberty to act without restraint or controul. However, lest he should attempt to resume the power she had so readily quitted, Michael ordered her and her three daughters to be shut up in a monastery, where she died soon after of grief. This happened in 854, after Theodora had governed the state for the space of fourteen years. Michael, thus free from all restraint, abandoned himself to the most infamous debaucheries, taking pride in imitating Nero, whom he proposed to himself for his pattern, and even seemed to exceed in all manner of wickedness. He, in a short time, squandered away the immense treasure left him by his mother, being always attended by a crew of most extravagant, debauched, and profligate wretches, whom, to expose to ridicule the most sacred things, he often caused to appear in copes and other vestments, in which priests used to officiate, and in that apparel to imitate the most holy functions and ceremonies. One Gryllus, the most profligate of the crew, he styled patriarch; others he called metropolitan; and took to himself the title of one of the chief bishops. Thus attended, he used to walk in broad daylight, as in procession, through the streets, imitating and de-riding the patriarch and his clergy. Having once caused the infamous Gryllus to be apparelled like the patriarch, he sent for his mother in the name of Ignatius, who then held that see. The empress came immediately; but as she fell down upon her knees to crave his blessing, Gryllus, discovering himself, derided the piety of the good empress with indecent gestures, applauded with a loud laugh of the whole assembly. The dissolute prince, having in a short time wasted all his treasures, was reduced to the necessity of melting down and coining certain trees of gold, which had been made in the late reign by a bishop named Leo, the greatest man of his age, and were the admiration of all who beheld them; for among the boughs were dispersed several golden birds, which, by the help of an engine, sung melodiously, while the spectators were at the same time no less agreeably surprised and frightened.

frightened by the roaring of a golden lion, effected by the same artifice. The prodigal emperor had likewise disposed of the imperial robes, and other curiosities, for which the palace was famous, had he not been prevented by death. In the year 855, he undertook an expedition against the Saracens, and laid siege to a city of theirs on the Euphrates; but the besieged falling out upon the Romans, while they were at their devotions on a Sunday, put the whole army to flight, and made themselves masters of their camp and all their baggage, the emperor himself having with much ado made his escape. Two years after, the Saracens, entering with an army of thirty thousand men the Roman dominions, put the emperor to flight, though at the head of forty thousand Thracians and Macedonians. The loss of this battle, however, was soon repaired by the good fortune of Petronas, the emperor's brother, who falling unexpectedly upon the Saracens in the neighbourhood of Ephesus, cut off the caliph himself and his whole army, took his son prisoner, and returned in triumph to Constantinople. In 860, he raised his uncle Bardas, who had hitherto governed with an absolute sway, to the dignity of Caesar, in which high station he acted in a most arbitrary manner, without the least regard to the laws and customs of the empire. He divorced his wife, without being able to lay anything to her charge, and married his own niece. Hereupon the holy patriarch Ignatius refused to communicate with him on the feast of the epiphany; which provoked him to such a degree, that having assembled a synod at Constantinople, he suborned several false witnesses, who accused Ignatius of having murdered his predecessor Methodius; upon which he was deposed and thrown in prison, Photius being raised to the patriarchal see in his room; which occasioned great disturbances at Constantinople. In 867, the emperor, at the persuasion of Bardas, who ruled with an absolute sway, undertook an expedition against the Saracens, who had settled in Crete, whence they were continually infecting the coasts of the empire, and made this year a descent upon Thrace, penetrating far into the country, and committing everywhere dreadful ravages. Against them the emperor marched in person, attended by Bardas; and arriving at a place called Chorus, ordered his army to encamp there. The servants of Bardas, whether on purpose or unadvisedly, is uncertain, pitched their master's tent on a hill, which overlooked the emperor's pavilion placed in the plain. This the emperor seemed to resent; and the enemies of Bardas

at court, laying hold of that opportunity to convince the prince how much reason he had to be jealous of so insolent and ambitious a favourite, incensed him to such a degree, that he gave them private orders to dispatch him; which they did accordingly on the first of April of the present year. The soldiers, upon the news of his death, began to mutiny, and would have revenged it upon the emperor himself, had he not privately retired from the army, and returned to Constantinople. The ruin of Bardas made room for Basilius, the emperor's great chamberlain, and the chief author and promoter of the late murder; for the emperor, who had an utter aversion to all manner of busines and application, immediately committed to him the whole management of public affairs, and soon after, that is, on the twenty-sixth of May of the same year, declared him his partner in the empire. Basilius was born in Macedon, but an Armenian by decent, and, according to Cedrenus, descended from the royal family of the Artaczæ; but others affirm, he was come of mean and obscure parents. At the sacking of Adrianople by Crumus king of the Bulgarians, being then a child, he was carried into captivity with his parents; but set at liberty upon the conclusion of the peace. As he was tall in stature, of a comely aspect, and well-shaped, Theophilizes, a nobleman of great distinction, took him into his family, and appointed him his protosтратar, that is, his gentleman of the horse. Having soon after tamed an unruly horse belonging to the emperor, he was, by the interest of Bardas, taken into the emperor's service, and raised to the post of master of the horse; which giving him an opportunity of conversing often with the prince, he gained, by degrees, a great ascendant over him, and was advanced to the high office of great chamberlain. Hereupon Bardas, jealous of the credit he was in with the emperor, and looking upon him no longer as his creature, but his rival, resolved on his destruction. But Basilius, apprised of his design, was beforehand with him, as we have related above. Basilius, being upon the death of Bardas advanced to the imperial dignity, did all that lay in his power to redress the many abuses that had crept into the state, and to reclaim Michael from his vicious courses; but the dillolute prince was so far from following his wholesome counsels, that he resolved to rid himself of so troublesome a censor; which hastened on his own ruin: for Basilius, finding he could by no other means save himself, he is murdered.

fals, but by destroying his colleague, entered one night his room, while he was drunk and asleep; and, with the assistance of some others privy to his design, first cut off both his hands as he held them up, and then dispatched him with many wounds, after he had reigned fourteen years with his mother, and five years three months alone.

Basilius, now sole master of the empire, governed with great justice and moderation, preferring such only as were persons of known probity, and allowing all his subjects free access to him; which greatly endeared him to his people, who looked upon him rather as their father than their prince. However, in the very beginning of his reign, a conspiracy was formed against him by George and Symbadius, two patricians; but, it being seasonably discovered, their eyes were put out, and their accomplices banished. To obviate any future attempts of the same nature, in the second year of his reign he raised his eldest son Constantine to the imperial dignity, and in the third he created Leo and Alexander, his second and third sons, Cæsars. As for his fourth son, by name Stephen, he caused him to take orders, with a design to raise him to the patriarchal see. His four daughters took the religious habit in the monastery of St. Euphemia, where they led exemplary lives. Having thus settled his domestic affairs, he resolved to make war upon the Manichees. We have observed above, that in the late reign one Carbeas, a Manichee, fled, with four thousand of the same sect, to the Saracens, with a design to revenge the death of his father, who had been crucified on account of his persuasion. Great numbers of the persecuted Manichees flocking to him for shelter, he made frequent inroads into the Roman territories from three strong-holds in Armenia, viz. Arganum, Armera, and Tephrica, which had been yielded to them by the Saracens. Against these Manichees Basilius marched in person, laid waste their country, took or killed their best commanders, and returned with an immense booty to Constantinople; which city he entered in triumph. The following year, the Manichees, resolved to revenge the losses they had sustained, broke unexpectedly into the empire, under the command of Chrysochir; but being met by the imperial troops, they were almost to a man cut off, with their leader, whose head was sent to Constantinople. By this defeat the strength of the Saracens was so broken... broken that they were never afterwards in a condition of molesting the empire, as they had done for several years together. Encouraged with his success against the Manichees, he entered Syria the following year 880, attended by his eldest son Constantine, recovered several strong-holds out of the hands of the Saracens, and took an incredible number of prisoners. On his return he made himself master of Caesarea, the metropolis of Cappadocia, and of several other strong-holds, which he levelled with the ground. The prisoners he took in this expedition were so numerous, that not being able to spare sufficient forces to guard them, he commanded multitudes of them to be put to the sword; which struck such terror into the Saracens, that some of their governors not only submitted, but joined the emperor against their own nation. The African Saracens and those of Crete, attempting to invade the empire, were likewise defeated with great slaughter, and the fleet of the former utterly destroyed by Nazar the Roman, admiral. These extraordinary advantages were, in some degree, counterbalanced by the loss of Syracuse, which the Saracens of Carthage took and destroyed. Adrian, a patrician, who had been sent to relieve it, arriving too late, the emperor upon his return to Constantinople, caused him to be dragged from the great church, where he had taken sanctuary, and sent him into exile. Basilius, at such times as he was not engaged in wars, busied himself in building and repairing churches, of which Cedrenus mentions a great number. Zonaras blames him for erecting and dedicating so many churches to the honour of St. Michael, as if he had designed thereby to expiate the murder of the emperor Michael. His eldest son Constantine being dead, he raised his second son Leo to the imperial dignity, who being offended at the great sway which Theodorus Santabarenus, by profession a monk, but commonly reputed a magician, bore at court, endeavoured to remove him from the emperor's presence. Of this the jealous monk was soon apprised, and therefore resolved to destroy him. With this view, pretending to have private intelligence of a conspiracy against Basilius, which was to be put in execution while he was hunting, he first prevailed the young prince privately to arm himself and some of his attendants, that he might be ready to oppose any attempt upon the life of his father; and then hastening to the emperor, told him in great consternation, that his his son designed to murder him; that his design was to be put in execution the first time he went out to hunt; and that, if he caused him to be searched, he would find him armed accordingly. The emperor, giving ear to the wicked and malicious insinuations of the monk, ordered his son to be searched; and a dagger being found under his garments, committed him to close prison in an apartment of the palace, where his eyes had been put out at the instigation of the monk, had not the patriarch and the senate interposed in his behalf. However, he was long kept under close confinement; but at length released, at the earnest and repeated entreaties of the senate, and restored to his former dignity. Cupoplates tells us, that the emperor having forbidden the senate to mention to him the young prince’s name, or make any further application in his favour, while he was one day entertaining several of the nobility, a parrot, which hung up in a cage in the room, in imitation of some, who used to lament there the unfortunate prince’s condition, cried out all on a sudden, Alas, unhappy Leo! His friends, laying hold of that opportunity, as if the bird reproached them with their neglect, notwithstanding the emperor’s prohibition, renewed their former applications; to which Basilius at length yielded. Basilius not long after died, having reigned eighteen years, ten months, and seven days. Cedrenus writes, that he was carried off by a diarrhoea; but Zonaras tells us, that while he was hunting, a stag thrusting his horns under his girdle, and lifting him up from the ground, shook him with such violence, that he died soon after. The same writer adds, that one of the emperor’s attendants having disengaged him from the stag, by cutting his girdle, he, instead of rewarding him, caused his head to be cut off, for drawing his sword in the presence of his sovereign. But of this no mention is made either by Cedrenus or Cupoplates. Some pretend, that before he died, he embraced a monastic life, but without devesting himself either of his power, or the ensigns of majesty. It is certain, that towards the latter end of his reign, he addicted himself entirely to the conversation of monks, and to works of piety. To his son Leo, whom he appointed his successor, he left, with the empire, some excellent rules or maxims of government, comprised in sixty-six chapters, the initial letters of which form the following sentence; “Basilius, emperor of the Romans in Christ, to Leo, his dear son and colleague in the empire.”

7 Curopalat, in Annaït.
Chap. 34. The Roman History.

The maxims contained therein are truly worthy of a great prince and a christian philosopher. Basilius made a new collection of the laws, known by the name of basilicæ, that is, royal or imperial laws; for they did not take their name, as some have imagined, from the emperor Basilius, by whose orders they were compiled. They were written in the Greek tongue, the Latin, in which the laws of Justinian were compiled, being at this time scarce understood in the eastern empire. Basilius is, by all the ancient writers, deservedly ranked among the best emperors.

Basilius was succeeded by his son Leo, whom he had taken for his partner in the empire, upon the death of his eldest son Constantine. The new prince was a great lover of learning, and to well verified in all the branches of literature, that he deservedly acquired, as Aritonianus had done, the surname of Philosophus. His first care was to punish Theodorus Santabarenus the monk, whom he ordered to be whipt in an ignominious manner, and then banished him to Athens, where his eyes were put out. Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, had favoured Theodorus, and conspired with him to raise a kinsman of his own to the throne; he had besides raised great disturbances in the church; for which crimes he was, by Leo's orders, deposed, and banished into Armenia, Stephen, the emperor's brother, being raised to the patriarchal see in his room. To shew his gratitude to the emperor Michael, who had first preferred his father, and had been murdered by him, he caused his body to be conveyed with extraordinary pomp from the monastery of Chrysopolis, where it had been interred, to the church of the Apostles in Constantinople, and there to be deposited in a stately monument of marble. In the year 893, the eighth of Leo's reign, a war broke out between the Romans and Bulgarians on the following occasion: A great trade had been long carried on between the two nations, and the public mart was kept at Constantinople, whence it was, at the request of some merchants, removed to Thessalonica. There the collectors of the customs oppressing with new and unlawful impositions the Bulgarian merchants, Simeon their king having first applied in vain to the emperor for redress, resolved to do himself justice; and accordingly, entering the Roman territories at the head of a powerful army, ravaged and laid waste the country as far as Macedon, where he was met by the Roman army, under the command of Procopius Crenites and Curticius, who were both cut off, with most of their men, in the engagement that ensued. Simeon, having taken in in the pursuit a great number of prisoners, caused their noses to be cut off, and sent them back thus deformed to Constantinople. The emperor, highly provoked at this outrage, prevailed upon the Ungri or Hungarians, whom our author styles Turks, to invade the country of the Bulgarians on one side, while he entered it on the other. Against the Hungarians Simeon marched in person; but was by them utterly defeated, the flower of his army being cut off, and he himself with much ado escaping to a city named Dorostolium, whence he sent embassadors to Leo suing for a peace; which was readily granted him upon very honourable terms. But the emperor's forces were no sooner withdrawn, than Simeon fell unexpectedly upon the Hungarians; and having put them to flight, ravaged their country, destroying all with fire and sword. Leo, provoked at this breach of the treaty, and more at his new and unreasonable demands, resolved to fall upon him with the whole strength of the empire, and utterly destroy him. A powerful army was accordingly raised, and sent into Bulgaria, under the conduct of Catocalon and Theodosius a patrician. But Simeon, who carefully watched their motions, falling unexpectedly upon them, cut most of them in pieces, with Theodosius and a great number of officers of distinction; which obliged the emperor to submit to the best terms he could obtain. While Leo was engaged in these wars abroad, several conspiracies were formed against him at home; which, however, were feasonably discovered, and the conspirators sent into exile, the emperor being averse to the shedding of blood. In 901, the empress Theophano, or, as others call her, Theophania, being dead, the emperor married one Zoe, the most beautiful woman of her age, whom he had kept as his concubine in his wife's life-time, and caused her to be crowned with the usual solemnity, conferring at the same time on her father, by name Zantzas, the title of father to the emperor. Zoe did not long enjoy her new dignity, and, upon her death, Leo married to his third wife a lady of extraordinary beauty, named Eudocia; but she dying in child bed, together with the infant, Leo, who had yet no issue male to succeed him, married to his fourth wife another Zoe, who brought him a son, called Constantine. This fourth marriage, which was then held unlawful, gave rise to great disturbances and divisions in the church of Constantinople; for Nicolaus Mysticus, at that time patriarch, not only declared against the marriage, but excommunicated the emperor; who thereupon, after having earnestly begged, but in vain, to be restored to the communion of the church, confined the patriarch to a monastery, and placed one Euthymius Synkellos in his room. Some of the clergy adhered to Nicolaus, and others to Euthymius; which occasioned a schism in the church. Though Euthymius restored the emperor to the communion of the faithful, yet he resolutely opposed him, when, by the advice of the senate he was about to publish an edict, declaring it lawful to marry the fourth time. Leo had formerly published an edict, subjecting those who married thrice to the penalties which had been decreed against them by some antient councils, and the clergy would not suffer him to revoke that edict. Some time before his fourth marriage, as he was going on Whitunday in a solemn procession to the church of St. Mocius, as was customary on that day, a person of a mean condition, watching that opportunity, just as he entered the church, gave him such a blow on the head with a club, that he fell to the ground, and those about him believed him dead; and truly he had been killed upon the spot, had not the violence of the blow been broken by a chandelier, which hung in the way. Alexander, the emperor’s brother, was thought to have been privy to this attempt; but no proof could be adduced against him, the traitor, though tortured in a most cruel manner, obstinately refusing to discover his accomplices. As they could extort nothing from him, he was burnt alive in the circus, after his hands and feet had been cut off. The following year 902, the sixteenth of Leo’s reign, the Saracens, having equipped a mighty fleet, took Tauronimium in Sicily, reduced the island of Lemnos, and, ravaging without control the coasts of Asia, threw the imperial city itself into great consternation. In the end of the summer, they laid siege to Thessalonica, which they took, and would have destroyed, had it not been redeemed with a large sum by Simeon, one of the emperor’s secretaries, who was on that account raised to the rank of a patrician. Leo, not able to make head against the Saracens at sea, raised a powerful army, which he sent into the east, under the conduct of Eustathius Argyrus and Andronicus Ducas, in order to attack them by land; which they did with great success, having gained several victories over them. However, the year following, they invaded with a mighty army the Roman territories; tories; which obliged the emperor to dispatch Himerius and Andronicus Ducas against them. They were both generals of great courage, experience, and conduct; but a fatal misunderstanding between them, which was owing to the malicious intrigues of one Samonas, put a stop to the progress of their arms. Samonas, a Saracen by birth, and, formerly chamberlain to the emperor, having discovered a conspiracy, had been on that account, advanced to the first employments in the state. Having by that means acquired immense wealth, he attempted to escape into his own country, carrying with him his treasures; but was stopped upon the road, and brought back to Constantinople by Constantine Ducas, the son of Andronicus. The emperor, provoked at his thus abandoning him, notwithstanding the many favours he had heaped upon him, kept him for some time under close confinement; but in the end restored him to his former rank and honours. As Samonas bore an irreconcilable hatred to Andronicus, on account of his son Constantine, by whom he had been intercepted on his way home, he prevailed upon one of that general's intimate friends, with a large sum, to warn him by letter not to join Himerius, who, he said, had orders from the emperor to put out his eyes, as soon as he had him in his power. Andronicus, giving credit to this letter, refused to join Himerius, who nevertheless engaged the Saracens, and gave them a total overthrow. Andronicus, dreading the emperor's indignation, seized a castle near Iconium, called Cabala, with a design to revolt; which Samonas no sooner understood, than making use of all his authority at court to his destruction, he prevailed upon the emperor, with his artful insinuations, to declare Andronicus a traitor, and to dispatch a strong army against him, under the command of Iberitzas Gregorias. Hereupon Andronicus despairing of pardon, fled to the Saracens, by whom he was received with the greatest demonstrations of kindness and esteem. Leo, greatly concerned for the loss of so brave a commander, who had hitherto served him with much honour and integrity, and dreading him as an enemy, resolved to persuade him, if possible, to return home. With this view he released a Saracen captive, on condition he delivered to Andronicus a letter, wherein the emperor invited him home, promised to restore him to his former honours, and gave him repeated assurances of his friendship and esteem; but the captive, bribed by Samonas, instead of conveying the letter to Andronicus, delivered it to the caliph, who immediately cau-

the rest who had attended him in his flight, to be thrown into prison, where they were treated with the utmost cruelty. Andronicus soon perished under the hardships he endured; several others purchased their liberty by renouncing their religion; but Constantine, the son of Andronicus, made his escape with a small number of attendants, and though pursued, sometimes by fighting, and sometimes by casting gold in the way, and by that means diverting the greedy soldiery, got safe to Constantinople, where he was kindly received by the emperor, and feasted upon his arrival in the golden room. We are told, that as he was departing, when the banquet was over, the emperor, calling him back, warned him not to suffer himself to be so far misled by the omen of his name as to aspire at the empire; adding, that he had been assured by those who could fortell things of that nature, that his own son Constantine was destined by heaven to the empire; and that, if Ducas ever attempted the imperial dignity, his head would inevitably be cut off, and brought through the gate of that very place, where he was now treated with so much honour and magnificence. The event confirmed the truth of this prediction, as we shall relate anon. About this time, Samonas the emperor’s chief favourite, who had hitherto governed with an absolute sway, was at length disgraced on the following occasion: He had recommended a youth, named Constantine, by birth a Paphlagonian, to wait on the empress, who, being greatly taken with his address and other good qualities, used all her interest to prefer him. This gave no small jealousy to Samonas, who, apprehending he might in time be supplanted by this new favourite, did all that lay in his power to remove him; but finding all his efforts ineffectual, he arrogantly accused the empress of too much familiarity with him, and even had the boldness to publish a libel against the emperor himself, who, finding him to be the author of it, confined him to a monastery; and appointed his rival Constantine great chamberlain in his room. In 911, the twenty-sixth and last year of his reign, the Saracens, under the conduct of Damianus a Tyrian and Leo of Tripolis, committing dreadful ravages, on the coasts and in the islands of the Ægean sea, Himerius was sent with a powerful fleet against them; but in a sea-fight near the island of Samos, the Roman navy was utterly defeated, Himerius himself having with much difficulty escaped.

sca ped to Mitylene. The emperor did not long outlive this calamity; but died of the colic on the eleventh of May of the present year, after having reigned twenty five years and three months. He left behind him only one son, by name Constantine; but, as he was scarce five years old, he bequeathed the empire to his brother Alexander, after having earnestly entreated him to leave it at his death to his son, Constantine, whom he recommended to his care. Leo is allowed on all hands to have been a prince of great prudence and uncommon penetration in the management of public affairs. He is highly extolled by the ecclesiastic writers, on account of his zeal for the purity of the catholic faith, and by them compared to the most zealous and vigilant among their bishops. As he was a man of great learning, he left several works behind him, viz. a letter to Omarus king of the Saracens, concerning the mysteries and truth of the christian religion, and the heresies and blasphemies of the Saracens; a book of military discipline, which had been translated into Latin; another on hunting; several theological and historical tracts, still to be seen, the strangely maimed and corrupted, in the Vatican library; a circular letter, which, in imitation of the bishops, he wrote to all his subjects, encouraging them to the practice of every christian virtue; but as he applied himself above all to the study of the law, he new-modelled the Roman jurisprudence. His father Basiliius had, in the year 870, with the assistance of his two sons Constantine and Leo, published an epitome of Justinian's code, which he called "procheiron." This work, which consisted of forty titles, is still to be found among the manuscripts in the Vatican library. It is by some ascribed to Basiliius, Constantine, and Leo, by others only to Leo and Constantine, and by some to Leo alone; whence Cujacius and other civilians conclude it to have been revised by Leo, and brought into a better form. Leo, not satisfied with that, published, about the year 886, his basilicæ, divided into sixty books and six volumes. In this great work the emperor followed the order which Justinian had observed in his laws; for it was compiled from his code, edicts, novellæ, and from the constitutions of the succeeding emperors down to Basiliius, whatever was superfluous, or had been abrogated by the custom of after-times, being retrenched. The basilicæ were no sooner published, than the books of Justinian were quite laid aside, both in the schools and court, of justice. Leo dying, his...

his son Constantine revised and corrected the basilicae, which had been published by his father, and ordered them, thus corrected to be made use of both at the bar and in the schools. The basilicae of Leo were called prioris, and those of Constantine posteriores; but the latter alone were in force, and continued to be the foundation of the Greek jurisprudence to the end of the empire.

Leo being dead, his brother Alexander was by the senate and people acknowledged emperor; but he, in the very beginning of his reign, gave such instances of his cruelty, avarice, and debauchery, as rendered him odious to all his subjects. These who seemed to discountenance him in his lewd and dissolute course, he banished under various pretences, placing persons of most infamous characters in their room, and suffering himself to be entirely governed by debauchees and prostitutes. He was so taken with one Basili tzas, a person of a mean descent, but of a most dissolute life and his inseparable companion in the most abominable extravagancies, that he resolved to settle the empire on him, and, by castrating his nephew Constantine, to deprive the young prince of all hopes of succession. But he was diverted from such an unpopular attempt, by some of the late emperor’s friends, representing to him, that the child, who was of a weak and sickly constitution, would, in all likelihood, be soon removed out of the way by a natural death. In the mean time, he banished the empress Zoe from the court, suffering none to continue there, but such as were slaves to his sensual pleasures, and subservient to his brutish appetites. Simeon, prince of the Bulgarians, no sooner heard of his accession to the empire, than he dispatched embassadors to him to renew the treaties of peace and friendship concluded by former emperors between the two nations; but Alexander, instead of cultivating the friendship of that warlike and powerful nation, dismissed their embassadors in an ignominious manner; at which Simeon justly provoked, invaded with a mighty army the Roman territories, destroying all with fire and sword. Alexander, instead of offering to oppose him, pursued without interruption his dissolute course, till death, hastened on by his intemperance, delivered the world from so pernicious a monster. As he was one day using violent exercises, after having eaten and drunk to a great excess, some of the vessels breaking, he continued to bleed inwardly till

He died. Before his death, which happened in 912, after he had reigned about a year and a month, he declared Constantine his successor; but appointed him for his governors, as he was yet a child, such persons as had been most subservient to him in his infamous pleasures, and were, on that account, despised and abhorred by all men of honour and integrity. This encouraged Constantine Ducas, the son of Andronicus, of whom we have spoken above, to attempt the sovereignty, notwithstanding the warning given him by the late emperor; but as he endeavoured to force the imperial palace, after he had been proclaimed emperor by his friends in the circus, he was seized by the guards, who immediately cut off his head, and carried it to the emperor. With him fell the hopes of his party, most of his accomplices, who were men of great power and authority in the city, being discovered, and punished either with death or banishment.

During these domestic broils, Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, having laid waste Thrace, was advanced to the very gates of Constantinople, which city he had great hopes of reducing in a short time; but the unexpected and vigorous opposition he met with from the inhabitants, obliged him, after several unsuccessful attempts, to abandon the enterprise and retire to Hebdomon, whence he sent embassadors to the young prince's governors with overtures for a treaty; which were received with great joy. While the negotiations were carrying on, Simeon was admitted to dine with the emperor in the palace of Blachernae, whence he returned home loaded with rich presents. Cedrenus writes, that a peace was concluded; but Zonaras assures us, that the treaty was broken off, before it could be brought to an happy conclusion, the prince of the Bulgarians refusing to submit to the conditions insisted upon by the regents. If an agreement was made, it was broken soon after, as we shall relate anon. In the mean time, the regents, disagreeing amongst themselves, at the earnest request of the people of Constantinople and of the young prince himself, recalled to court the empress Zoe; who, having soon got all the power into her own hands, removed from the emperor's presence the favourites of Alexander, and put others in their room, who were better qualified for that high trust. Zoe had scarce taken upon her the administration, when the Bulgarians broke into the empire on one side, and the Saracens on the other. The former, after having laid waste Thrace, fat down before Adrianople, which was betrayed to them by one Pancratucus an Armenian, whom Simeon had bribed with rich presents. The Saracens, under the conduct of Damianus, kalif of Tyre, having equipped a powerful fleet, committed great devastations on the coasts. Zoe, thus attacked by two powerful enemies at once, resolved, pursuant to the advice of the senate, to make peace upon any terms with the Saracens, and employ the whole strength of the empire against the Bulgarians. Accordingly a treaty was happily concluded with the former, and a mighty army sent against the latter, under the conduct of Leo Phocas, who, having muster'd his numerous forces in the spacious plain of Diabasis, led them straight against the enemy, encamped at a small distance. Before the engagement, Constantine, the chief chaplain of the palace, or, as he was styled protopapa, exposing the wood of the holy cross to the view of the whole army, commanded them to kneel down, and swear, that they would fight to the last. After this, both armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expressed; but the Romans prevailed after a most obstinate dispute, the Bulgarians fled in the utmost confusion. The victory, however, was unluckily snatched out of their hands by the following accident: Leo, the Roman general, alighting at a fountain to quench his drought during the pursuit, his horse broke loose, while he stooped down to drink. The soldiers, who knew him, seeing him without a rider, concluded from thence, that their general was slain, and thereof, giving over the pursuit, began to retire in a disorderly manner; which Simeon quickly perceiving, rallied his men, and, facing about, fell unexpectedly upon the Romans, put them to flight, and pursued them with great slaughter, not only great numbers of the common soldiers being slain in that confusion, but many officers of great distinction. To this unhappy mistake some ascribe the dreadful overthrow which the Romans received on this occasion; but others relate the matter in a quite different manner. They tell us, that while Leo was busy in the pursuit of the enemy, news was brought him, that Romanus Lacapenus, the admiral, a man of great power and authority, who had been ordered to hover on the coast with his fleet and assist Leo, if required, was returned to Constantinople, with a design to seize on the empire in the absence of the army and the chief officers. Upon this intelligence, Leo, say they, who had the same ambitious view, returned immediately to the camp;

the better to be informed of the truth. But the soldiers, imagining he retired out of fear, were so discouraged, that they turned their pursuit into a sudden and disorderly flight. Simeon, elated with this unexpected success, resolved to return before Constantinople; but, two strong detachments from his army being met on their march by the imperial troops, and utterly defeated, he thought it advisable to drop that enterprise and return home. In the mean time, the two rivals, Leo and Romanus, returning to court, began to plot, not only against the emperor, but against each other; for they had both nothing less in view than the sovereignty. But the faction of Romanus prevailing at length over that of Leo, the latter was declared a traitor; and being seized in a castle named Atcas, whither he had fled for shelter, he was, by the emperor's orders, deprived of his sight, and by that means rendered incapable of any further attempts. Romanus, having thus got rid of Leo, and driven all his partisans from the emperor's presence, persuaded the young prince to marry his daughter, and to appoint his son Christopher commander in chief of the allies, which post was at that time one of the greatest dignities in the empire. Having in this manner engrossed to himself the whole power, he drove the empress Zoe from the palace, and confined her to the monastery of St. Euphemia. Soon after her departure, he caused himself to be first declared Cæsar, and afterwards to be solemnly crowned emperor by the patriarch, the young prince rather silently permitting, than approving of these extraordinary proceedings. The following year 921, Romanus caused his two sons, Stephen and Christopher, to be crowned in the great church, reserving the other, by name Theophylactus, for the patriarchal dignity; nay, with the utmost arrogance he ordered himself to be named before Constantine in all public edicts and monuments. Several projects were set on foot by the friends of young Constantine to deliver him from the controul, or rather captivity, in which he lived; but they were all discovered, before they were ripe for execution, and the authors of them punished with the utmost severity. Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, taking advantage of these intestine broils, broke anew into the Roman territories; and having defeated, with great slaughter, the imperial troops dispatched against him, he advanced, without opposition, to the very gates of Constantinople; but despairing of being ever able to reduce that metropolis, he desired an interview.

interview with the emperor Romanus; which being readily granted, a peace thereupon ensued between the two nations, Romanus having in a pathetic speech put the Bulgarian in mind of the account he was to give one day to the eternal Judge of the Christian blood he had already shed. At the same time, the Saracens, who had long infested the coasts and the islands, being surprised by John R الدينus, the Roman admiral, in the harbour of Lemnos, were cut off almost to a man, and their whole fleet destroyed. Not long after, Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, died, and was succeeded by his son Peter, who, breaking into the Roman dominions, destroyed all with fire and sword, without any regard to the treaty lately concluded between the emperor and his father.
When he heard Romanus was marching against him at the head of a powerful army, he dispatched a monk to him, with proposals for a peace, which he desired might be strengthened and confirmed with a marriage. This overture being well received by Romanus, the Bulgarian prince, after several negotiations, repaired to Constantinople, where he was splendidly entertained by Romanus in the palace of Blacherna, and with great solemnity married by Stephen, the patriarch, to Mary, the daughter of Christopher, the emperor’s son.
At one of many public entertainments that were made on this occasion, the Bulgarians loudly complaining, at the instigation of Romanus, as was supposed, that the emperor Con-fantine should take place of Christopher, the father-in-law of their prince, Romanus, pretending to gratify them, caused his son, with a seeming reluctance, to take the most honourable place. The nuptial solemnities were scarce over, when the Saracens in Syria invaded the Roman territories; but John Curcuas, the imperial general in those parts, not only drove them back with great loss, but having besieged and taken the city of Melitena, reduced the adjoining country to the form of a province. The following winter proved very severe; and the long frost, said to have lasted an hundred and twenty days, was followed by a dreadful plague, which swept off incredible numbers of people: earthquakes were felt in several provinces, and whole cities overturned. At Constantinople a fire broke out, which consumed many stately buildings.
But Romanus was not so much affected with these public calamities, as with the death of his son Christopher, who died on the fourteenth of August of the present year 933. The following year, one Basilus, a native of Macedon, giving out,
out, that he was Constantine Ducas, who had been slain in the beginning of the present reign, drew vast crowds after him; but being seized by an officer in the army, he was brought to the emperor at Constantinople, who, after having caufed one of his hands to be cut off, set him at liberty. But he continuing still to pass himself upon the credulous multitude for the son of Andronicus, got together great numbers of malecontents, who, having seized on a strong hold, made from thence frequent incursions into the neighbouring country, destroys all with fire and sword. But Romanus, having with much difficulty got him once more into his power, ordered him to be burnt alive. In 944, the Rossii, who inhabited the European Sarmatia, and were known to the ancients by the names of Roxolani and Baffaræ, having equipped a numerous fleet, consisting, according to some of ten, according to others of fifteen, thousand vessels, committed dreadful ravages on the coasts of the empire. But Theophanes, the Roman admiral, falling unexpectedly upon them, destroyed their whole fleet; and the two generals Bardas and Curcuas, pursuing those who had saved themselves ashore, made such a havoc of them, that very few returned home with the news of their misfortune. All this while Constantine, the lawful prince, lived without the least authority, having but the bare name of emperor. However, he carefully watched an opportunity of recovering his former power; and with this view gained over some perfons of great credit and esteem with Romanus and his sons, who being well apprised, that to remove Romanus was the first step towards the re-establishment of Constantine, applied to Stephen, the usurper's youngest son, and by degrees brought him to rebel against his father, whom he feized on the sixteenth of December of the present year 944, and confined to a monastery in the island Prota. He being thus removed, Stephen caused himself to be proclaimed emperor in his room, obliging his elder brother Constantine, who had been raised by his father to the imperial dignity, to acknowledge him for his partner in the sovereignty. This gave rise to a misunderstanding between the two brothers, which proved fatal to both. For Constantine having invited them to an entertainment, as if he had been desirous of bringing about an accommodation, caused them both to be seized in the midst of their jollity, and to be immediately conveyed away, viz. Stephen.

to the island of Panormus, and Constantine to Terebintus, where they were both ordained priests. Stephen was afterwards removed to Proconnesus, and from thence to Rhodes, then to Mitylene, and lastly to Lefbos, where he died, after having borne his misfortunes for many years with great constancy and resolution. Constantine having two years after killed one of his keepers, with a design to make his escape out of the island of Samothrace, whither he had been removed, the rest, transported with rage, fell upon him and slew him. As for Romanus, their father, he died in the beginning of the fourth year of his exile. Constantine, thus restored to his former power and authority, amply rewarded all those who had been instrumental in his restoration, preferring them to the first employments in the state. Soon after, in order to prevent any future designs that might be formed against him, he caused his son Romanus to be crowned with the usual solemnity, and Romanus the son of Stephen, with Bafilus the natural son of Romanus the elder, and Michael the son of Christopher, to be made eunuchs, and to enter into orders. In 948, the Saracens breaking into the empire with a mighty army, Bardas Phocas and his two sons Nicephorus and Leo were dispatched with the flower of the Roman forces against them. Bardas was one of the best officers of his age; but being hated by the soldiery on account of his extreme covetousness, he performed nothing answerable to the high character he bore; nay, his men having abandoned him in an engagement, he was dangerously wounded in the forehead, and with much ado brought off alive by some of his friends. His two sons gained several victories over the enemy, by whom, however, they were not more feared than beloved by those who served under them: Leo, having overthrown the Saracens in a pitched battle, took, among the other prisoners, Apolaenus, a person of great distinction, and nearly related to Chabdanus the calif; which the emperor no sooner knew, than he ordered the captive to be sent to Constantine, where the vain prince, after having led him in triumph, trod in an insulting manner upon his neck. The calif, highly provoked at this indignity, used in a most barbarous manner Constantine the third son of Bardas Phocas, whom he had taken prisoner, in order to make him abjure the Christian religion; but not being able to prevail with him, he caused him to be poisoned. Phocas, to revenge his death, put to the sword all the relations of the kalif, who had the misfortune to fall into his hands. On the other hand, the kalif, having raised a numerous and formidable army, marched against Phocas and his sons, carrying with him Nicetas, a patrician, and several other prisoners of distinction, with an intent to cause them to be massacred in the fight of the Roman army. But Nicetas, who was a man of great address, having in the mean time insinuated himself into his favour, was by him made privy to all his designs, which he found means to impart to Phocas, who lying in ambush for him in a narrow pass, cut off his numerous army almost to a man, the kalif himself escaping with much difficulty, after having put to the sword all the Roman prisoners, except Nicetas, who, by bribing his keepers, had made his escape in the beginning of the engagement. After this victory, Phocas, invading the territories of the Saracens, took several strong-holds, and laid waste whole provinces. But, in the mean time, the Saracens, who had settled in Crete, committing dreadful ravages on the coasts, the emperor having with incredible expedition fitted out a powerful fleet, dispatched it with a strong army on board against the island of Crete, where they landed, without the least opposition from the Saracens, altogether unprovided against so sudden a descent, and would have easily made themselves masters of the whole island, had they been commanded by an officer of any skill or experience.

But the emperor having appointed commander in chief in this expedition one of his chamberlains named Constantine Gongylas, who had been brought up in the court, and was consequently an utter stranger to the art of war, through his ignorance the whole undertaking miscarried. For the Saracens, finding he neither took care to fortify himself by any works, nor to send out scouts to get intelligence, concluded from thence, that he was no warrior; and recovering from their consternation, fell upon him unexpectedly, put his army to flight with great slaughter, and made themselves masters of his camp and baggage. He had himself fallen into the enemy’s hands, had not some of his guards, in spite of their utmost efforts, conveyed him on board one of his vessels. Not long after this defeat, Romanus, the emperor’s son, prompted by his ambition, and egged on by his wife Theophano or Theophania, conspired with her against tendants at the emperor’s table, prevailed upon him to administer poison to the prince instead of a potion, which had been prescribed to him by his physicians. But the emperor happening to stumble after he had taken in his hand the poisonous cup, the greater part of the draught was spilt by that lucky accident; so that what remained had not the desired effect, tho’ his life was for some time in great danger. In the month of September of the same year, he undertook a journey to mount Olympus, to beg the prayers of the monks, as given out, for the success of his arms against the Saracens, whom he designded, if possible, to drive out of Syria: but the true motive of his journey was to advise with Theodorus, bishop of Cyzicus, by what means he might drive from the patriarchal see Polyeuctus, who had succeeded Theophylactus, the son of Romanus. Being taken ill on his journey, either by the wicked practices of his son, or through the bad habit of his body, he was carried back in a litter to Constantinople, where he died on the ninth of November 960, after having lived fifty-four years and two months, and reigned thirteen with his father, uncle, and mother, twenty-five with Romanus, and fifteen alone? Curopalates, from whom other authors have copied, charges him with being too much addicted to wine, and with committing the whole management of affairs to his wife Helena and his favourite Basilus, who, abusing the trust reposed in them, set every thing to sale, bestowing the first employments in the state on the highest bidder. By this means all the offices, both civil, and military, were filled with persons no ways qualified for them, which equally redounded to his dishonour and the detriment of the state. He is likewise condemned for punishing the smallest faults with the utmost severity. On the other hand, he was a great encourager of learning, which he is said to have revived, after letters had been long neglected. He was himself well skilled in most branches of literature, especially in history, arithmetic, astronomy, philosophy, and geometry. Zonaras commends him on account of his piety, which, says he, appeared in all his writings and epistles?

Constantine was succeeded by his son Romanus, sur- Romanus, named the boy, to distinguish him from the other Romanus, his grandfather; for he was the son of Constantine by Helena, lana, the daughter of Romanus the usurper. He is desservedly reckoned amongst the most lewd and debauched princes mentioned in history. Tho' he was himself capabile of governing well, being endowed with uncommon parts, yet he committed the whole management of affairs to one Jofeph, his chief chamberlain, that he might, with more liberty and without interruption, pursue his pleasures; which he did, wallowing in all manner of debaucheries, without bestowing one thought on the public. Soon after his accession, he caused his young son Basilius to be crowned with the usual solemnity by the patriarch Polyeuctus; and imagining he had by that means secured the empire to his potestity, he took no further care either of his family or the public. In the second year of his reign, Nicephorus Phocas, a person of extraordinary merit, who had been raised by Constantine to the chief command of all the forces of the empire, undertook, with the consent of Romanus and the senate, an expedition against the Saracens in Crete; and landing in that island, defeated the enemy in several engagements, made himself master of all their strong holds, Chand-dax itself not excepted, took Curupes, the kalif, and Arcemas, his lieutenant, prisoners, and in the space of seven months reduced the whole island. But before he could settle affairs there, he was recalled by the emperor, at the infestation of Jofeph, who, growing jealous of the success of Nicephorus, alarmed the young prince with a pretended prediction, that "he who conquered Crete should become master of the whole Roman empire." While Nicepho-rus was thus signalizing himself in Crete, his brother Leo was attended with equal success in the east, where he gave the Saracens the greatest overthrow they had ever received.

Chabdamus, their kalif, with much difficulty, made his escape; but the rest were either killed upon the spot, or taken prisoners. Such numbers of captives were sent by Leo to Constantinople, that all the houses, both in the city and the neighbouring country, were, if we may give credit to the writers of those times, filled with Saracen slaves. Leo, on his return to Constantinople, was honoured with a triumph; but his brother Nicephorus, of whom the emperor ent-tained no small jealousy, on account of the above-mentioned prediction, was not allowed to come to court, but ordered to march against Chabdamus, the kalif of Syria, who, having recruited his army after his late defeat, threatened the empire with a new invasion. But Nicephorus, meeting him on the borders
borders of Syria, overthrew him in a pitched battle; and then laying siege to Beroea, made himself master of that important place, in which he found great wealth, and multitudes of Christian captives, who on that occasion recovered their liberty. The news of this victory had not yet reached Constantinople, when the emperor died, after having lived twenty-four years, and reigned thirteen years four months and five days, viz. ten with his father, and the rest alone. His death, which happened on the fifteenth of March of the year 963, is by some ascribed to poison, administered to him by his wife Theophano; by others, to his great lewdness and intemperance. He left two sons behind him, viz. Basilius and Constantine; but as they were yet very young, the empress Theophano took upon her the administration; which she had no sooner done, than she commanded Nicephorus to repair to Constantinople, much against the will of Joseph, the prime minister, and honoured him with a triumph in the circus, where he displayed the rich spoils he had taken in the island of Crete and the city of Beroea. During his stay at Constantinople, he found that Joseph suspected him of ambitious designs, as if he aspired at the empire, which he was well apprised would end in his ruin, Joseph still bearing great sway at court. In order therefore to remove the suspicions of the prime minister, having desired and obtained of him a private audience, he told him, that looking upon all worldly grandeur with that contempt it deserved, he had long panted after a retired and monastic life; but had been prevented from complying with his inclination by the kindnec of his masters, who had forced employments upon him of the greatest trust. At the same time, he shewed him a hair-cloth, which he pretended he wore constantly next his skin. The credulous minister, surprized at his speech and the sight of the hair-cloth, fell down at his feet, and with tears in his eyes, begging his pardon, declared, that for the future he would give no credit to any thing that could be alleged against him. Nicephorus, having thus gained the good opinion of Joseph, was suffered to return to the army in the east; where he had not been long, ere Joseph, jealous of the esteem he was in with the army, began to repent he had let him escape out of his hands, and seriously to consider by what means he might put him out of a condition of raising disturbances in the state. As his apprehensions daily encreased, he wrote in the end to Tzimisches.
and Curcuas, two principal commanders in the east, promising to prefer them to the first posts in the army, provided they seized on Nicephorus, and secured him in a monastery, or by any other means removed him out of the way. But the two officers not only delivered the letters to Nicephorus, but advised him to provide for his own safety by the only means that was now left him, viz. that of taking upon him the sovereignty. This proposal he rejected at first, or seemed to reject, with the utmost horror; but Tzimiarches and Curcuas threatening him with their drawn swords, he accepted of the empire, as was given out, to save his life, and suffered himself to be proclaimed emperor on the second of July of the year 963. Some writers tell us, that he was not so much prompted by his ambition to usurp the sovereignty, as by his love for the empress Theophano, of whom he had been long enamoured. They add, that he maintained a private, and perhaps not altogether innocent, correspondence with her, which greatly heightened the suspicions of the prime minister, who had secret intelligence of all that passed. As Nicephorus was no less beloved by the people of Constantinople, on account of his affability and mighty exploits, than Joseph was hated for his pride and haughty carriage, the news of what had happened in the east was received by all ranks of people with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable, nothing being heard in the streets but success and prosperity to Nicephorus Callinicus, or the brave conqueror. The house of Joseph and those of his friends and adherents were in an instant levelled with the ground by the tumultuous rabble. The new prince, being arrived at Chry- fopolis, was there met by the chief nobility, and conducted to Hebdomon, where he was crowned with great solemnity by the patriarch Polyeuctus. Being thus acknowledged both by the people and senate, he began his reign by banishing Joseph into Paphlagonia, and confining him to a monastery in that province, where he died two years after. In the second year of his reign, he married the empress Theophano, though he was therein opposed with great warmth by the patriarch, because he had been married before, and was said to have fixed godfather to one of the empress's children; nay, Polyeuctus proceeded so far as to excommunicate the emperor, pretending his marriage to be unlawful, on account of the two above-mentioned impediments. But the matter being examined in a synod held for that purpose at Constantinople,

Nicephorus was by the assembled bishops restored to the communion of the church. In the third year of his reign, he raised a powerful army, with a design to drive out of Sicily the Saracens, who had settled there, and were daily committing dreadful ravages on the coasts of Italy. With the command of this army he entrusted Manuel, the natural son of his uncle Leo, who, being an entire stranger to the art of war, suffered himself to be drawn by the enemy into the mountainous parts of the island, where he was cut off with all his men. John Zimisces, who commanded in Cilicia, was attended with better success; for the Saracens, who had invaded that province, were defeated by him with such slaughter, that the hill, on which the battle was fought, was from that time forward called the bloody hill. The same year, the Saracens in Cyprus were overthrown in several successive battles, and in the end driven quite out of the island, which was reunited to the dominions of the empire. The following year, the emperor marched in person against the Saracens in Cilicia, took three of their strongest cities; and having wintered in Cappadocia, invested early in the spring the cities of Mopuefta and Tarfus at the same time, which, after an obstinate defence, were obliged to surrender at discretion. A fleet, with a great number of troops on board, was sent from Egypt to the relief of Tarfus; but the city having submitted three days before their arrival, they failed back, when they were overtaken by a violent storm, which destroyed most of their ships, and drove the rest on the coasts of the empire, where they were seized, with the soldiers on board, by the Romans. Nicephorus, encouraged with the success that attended his arms, broke into Syria the following year; and having easily reduced such cities and forts as refused voluntarily to submit, he marched forward, the Saracens flying every-where before him, and laid siege to Antioch itself. But as that metropolis was defended by a numerous garrison, and well stored with provisions, the emperor, after having continued three months before it, was obliged by the approach of winter, to drop the enterprise and return to Constantinople. Cedrenus writes, that he might have reduced the place, but was deterred from it by an old prediction, that the prince who took Antioch would not long enjoy that conquest. Upon his return to Constantinople, Burtzas, a patrician, whom he had left in Syria with a large body of troops, to secure the places he had conquered in those parts, having drawn together his forces in the depth of winter, marched strait to Antioch, and appearing unexpectedly before the place, struck the garrison with such terror, that they immediately submitted. Thus was the metropolis of Syria once more reunited to the empire. But Nicephorus, mindful, says Cedrenus, of the above-mentioned prophecy, instead of rewarding Burtzas for such an eminent piece of service, discharged him, and forbade him the court. John Zimisces, who had served him with the utmost fidelity and uncommon success, was likewise dismissed soon after upon some groundless suspicion, and banished the court, which in the end proved the ruin of the unhappy prince. For Zimisces, highly provoked at the undeserved treatment he met with, confired with Burtzas, and several others, and found means to draw the empress herself into the conspiracy, incensed against her husband, according to the most probable opinion, on account of his designing, as he apprehended, to make her two sons Basilius and Constantine eunuchs, and to leave the empire to his brother Leo. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the empress was not only privy to the conspiracy, but acted the chief part in it; for by her means Zimisces and the other conspirators were privately let into the palace in the night-time, and conducted to the emperor’s room, where they dispatched him with many wounds, before the guards could come to his relief. When they received the alarm, Leo Abalantius, cutting off the emperor’s head, shoved it out of the window; which unexpected sight struck the guards with such terror, that, without offering to revenge the unfortunate prince’s death, they continued quiet, expecting what farther designs the conspirators had in view. Such was the end of Nicephorus Phocas, in the fifty-eighth year of his age and seventh of his reign. He was without all doubt a prince of great valor and experience in war, gained several signal victories over the Saracens, drove them out of the island of Cyprus, recovered Cilicia and the greater part of Syria and Africa Minor, and would in all likelihood, if he had lived longer, have restored the empire to its antient splendor. But his abominable covetousness and the exorbitant taxes, with which he loaded his subjects, estranged from him the minds of the people; so that he was, notwithstanding the glory he had acquired in arms, universally hated both by the nobility and the populace, who were so far from revenging his death, that they received the news of it with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable.

Nicephorus being thus murdered, John Zimisces was proclaimed by the conspirators, and by all acknowledged emperor. His first care was to remove from their employments, both in the state and army, all the friends of the deceased emperor, and among the rest Leo, the brother of Nicephorus, whom he confined to the island of Lesbos. All those who had been banished by his predecessor he recalled, and restored them to their former honours. When he thought himself by this means thoroughly settled on the throne, he went to the great church to receive the crown at the hands of the patriarch. But Polyuenatus, meeting him at the door, opposed his entrance, telling him, that he could not suffer the church to be profaned by one who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his sovereign, till he had atoned by a public penance for so enormous a crime. Zimisces heard the patriarch with great submision; and, being unwilling to quarrel with the church in the beginning of his reign, offered himself ready to give what satisfaction should be thought proper, alluding at the same time in his own defence, that the emperor had not been murdered by him, but by Abanalintus, at the instigation of the empress. Hereupon the patriarch commanded him to banish them both, and to revoke all the edicts published by his predecessor to the prejudice of the church and the ecclesiastics; which he readily complying with, and at the same time promising to settle his paternal estate on the poor, the patriarch admitted him into the church, where he was crowned with great solemnity on Christmas-day. As for the empress Theophano, she was banished into Armenia, and there shut up in a monastery. Some writers are of opinion, that the opposition made by the patriarch was not real, but feigned, and concerted beforehand between him and Zim-isces, who only wanted a plausible pretence to remove her.
However that be, the new emperor took her two sons Basilius and Constantine for his collegues, and caufed them to be acknowledged as such by the senate and people of Constantiнопole. In the mean time, the Saracens, hearing of the death of Nicephorus, raised without los of time one of the most numerous armies that had been seen for some ages in those parts; and, giving the command of it to one Zochares, a person well skilled in the art of war, fat down before Antioch, not doubting, but they should be able to reduce the splace, before it could be relieved by the emperor. But, in pite of their utmost efforts, the besieged held out, till Nic-las, an eunuch, declared general by the emperor, having raised what forces he could in Mesopotamia and the neighbouring provinces, fell unexpectedly upon them, gave them a total overthrow, and obliged them to raise the siege, and return with shame and disgrace to their own territories. The following year 970, the Rossii, having driven out the Bulgarians and seized on their country, advanced with an army of above three hundred thousand men into the dominions of the empire, and, having wasted all Thrace, sat down before Adrianople. Zimifces, having first endeavoured in vain to come to an agreement with them, ordered Bardas Sclerus, or the bold, his wife’s brother, to make head against them with what troops he could draw together. Bardas, pursuant to his orders, marched straight to Adrianople; but not daring to venture an engagement, as he had with him but thirteen thousand men, he had recourse to stratagems; and having drawn a strong party of the enemy into an ambuscade, he first cut them all off to a man; and then falling, when least expected, upon the main body of their army, he gave them a total overthrow, put most of them to the sword, took an incredible number of prisoners, and would not have suffered one to escape, had not night coming on obliged him to give over the pursuit. The Romans are said to have lost but twenty-five men in both engagements. The successes which attended the emperor’s arms abroad did not deter several of the nobility from conspiring against him at home, with a design to raise to the empire Bardas Phocas, the late prince’s nephew, who, upon the encouragement given him by his friends at Constantinople, withdrew on a sudden out of Asia, the place of his banishment; and, being joined by several persons of distinction, made himself master of Caesarea in Cappadocia, and there took upon him the imperial title and ensigns. At the same time, Leo, the father of Phocas, who had been confined to the island of Lesbos, attempted to make his escape from thence with his other son Nicephorus, in order to join Bardas; but being apprehended by the emperor’s officers, both he and Nicephorus were sentenced to death, but soon after pardoned by the good-natured emperor. In the mean time, Bardas Sclerus, who had been dispatched by the emperor at the head of a considerable army against Phocas, arriving at Dorylaeum the capital of Phrygia, endeavoured first by fair offers to bring him and his accomplices back to their duty; for he had been strictly enjoined by 5 Idem. in Zimifce.

by the emperor to abstain, as much as possible, from shedding blood. But when he found them deaf to his offers and promises, he left Dorylaus, and advanced to Caesarea, in order to lay siege to that place. Upon his approach, those who had appeared the most fangouc in the revolt agreed among themselves to abandon Phocas, and consult their own safety. Acccordingly, they withdrew with their attendants, before Bar-das invested the place; for that Phocas, who had with him but a small number of troops, thought it advisable to retire from Caesarea, and shut himself up in a strong castle called Cyropoeum, which at first he resolved to defend to the utmost extremity. But when Bardas invested the place, and by repeated meffages aflured him of all imaginable kindness on his part, and at the fame time undertook to obtain his pardon of the emperor, he submitted; and depending upon the promises of Bardas, delivered himself up into his hands. The emperor granted him his life; but, to prevent his raising new disturbances, confined him to the island of Chios. The rebellion being thus suppressed, the emperor married with great solemnity Theodore, according to some the sister, according to others the daughter, of the late emperor Romanus. The following year 971, the emperor, being informed that the Rossii, notwithstanding their late defeat, were preparing to invade the empire anew, resolved to be beforehand with them. Accordingly having raised a powerful army, and committed the administration of affairs at home to such as he thought he had the greatest reason to confide in, he set out from Constantinople early in the spring; and marching with great expedition over mount Haemus, invested Perithalba, the principal city of Bulgaria, before the enemy received the least intelligence of his approach. A party of the Rossii, consisting of eight thousand men, attempted to throw themselves into the city, but were all to a man either cut off, or taken prisoners, by the Romans: among the latter was Sphagellus, a person of great authority among the Bulgarians. The Romans, animated with this success, attacked the city with great resolution and intrepidity, but were obliged, by the approach of night, to retire to their camp, before they could render it. Early next morning, Zimises, having drawn out his men, offered the besieged very advantageous conditions; which they rejecting, he gave the signal for a general attack. The Rossii made a most vigorous resistance; but, the Romans pre-takes their city, and the inhabitants, without distinction of sex or age, put to the sword by the incensed soldiery. Eight thousand Scythians, part of the garrison, finding the Romans masters of the city, retired to the citadel, with a design to defend themselves there to the last extremity. As the cattle fled on a steep rock, and the Romans were already greatly fatigued, they seemed inclined to put off the assault to the next day. But Zimisces advancing in person against the enemy, at the head of a small band of chosen men, the whole army followed him, every one striving who should first thrust himself between his prince and the danger that threatened him. The Scythians fought like men in despair; but the Romans, after a terrible slaughter on both sides, made themselves in the end masters of the place. All the Scythians were either driven down the rocks and precipices, or put to the sword. In the city, when the first fury of the soldiery was over, the women and children were spared, and, together with such men as were found without arms, made prisoners. Among the captives was Borises, king of the Bulgarians, who being conducted to the emperor in his royal robes, was received by him in a manner suitable to his rank, magnificently entertained, and released with his wife, and children, and all the Bulgarians, Zimisces declaring he was at war with none but the Rossii. The city of Perithalba was utterly destroyed; but the emperor, having caused it to be rebuilt, called it after his own name Joannopolis. From thence he marched to Doroferus, a city of great strength on the Danube, where he was met by the army of the Rossii, three hundred and thirty thousand strong. However, he resolved to venture an engagement, which they not declining, one of the most bloody battles ensued we find mentioned in history. It continued from morning to night, victory inclining sometimes to one side, and sometimes to another. As night approached, the left wing of the Rossii began to give ground, which the emperor observing, he charged them at the head of a chosen body with such resolution, that they betook themselves in the end to a precipitous and disorderly flight. Upon their retreat, the Romans, animated by the example of their prince, fell with fresh vigour upon the main body of the enemy, and bearing all down before them, carried the day. The Rossii fled in the utmost confusion to Doroferus, whether the emperor pursued them, and laid close siege to the place, which brought on a second battle, wherein the Rossii were defeated anew with great slaughter. However, they still held out, and in their daily fallies made a dreadful havoc of the Romans, till their provisions failing them, they unanimously agreed to quit the city, and open themselves a way, sword in hand, through the midst of the Roman army. This they they attempted with great boldness and resolution, and succeeded in the attempt, though great numbers of them were cut in pieces, and the rest obliged to save themselves by a precipitous flight. Their general, by name Stephoschetalus, finding himself no longer in a condition to make head against the Romans, sent embassadors to the emperor, offering to relinquish Bulgaria, and conclude a peace upon the following terms; viz. That he should be acknowledged as a friend and ally of the empire; that he and his countrymen should be suffered to return home unmolested; and that a free commerce should be settled between the two nations. The emperor, who was grown weary of the war, readily agreeing to these articles, the treaty was concluded and signed by both parties. After this Stephoschetalus went to wait on the emperor, who received him in a very obliging manner, entertained him with great magnificence, and dismissed him loaded with rich presents. The Rossii being obliged, on their way home, to pass through the territories of the Patcinace, that fierce and savage people fell upon them unexpectedly, and cut of the general and most of his men. The war with the Rossii being thus ended, to the great reputation of Zimifises, and the safety of the empire, the emperor caused all the towns on the Danube to be fortified, and then returned to Constantinople, where he was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable. He was met at some distance from the city by the patriarch, the clergy, the senate, and the people, with crowns, and a triumphal chariot, drawn by four horses richly caparisoned; but he, placing the image of the virgin Mary in the chariot, followed it in a solemn procession, mounted on a white horse, and thus entered the city amidst the joyful acclamations of the people. During the war with the Rossii, several cities in the east, which had been reduced by his predecessor, revolted, which obliged him to undertake another expedition. Leaving therefore Constantinople, he marched into the eastern provinces; and having reduced several cities, partly by force, partly by fair promises, he advanced as far as Damascus, and there rested some time, applying himself with great care to the affairs of state. During his stay in the east, he was informed, that Basilius the eunuch had engrossed almost the whole wealth of those provinces to himself; that most of the fine palaces and fruitful territories, which he observed on the road, belonged to him; that in the late reign he had oppressed the people in a most cruel manner, &c. Upon which he broke out with a sigh in this expression; "How unhappy is the present condition of the Roman empire, which is thus pillaged by an avaricious and aspiring eunuch!" Basilus had served with great reputation under several emperors in their wars with the Saracens; and, as he was a man of great authority, had not a little contributed to the promotion of Nicephorus, who out of gratitude raised him to the post of prime minister, in which he was continued by Zimisces, on account of his great knowledge and experience in affairs of state. As he had many friends at court, he was soon informed of the emperor's reflection; and apprehending he might be called to an account, he resolved to prevent, by some means or other, the evil consequences, which he had reason to fear would attend it. Accordingly, by large presents and greater promises, he prevailed upon the emperor's cup-bearer to administer him poison; which brought him to his end, before he reached Constantinople. Though he mistrusted his prime minister, yet he would not suffer any inquiries to be made about the treason, but spent the short time he lived in exercises of christian piety. He died in 976, after having reigned six years and as many months, and was universally lamented, especially by the inhabitants of Constantinople, whom he had eased of many heavy taxes, with which they had been burdened by his predecessors. He is deservedly reckoned amongst the best and greatest emperors, on account of his equity, moderation, courage, and piety, in which he excelled most of his predecessors. He was the first who caused the image of our Saviour to be engraved on the coins, with this legend, "Jesus Christ, the King of kings. The writers of those times tell us, that in the last battle with the Rossii, a champion on a white horse was observed by the whole army fighting before the first ranks; that to his single valour was owing the victory gained on that occasion; and that, as he had never been seen before and disappeared after the battle, they all believed him to be St. Theodore the martyr, on whose anniversary the victory was obtained. The emperor himself seemed to be of this opinion; for he repaired a church dedicated to that martyr, and changed the name of Euchaniae, the city in which it stood, to that of Theodoropolis. Zimisces, dying without children, appointed Basilus and Constantine, the sons of the late emperor Romanus by Theophano, for his successors. But as both princes were under age, the eldest being but nineteen and the other seventeen, teen, Basilius the eunuch, took upon him the administration; and, the better to establish his authority, recalled Theophano, the young prince's mother, who had been banished by Zimisces. His next care was to remove Bardas Sclerus, of whom we have spoken above. He had been rewarded for his eminent services by Zimisces with the chief command of all the forces in the east, and was greatly beloved by the soldiery, among whom he had been brought up from his youth. This gave no small jealousy to the prime minister, who thereupon deprived him of his command, and sent him into Mesopotamia, to restrain the incursions of the Saracens into that province. Sclerus broke out into bitter invectives against Basilius; but the prime minister threatening to deprive him of all his employments and confine him to his house, he thought it advisable to obey the orders he had received, and to depart into the province which had been assigned him. He carried with him a firm resolution of being revenged on his rival; and accordingly, soon after his arrival, he acquainted the chief officers of the army with his design, who all to a man promising to stand by him, and encouraging him to set up for himself, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, and was saluted as such with loud acclamations by the whole army. Having spent the winter in warlike preparations, and entered into an alliance with the Saracens, who sent him large supplies of money and horses, he set forward in the beginning of the spring towards Constantinople. Basilius, struck with terror and dismay at the news of his revolt, left no means unattempted to divert the impending storm. He dispatched orders to Peter, who had been appointed, in the room of Sclerus, commander of the forces in the east, to draw together all his troops, and encamp with his whole army in the neighbourhood of Caesarea. At the same time, Syncellus, bishop of Nicomedia, a man famed for his eloquence and the holiness of his life, was sent to try whether he could prevail upon Sclerus to quit his unjust pretensions, and disband his army. The usurper received the prelate with the greatest demonstrations of esteem and affection; and, having heard him in appearance with great submission, returned him this short answer: That having once appeared in the purple, he was firmly resolved never to quit it but with his life. Upon the return of the bishop to court, Peter was ordered to secure all the passses, and to prepare for a vigorous defence, in case he was attacked, but by no means to begin hostilities. Peter, pursuant to his orders, posted strong parties in all the passses; but Sclerus havving, in spite of all opposition, opened himself a way into Cappadocia, encamped at a small distance from the imperial army. Hereupon several skirmishes ensued, without any considerable advantage on either side. But at length Sclerus, falling unexpectedly upon the emperor's army, cut great numbers of them in pieces, before they could put themselves in a posture of defence; and having forced the rest to save themselves by flight, made himself master of their campy in which he found great sums of money and an immense quantity of arms and provisions. The fame of this victory induced most of the eastern provinces to renounce their allegiance to the young princes, and declare for Sclerus, who, elated with this success, would not so much as admit to his presence the embassadors, who were sent to him with very honourable and advantageous proposals. In the mean time, Leo, who had been appointed to succeed Peter in the command of the army, arriving in Phrygia, marched from thence at the head of a strong detachment into the eastern provinces, which had submitted to the usurper, but had been left quite destitute of troops. This obliged Sclerus to divide his army, and send a body of men to cover those countries. But Leo falling in with them on their march, a battle ensued, in which the emperor's troops had the advantage, great numbers of Sclerus's men being slain, and many taken prisoners. The usurper, alarmed at the news of this defeat, left Cappadocia, and hastening after Leo, came up with him in a few days march, engaged him, and gained a complete victory. Most of the chief officers in the emperor's army were slain, and Leo himself taken prisoner, with several other persons of great distinction. Such of them as had abandoned Sclerus to side with Leo, had their eyes pulled out by the usurper's orders at the head of the army. As for Leo himself, he was treated with great civility, but kept under close confinement. Bardas, animated with this success, marched strait to Nice, the metropolis of Bithynia, not doubting, but he should carry the place at the first assault. But Manuel Eroticus, whom Basilus had sent with a considerable body of troops to defend it, repulsed the usurper in several successive attempts with such vigour, that, despairing of being able to take a place so well garrisoned by force, he resolved to reduce it by famine. Manuel, apprised of his design, and sensible of the great frights to which the numerous garrison would be soon reduced, filled the empty granaries with sand, which he strewed over with corn, and shewed them to some prisoners he had had taken; who, being dismissed, represented to Sclerus, that he attempted in vain to reduce a place by famine, that was so plentifully supplied with corn. Soon after, Manuel sent deputies to acquaint Sclerus, that, considering the doubtful events of war, he was willing to surrender upon certain conditions, one of which was, that the garrison should be allowed to march out with their arms and baggage, and to pass unmolested to Constantinople. To these conditions the usurper readily consented; but was highly provoked, when, entering the city, he discovered the deceit, and found the place quite destitute of provisions. Sclerus, after the reduction of Nice, was preparing to march to Constantinople, where he had many friends, who were ready to declare for him as soon as he appeared. But, in the mean time, Bardas Phocas, whom Basilius had recalled from exile, and appointed commander in chief against Sclerus, as the only man in the empire able to contend with him, arriving, with all the troops he could draw together, at Amorium, the usurper thought it advisable to march in the first place against him. Accordingly he hastened with all his forces to Amorium; and coming there to an engagement, put Phocas's army to the rout. Though Phocas himself discharged all the offices of a valiant soldier and experienced officer, yet his soldiers were so dispirited by former defeats, that he could neither with words nor his example inspire them with courage. Phocas, no longer able to keep the field, retired to Phrygia, and having there received large supplies out of Iberia and the other provinces, which continued steadfast in their allegiance, he resolved to venture a second engagement. Accordingly, leaving Phrygia, he advanced into Cappadocia, where he found Sclerus encamped on a large plain named Panclea, and ready to receive him. Both armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expressed; but Phocas's men beginning, after an obstinate dispute, to give ground, the brave general, determined to conquer or perish, opened himself a way, sword in hand, into the midst of the enemy's ranks, and there engaging Sclerus himself, dangerously wounded him. Some of the enemy's officers, apprized of the danger their general was in, hastened to his rescue; and finding him covered all over with blood, they carried him to a neighbouring fountain, there to wash his wound and refresh him, as he was fainting with drought. In the mean time, his horse horse running in with his bloody main among the ranks, his soldiers concluded from thence, that their general was slain, which occasioned such consternation in the army, that, instead of pursuing the emperor's troops, who had, in spite of Phocas's utmost endeavours, begun to fly, they fled themselves in the greatest confusion, some throwing themselves headlong down vast precipices, others taking to the river Halyss, in which great numbers were drowned. Thus was the fortune of the day turned, and the victory, by a lucky mistake, snatched out of the hands of the enemy, who were pursued with great slaughter by Phocas. Sclerus escaped with a small body of horse to Martyropolis, and from thence to Babylon, to implore the protection and assistance of Closfrothes, sultan of the place; which the emperor Basiliius no sooner understood, than he dispatched embassadors to Closfrothes, representing to him the evils that might accrue from one prince's protecting such as had, by an open revolt, taken arms against another. The embassadors were at the same time enjoined to assure Sclerus in the emperor's name, that he should not only be pardoned, but received into favour and restored to his former honours, provided he renounced his pretensions and returned home. Closfrothes, finding the embassadors were privately treating with Sclerus, ordered both him and them to be thrown into prison, whence we shall fee him in a short time releaved, to raise new disturbances in the empire.

The rebellion of Sclerus being thus suppressed, the emperor Basiliius, who had taken the administration into his own hands, resolved to be revenged on the Bulgarians, who had made frequent inroads into the empire, while the emperor's troops were employed in the east. With this view he put himself at the head of his army, and, without impairing his design either to Phocas or any other of his generals in the east, he entered Bulgarla, and, leaving Leo Melissenus to secure the narrow passes behind him, marched straight to Sardica. But while he was preparing to lay siege to that important place, Stephen, commander in chief of the western forces, and an avowed and irreconcilable enemy to Leo Melissenus, coming in the dead of the night to the emperor's tent, conjured him to lay aside all other designs whatsoever, and to return with all possible expedition to Constantinople, whither Leo had already marched, with a design to seize on the sovereignty in his absence. The emperor, alarmed at this unexpected news, and apprehending the enemy might, by seizing on the posts which Leo was said to have abandoned, cut off his retreat, ordered in a great frigh fright his army to march the same night; which being observed by Samuel, prince of the Bulgarians, he fell upon them in their retreat, and put great numbers of them to the sword. The emperor with great difficulty reached Philippopolis, where he found Leo carefully attending his duty on the station which had been assigned him. Hereupon, highly provoked against Stephen, who had thus imposed upon him, he immediately discharged him, and conferred his employment on his competitor. Stephen, however, maintained to the last, that Leo really intended to usurp the empire; which incensed the emperor to such a degree, that he could not forbear striking him, and dragging him in a violent passion on the ground by his hair and long beard.

The emperor had undertaken the Bulgarian expedition, as we have observed above, without imparting his design to Bardas Phocas, commander in chief of all the eastern forces. This that general highly resented; and apprehending the young prince would act for the future without any regard to his counsels, he began to entertain thoughts of usurping the supreme authority. The officers of the army, to whom he imparted the motive of his discontent, encouraged him in his attempt, and promised to support him to the last; so that, after several private conferences, they all met at the house of one Eufathius Melenius, and there investing Phocas with the imperial ornaments, unanimously proclaimed him emperor. At the same time, Bardas Sclerus, of whom we have spoken above, being set at liberty by Chosroes sultan of Babylon, returned into the territories of the empire, at the head of three thousand Roman captives, the sultan having granted them their liberty, in regard of their eminent services against the rebellious Persians. With these Sclerus thought himself once more in a condition to renew his former pretensions; and accordingly entering Mesopotamia, caufed himself to be there acknowledged emperor. But being, in the mean time, informed of the revolt of Phocas, after having been some time in suspense whether he should join him or Basilius, he offered in the end to assist Phocas, and share the empire with him; but at the same time he advised his son Romanus privately to abandon him, and fly to Basilius at Constantinople. By this means, if Phocas prevailed, he thought he should be able to obtain of him his son's pardon; and if Basilius got the better, he did not doubt, but his son would have interest enough to obtain his of the emperor. Romanus, upon his arrival at Constantinople, was received by Basilius with all possible demonstrations of kindness, and raised to the first employments in the state. But Sclerus met with a far different treatment from Phocas; they agreed at first to divide the empire between them; Sclerus was to have for his share Antioch, Phœnicia, Palestine, Coele Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt; Constantinople, with the rest of the provinces, was allotted to Phocas. This agreement being ratified and sworn to by both parties, Sclerus and Bardas joined their forces; which was no sooner done, than Phocas caused Sclerus to be privately seized; and, having stripped him of his imperial ornaments, committed him to close prison. His men at first mutinied; but, being overpowered with numbers, they were forced to submit, and in the end prevailed upon with large promises to serve under Phocas; who, being thus reinforced, sent Calocyrus Delfinus with part of his army to Chrytopolis, while he removed with the rest to Abydus, in order to besiege that important place, and, after reducing it, to block up Constantinople itself. But, in the mean time, the emperor Basilius, acquainted with the enemy's motions, having pafled the freights in the night, fell unexpectedly upon Delfinus; and having put his army to flight at the first onset, took him and some other officers of great note prisoners, who were all immediately nailed to several trees on the highway, to strike terror into the rest. Phocas met with a vigorous resistance at Abydus, the inhabitants and garrison being encouraged by the arrival of the imperial fleet, which was immediately followed by the emperor Basilius, and he soon after by his brother Constantine. Upon the arrival of the two princes, Phocas resolved to give them battle; and accordingly, leaving part of his forces before Abydus to pursue the siege, he drew up the rest in a neighbouring plain. Some of the young princes generals advised them to throw themselves into Abydus, and there wait the arrival of fresh supplies; but the greater part thinking it advisable to engage the enemy without loss of time, they marched at the head of their forces in battle-array into the plain where the usurper had drawn up his. But while both armies were ready to engage, or, as some write, when the battle was begun, Phocas was taken off. The manner of his death is differently related; some write, that his horse threw him, and that he died of the fall; others, that he was killed in the first onset. The emperor Constantine bragged, that he had killed him with his own hand; but the most received opinion is, that one of his domestics, by name Symeon, in whom he reposed an entire confidence, at the instigation of Basilius, administered him poison before the battle, of which he died soon after. Be that as it will, the report of his death was no sooner spread abroad in the army, than his men took themselves to a precipitous and disorderly flight. The emperor's forces pursued them close, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and having taken most of the leading men of the party prisoners, conveyed them to Constantinople, where they were punished according to their deserts, some being publicly executed, and others stripped of their estates and sent into banishment. However, the death of Phocas and the defeat of his army did not put an end to the civil wars; for such of the party as had the good luck to make their escape, having set Sclerus at liberty, encouraged him to pursue his former pretensions; and he, though now in a very advanced age, hearkening to their suggestions, put himself at their head, and marching into Cappadocia, reduced great part of that province. But the emperor having written a friendly letter to him, offering him his favour and protection, and his son Romanus earnestly entreat him at the same time not to involve the empire in new wars, but to enjoy the small remainder of his life in peace and tranquility among his friends and relations, he was prevailed upon to quit his pretensions, and return to Constantinople, where he was received by Basilius with uncommon civility, entertained at his table, and declared great friend of the household. Such of his followers as had enjoyed offices of honour or profit under him, were continued in the same employments, or preferred to others equally advantageous and honourable. We are told, that when he first appeared before Basilius, supported, on account of his age and corpulence, by two of his domestics, the emperor, in reflecting how much he had dreaded him, could hardly forbear laughing.

The civil war being thus happily ended, Basilius took a progress into Thrace and Macedonia; and having left a sufficient number of troops at Thessalonica to awe the Bulgarians, he passed over into Asia with the rest, to settle the affairs of the eastern provinces. On his march through Cappadocia, he was entertained with his whole army by Eustathius Melenius, commander of the troops in that province. The wealth which Melenius displayed on that occasion gave the emperor such umbrage, that, pretending a particular esteem for

for him, he took him with him to Constantinople, whence he never after suffered him to depart, lest he should raise disturbances in the empire; and, after his death, seized on his vast estate. The emperor, upon his return to Constantinople, was informed, that Samuel, king of the Bulgarians, had surprized the city of Theflalonica, and, having crossed the Peneus, was laying waste Thessaly, Boeotia, Attica; nay, that some of his parties had penetrated into the very heart of Peloponnesus. Hereupon Nicephorus Uranus, commander in chief of the western forces, was dispatched against him, at the head of a powerful army. Uranus, leaving his baggage at Larissa, reached by long marches the Sperchius, and encamped with his whole army over-against the enemy, who lay on the opposite bank. As the river was greatly swelled with the heavy rains that had fallen, Samuel, not imagining the Romans would attempt to pass it, suffered his troops to roam in large parties about the country in quest of booty. But Uranus, having at length found out a place where the river was fordable, passed it in the dead of the night; and falling unexpectedly on the Bulgarians, who were left in the camp and lay for the most part asleep, cut great numbers of them in pieces, took their baggage, with many prisoners, and made themselves masters of their camp. Samuel and his son were dangerously wounded, and would unavoidably have been taken, had they not all that day concealed themselves among the dead. The next night they stole away to the mountains of Aetolia, and from thence made their escape into Bulgaria. The following year 1001, the emperor Basilius entered Bulgaria at the head of a numerous and well-disciplined army; and having defeated Samuel in a pitched battle on the banks of the Axios, took Vidina, Scopi, and several other strong cities. However, the emperor narrowly escaped being cut off with his whole army in the frights of Cimba, where he was unexpectedly attacked by Samuel; but rescued from the danger he was in by the seafable arrival of Nicephorus Xiphias, governor of Philippopolis, who falling upon the enemy’s rear, put them to flight. Basilius pursued them close, and having taken an incredible number of prisoners, caused their eyes to be pulled out, leaving to every hundred a guide with one eye, that he might conduct them to Samuel; who, not able to stand the shock of so terrible and affecting a spectacle, fell into a deep swoon and died two days after. Samuel was succeeded by his son Gabriel, who was soon after murdered.

ordered by John Bladithlabus, a person nearly related to him. Bladithlabus, having caused himself to be acknowledged prince of the Bulgarians, sent embassadors to Basilius, offering to submit to any terms, and to own himself, and behave on all occasions, as a subject and vassal of the empire. The emperor received the embassadors in a very obliging manner, but the new prince declining, under various pretences, to execute the conditions agreed on, Basilius returned the following year into Bulgaria, firmly resolved not to sheath his sword, till he had entirely reduced it. Accordingly, having in the space of two years made himself master of most of the enemy's strong-holds, and gained several victories over Bladithlabus, who had defended his country with incredible valour, but was at length slain in a battle fought near Achridus, the Bulgarians sent deputies to the Roman camp, with offers of a total and unfeigned submission. Basilius received them with his usual civility; and having raised to the rank of patricians such of the Bulgarian nobility as seemed most forward in surrendering their castles and strong-holds, he was received with loud acclamations into the city of Achridus, where he found the vast treasures of the Bulgarian princes, which he distributed, by way of donative, amongst his soldiers. Soon after, the widow of the late king, with her six daughters and three of her sons, delivered herself up to the emperor, who received her with the greatest kindness and respect, and entertained her suitable to her rank. This obliging behaviour in the emperor encouraged her three other sons, with most of the princes of the blood, who had taken shelter among the mountains, to submit and throw themselves upon the emperor's mercy. However, Ibatzes, a person nearly allied to the royal family, who had distinguished himself in a very eminent manner during the whole course of the war, refusing to submit, fled to a steep and craggy mountain, with a design to defend himself there to the last extremity. Basilius endeavoured by fair means to induce him to submit to necessity, and comply with the present posture of affairs; but he equally despising the emperor's threats and promises, Eustathius Daphnomelus, whom Basilius had lately appointed governor of Achridus, without imparting to any one his design, repaired, with two persons in whom he could confide, to the mountain where Ibatzes had fortified himself. He hoped to pass undiscovered among the many strangers, who flocked thither to celebrate the approaching feast of the assumption of the virgin Mary, for whom Ibatzes had a particular veneration; but being known to the guards, he was seized and carried before Ibatzes, to whom he pretended...

pretended to have matters of the greatest importance to communicate. Ibatzes received him in a very obliging manner; and having, at his request, followed him into a remote place, Daphnomelus threw himself all on a sudden upon him; and his two men, who attended at some distance, and with whom the whole scheme had been concerted before-hand, coming up, and thrusting their cloaths violently into his mouth, pulled out both his eyes, and got safe to an abandoned cattle on the top of the hill; which Ibatzes's men invested on all sides, as soon as they heard of the misfortune which had befallen their leader. But Daphnomelus exhorting them to follow the example of their countrymen, and, now that they were destitute of a leader, to submit to the emperor, by whom, he assured them, they should be well received and amply rewarded, instead of attacking the cattle, they congratulated Daphnomelus on his success, and took an oath of allegiance to the emperor of the Romans. Hereupon Daphnomelus, quitting the cattle, carried Ibatzes, without the least opposition, to Basilius, who, no less surprised at the boldness than at the success of the attempt, rewarded his officer with the government of Dyrrahchium and all the rich moveables of his prisoner. Basilius, having thus at length accomplished the entire reduction of Bulgaria, returned with an incredible number of prisoners and hostages to Constantinople, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of joy by the senate and people. After the conclusion of this war, which began in 995, and ended in 1019, the emperor undertook an expedition into Iberia; but with what success, we are nowhere told. During his absence, Xiphius and Nicephorus, the son of Bardas Phocas, revolted; but Xiphius, being gained over by Basilius, put a stop to the rebellion, by dispatching his fellow conspirator. Basilius proceeded with great severity against all who had been, or were, only suspected of having been, privy to the conspiracy. Great numbers of the nobility were on this occasion either put to death, or sent into exile; which occasioned some commotions at Constantinople: but the ringleaders being seized and publicly executed, the city was restored to its former tranquillity. In 1025, the emperor, though then in the seventieth year of his age, resolved to engage in a new war against the Saracens, who had settled in Sicily and committed dreadful ravages on the coasts of Naples and Calabria; which countries were still subject to the empire. Accordingly, having assembled a powerful army and equipped a mighty fleet, he sent before a strong body of forces, under the the conduct of Orestes his favourite eunuch, with a design to follow in person soon after with the rest of the army; but was prevented by death, which overtook him in the month of December of the year 1025, after he had lived seventy years, and reigned fifty. He was highly esteemed by his subjects, on account of his application to public affairs, and his success in the long and bloody war, which he undertook against the Bulgarians. But as his jealousy encreased with his years, towards the close of his reign he grew inexorably severe; on which account he was rather feared than beloved by his subjects. The absolute conquest of Bulgaria, which had been in vain attempted by so many of his predecessors, but was happily accomplished by him, has rendered the name of Basilus II. famous among the Roman, or rather the Constantinopolitan, princes.

CHAP. XXXV.

The Roman history, from the death of Basilus II. to the taking of Constantinople by the Latins.

By the death of Basilus, Constantine, who had borne the name of emperor in conjunction with his brother, remained sole master of the empire. As he was an effeminate, vicious, and indolent prince, he entirely neglected all public affairs, to follow his private diversions, suffering his ministers, most of them persons no less infamous than himself, to oppress the provinces without controul, and lay on the people what burdens they thought fit. By this means the empire, which had begun to revive under Nicephorus, Zimicces, and Basilius, was, in the short reign of Constantine, brought to as low an ebb as it had ever been at. Such persons as had, either by their exploits or virtues, acquired reputation in the late reign, were removed from their employments, to make room for the emperor’s companions in his debaucheries. Nicephorus Comnenus, a person no less esteemed for his virtue than his experience in war, was at the same time deprived of his command and his sight, under pretence of conspiring against the emperor, though, in reality, his eminent virtues.
virtues, which gave umbrage to the abandoned prince, were his only crimes. Bardas, the son of the celebrated Phoca's who had served Basilios with the utmost fidelity, and distinguishe[d] himself on many occasions in a most eminent man[ner], was treated with the like severity, for no other reason, but becaue his extraordinary merit gave umbrage to the emperor's favourites. Many other persons of great distinc[tion], who seemed to dislike the emperor's conduct, were, under various pretences, either put to death, or sent into exile. Such proceedings raised a general discontent at home, and at the same time encouraged the nations abroad to make irruptions into the territories of the empire; but they were restrained by the care and vigilance of those who commanded on the borders. It was happy for the state, that, Constantine's reign was short; for he had scarce governed three years alone, when he fell dangerously ill, and was given over by his physicians; which divided the court into two factions concerning his successor, some proposing Constantine Delafer[nus], commander of the forces in Armenia, and others urging all their interest in favour of Romanus Argyrus, a person of an ancient family and nearly related to the emperor. As Constantine had three daughters, it was agreed, that who[ever] succeeded him should marry one of them. Romanus was already married, and therefore seemed by this agreement to be excluded from the empire; but his friends, who were the most powerful at court and the emperor's chief favourites, prevailed upon the prince to declare in his favour, and send[ing for him, to put it to his choice, either to be deprived of his sight, or to divorce his wife, and, marrying one of the emperor's daughters, be raised to the dignity of Caesar. Romanus seemed at the first inclined rather to lose his eyes and the imperial dignity, than part with his wife, whom he tenderly loved; but she, informed of what passed, retired immediately to a monastery, and, by embracing there a monastic life, made room for Zoe, the emperor's second daughter, to whom Romanus was married, and at the same time created Caesar. Three days after the nuptials, Constantine died, in the year 1028, the seventieth of his age, and third of his reign without a colleague.

Romanus, thus raised to the empire, began his reign by easing the people of the many taxes, with which they had been burdened by his predecessor; which gained him the hearts of his subjects. His liberality to the church knew no bounds, and his indulgence to the unhappy captives, who had been taken in the late wars, was no less remarkable; for they they were all ransomed at his private expence, supplied with money to defray the charges of their journey, and sent back to their respective countries. In his second year, the Saracens, who had continued quiet in the reign of Basilius, but had begun to prepare for war in that of Constantine, broke into that part of Syria which belonged to the Romans, and with their daily incursions, greatly harassed the territory of Antioch. Spondyles, who commanded the troops quartered in Antioch and that neighbourhood, endeavoured to restrain them; but being in several encounters worsted and put to flight, the emperor resolved to march in person into Syria, and retrieve, if possible, the reputation of the Roman arms there. Pursuant to this resolution he set out from Constantinople, at the head of a very numerous and formidable army. But before he had advanced far on his way, he was met by embassadors from the Saracens of Berœa, who, alarmed at his vast preparations, were come to sue for peace, promising at the same time to pay their usual tribute for the future, and never more to infest the territories of the empire. Most of the officers in the army advised Romanus to accept of their submission, and not to engage rashly in a war, which in all likelihood, would prove both bloody and expensive. But he, promising himself great glory and advantages from that expedition, dismissed the embassadors with disdain, and entering Syria, detached a strong party to observe the enemy’s motions. The party, falling unhappily into an ambuscade, were all cut off to a man; and the Saracens, elated with this success, attacked unexpectedly Constantine Delassmenus, who had been sent out with a strong body of troops to cover the Roman foragers, put him to flight at the first onset, and pursued him to the very gates of the camp, which they invested on all sides. The emperor’s army being soon reduced to the utmost extremity for want of provisions, and above all of water, it was agreed in a council of war, that they should decamp in the night and march to Antioch. But the Saracens, who carefully watched their motions, falling upon them with great violence in their retreat, put most of them to the sword, the emperor himself escaping with the utmost difficulty to Antioch. The enemy took all the emperor’s baggage; which however, was recovered by George Maniaces, at that time governor of a small town in those parts, in the following manner: Eight hundred Saracens, loaded with the rich plunder of the emperor’s army, His marches in person against the Saracens. His army is cut off. The baggage of the army recovered by Maniaces.

Book III.

...peror's camp, appeared before the place, and affirming that the emperor himself was taken and his army totally defeated, summoned Maniaces to surrender. Maniaces, already informed of the emperor's escape, but pretending to give credit to what they said, sent them out a great quantity of provisions to refresh themselves that night, and promised to deliver up the town to them as soon as it was light. Hereupon the enemy, without the least distrust, passed the greater part of the night in mirth and jollity; but when, after having eaten and drank to a great excess, they were all asleep, Maniaces, sallying out, cut them all off to a man, without the least opposition; and having taken two hundred and eighty camels loaded with the spoils of the Roman army, he sent them to the emperor, who rewarded him for this seasonable piece of service with the government of Media. In the mean time, Romanus, having with much ado reached Cappadocia, returned from thence, with the remains of his shattered army, to Constantinople; and there laying aside all thoughts of any warlike attempt for the future, made it his whole study to fill the exchequer, which had been quite drained by the prodigality and extravagance of his predecessor. In order to this, he renewed his claim to old debts, thought to have been utterly forgotten, and proceeded with such rigor in the recovery of them, that many persons of distinction were driven from their estates, and reduced with their families to beggary. These severe exactions raised a general discontent in the people, which gave rise to several plots and conspiracies, for the most part carried on by Theodora, the late emperor's youngest daughter, who was on that account confined to a monastery, and obliged to take the religious habit; which we shall see hereafter exchanged for the imperial purple. In 1033, the fourth of Romanus's reign, a dreadful plague broke out in Cappadocia, and raged with such violence in that province, as well as in Paphlagonia and Armenia, that the inhabitants were forced to abandon their dwellings and retire to other parts of the empire. The plague was followed by a terrible famine, and that by earthquakes, which destroyed several cities, and overturned many flasely edifices at Constantinople, where it was felt for the space of forty days. At the same time, a comet appeared, which passed with a terrible noise from the north to the south, the whole horizon seeming to be in a flame. Romanus, alarmed at these and several other public calamities.

calamities and prodigies, with which the histories of those times are filled, applied himself wholly to the works of piety, hoping by that means to avert the wrath of Heaven, which seemed to threaten the empire. He erected several hospitals for the relief of the poor, repaired those which had been destroyed by the late earthquakes, rebuilt the aqueducts, supplied the city with water, of which it began to be in great want, and, above all, enriched with large donations the monasteries, bestowing on the monks whole cities and the most fruitful lands in the provinces, purchased by him at the public expense. In the mean time, the empress Zoe, a most lewd and incontinent woman, despising her husband, now in the sixty-sixth year of his age, cast her eyes on Michael, the brother of John an eunuch, in great authority with the emperor. As Michael, though meanly born, was a man of a most comely aspect, of a graceful person, and great address, the empress began to entertain a violent passion for him; which, as she abandoned herself to it, grew in a short time so powerful, that she resolved to dispatch her husband and marry him. Accordingly, having imparted her design to such of her creatures as she could confide in, poison was administered by them to the unhappy prince, which, in a short time, reduced him to a most deplorable condition. However, the empress thinking it too slow in its operation, hired an assassin to dispatch him, who, entering the bath where the emperor was refreshing himself, held his head under water till he expired. His death happened on the eleventh, or as others write on the fifteenth, of April of the year 1034, after he had reigned five years and six months.

Romanus being dead, the empress Zoe sent for the patriarch Alexius in great haste, who was then celebrating in the church the office appointed for Good-friday; for on that day the emperor was murdered. As Alexius had been sent for in Romanus's name, he was greatly surprised, when he heard he was dead; and much more when the empress, upon his being introduced to her, ordered him to marry her to Michael. Struck with horror and amazement, he declined the office for some time; but was in the end, with a present of an hundred pounds weight of gold, prevailed upon to comply. When the ceremony was over, the new emperor acquainted the people with the death of Romanus and his own marriage with Zoe, who, he said, had taken him for her partner in the empire, to which she had an undoubted right. Letters to the same purpose were dispatched into the provinces, where none of the great men seemed displeased at the promotion.

promotion of Michael, except Constantine Delaissenus, who had been named by some to succeed Basilus II. and being, on account of his rank and family, the first man in the empire, was highly offended, that a person of Michael’s obscure birth should be preferred to him. But John the eunuch, Michael’s brother, having, with repeated oaths, promises, and allusions, prevailed upon him to come to court, banished him, as soon as he had him in his power, to the island Prota, whence he was removed to a strong tower, and there kept under close confinement, till he was sent for to court by the empress Zoe, as we shall relate hereafter. At the same time, John took care to remove, and, under various pretences, to send into exile, such as gave him the least umbrage, or seemed to be ill-affecting to his family: Constantius Monomachus, afterwards emperor, was confined to a castle; Maniaces, who was highly esteemed and beloved by the people, was sent into Upper Media, under pretence of restraining the incursions of the Saracens; all the friends and relations of the late emperor were driven from their estates and employments, and the government of the provinces, as well as the charge of civil affairs, committed to none but eunuchs. John, having thus established his brother’s interest in the provinces, began to reflect on the fate of Romanus; and distrusting the fickle temper of Zoe, removed from her all the women, in whom she reposed any confidence; and discharging her eunuchs, appointed others in whom he could confide, to attend, or rather to watch, her; so that she could not stir out of the palace without his knowledge and consent. The empress, highly provoked at the restraint put upon her, and looking upon John as no other than her gaoler, endeavoured to get rid of him by poison; but the design being discovered, before it could be put into execution, the minister fled thenceforth on his guard, and watched her more narrowly. As for Michael the emperor, he suffered John to govern with an absolute sway, applying himself wholly to his devotions. Being conscious of the heinous crime he had committed in murdering his sovereign, he hoped to atone for it by works of piety, by his liberality to the poor, and by erecting and endowing churches, hospitals, oratories, &c. As he began to grow distempered in his body and disordered in his mind, John, concluding that, if he died, the empress would endeavour to recover her authority, and would not fail, if she succeeded therein, to gratify her revenge with the utter ruin of him and his family, prevailed upon the emperor to prefer Michael, surnamed Calaphates, his sister’s son, to the dignity of Caesar, and to banish all the friends and relations of the empress Zoe. In the third year of Michael’s reign, a peace for thirty years was concluded between him and the Saracens of Egypt, whose Kalif being dead, his widow is said to have embraced the Christian religion, and to have brought about an agreement between her subjects and the Romans. The following year 1036, was remarkable for dreadful earthquakes, which overturned several cities in different parts of the empire, and for an attempt of the Saracens on the city of Edessa, which narrowly escaped falling into their hands. Twelve of the chief men of their nation, presenting themselves before the gates, with five hundred horses and as many camels, loaded with large chests, demanded admittance, pretending they were carrying presents to the emperor. The governor received into the city the twelve embassadors, as they styled themselves, and entertained them at a banquet; but could not be prevailed upon to admit the horses and camels: which diffidence preferred the place; for the chests were filled with armed men, who, in the dead of the night, were to be let out, and, killing the sentinels, to seize on the city. The design was discovered by an Armenian to the governor; who, suddenly withdrawing from the banquet, and taking a sufficient force with him, surprized and put to the sword all the Saracens without the town; then returning to his guests, treated them in the like manner, sparing but one, whose hands, ears, and nose he cut off, and sent him home in that condition, to give his countrymen an account of what had happened. The following year, the Bulgarians revolted, and, shaking off the yoke, chose one Deleanus, or as some call him Dolianus, for their king. He was servant to a citizen of Constantinople; but escaping from his master, fled into Bulgaria, his native country; and there gave out that he was the son of Gabriel and grandson of Samuel. The Bulgarians, weary of the yoke, to which they had but lately submitted, received him as their deliverer, and having proclaimed him king, murdered all the Romans, who had the misfortune to fall into their hands. At the same time, the inhabitants of Dyrrachium, no longer able to bear the cruel exactions of their governor Michael Dermocaitas, rose up against him, drove him out of the town, and, despairing of pardon, openly revolted, and chose one Teichomerus, a soldier of great reputation amongst them.
them, for their king. Deleanus, the new king of Bulgaria, no sooner heard of this revolt, than he wrote an obliging letter to Teichomerus, offering to take him for his partner in the kingdom of Bulgaria, provided he joined him with all his followers. Teichomerus, not suspecting the least treachery, readily received him into Dyrrachium; but Deleanus, instead of performing his promise, caused the credulous and unhappy Teichomerus to be put to death; and then marching without loss of time to Thessalonica, where the emperor lay encamped, struck with his unexpected approach such terror into the Roman army, that they fled with Michael in the utmost confusion to Constantinople, leaving all their baggage behind them to the care of Manuel Ibatza, who, betraying his trust, delivered it up to the enemy. In the mean time, Alusianus, the brother of John the last king of Bulgaria, who, when that country submitted to Basilius, had been raised to the dignity of a patrician, having made his escape from Constantinople and got undiscovered into Bulgaria, was there received by his countrymen with great demonstrations of joy. As he was a real descendent of the royal family, his arrival gave no small umbrage to Deleanus, who nevertheless, to ingratiate himself with the people, took him for his colleague in the empire, and sent him, at the head of forty thousand men, to lay siege to Thessalonica. Alusianus distinguished himself on that occasion in a very eminent manner; but the vigorous opposition he met with from Constantine the patriarch, obliged him to raise the siege and retire, after he had lost fifteen thousand men in the undertaking. Deleanus laid hold of this opportunity to lessen the credit of his colleague, giving out, that he maintained a private correspondence with the Romans. But Alusianus, apprised of his evil designs, resolved to be before-hand with him; and accordingly, having invited him to an entertainment, he caused his eyes to be plucked out; and then, distrusting the fickle humour of the Bulgarians, returned to Constantinople, after his friends had obtained of the emperor his pardon. Upon his return, Michael, though grievously afflicted with a dropsey, entered the enemy's country at the head of a powerful army, and falling upon the Bulgarians, now destitute of a head to advise and command them, put them to flight, and obliged them to submit anew to the yoke. After this, the emperor returned in triumph to Constantinople; but finding his distemper daily increased, he soon after devolved himself of the imperial purple, and entering into a monastery, which he himself had built, spent there the remaining part of his life in acts of piety and repentance. He died on the tenth of December 1041, after he had reigned seven years and eight months. Upon his death, Michael Calaphates, his sister's son, who had been created Caesar, and at the same time adopted by Zoe, as some authors write, was proclaimed emperor. He, upon his accession to the empire, probably out of complaisance to Zoe, who appeared very zealous in his interest, banished his uncle John the eunuch, and proceeded with the like unnatural severity against his other relations, causing most of them, without any regard to their age or circumstances, to be made eunuchs. Over-jealous of his authority, he caused in the end the empress Zoe to be confined to a monastery, under pretense, that she had, by witchcraft and sorcery, attempted to take away his life. His monstrous ingratitude to one, who had been chiefly instrumental in his promotion, and was still held in great veneration by the people, on account of her high birth, provoked them to such a degree, that, breaking out into a general sedition, with an unanimous consent they sent for Theodora, the emperor Constantine's youngest daughter, who had been shut up in a monastery, as we have observed above, and saluted her empress, with her sister Zoe. Michael, finding the people universally bent against him, retired of his own accord, with his uncle Constantine, to a monastery, where they both took the religious habit, hoping by that means to appease the enraged multitude. But Theodora, who was more incensed against them than Zoe herself, moving that their eyes should be plucked out, the populace, breaking into the church of St. John the baptist, where they had taken refuge, dragged them from the altar to the forum, and there, in a most cruel manner, deprived them of their sight. After this, they were banished, with all their relations and adherents, Michael having enjoyed the sovereignty scarce four months.

Zoe, seeing herself once more invested with the sovereignty, banished all the friends of the late tyrants, and recalled from exile such as had served her father and uncle, preferring them to the first employments in the state and army. Among the rest Maniaces, of whom we have spoken above, was sent for to court, and appointed commander in chief of all the western forces. Zoe had scarce reigned three months, when when the people pressuring her to marry, and by that means prevent the disturbances that might arise among competitors for the empire, she recalled from banishment Constantine, furred Monomachus, a person of a noble extraction and comely aspect; and having married him, caused him to be crowned by the patriarch with the usual solemnity. He had been banished, during the reign of Michael, to the island of Lesbos, and from thence removed, at the instigation of John the eunuch, to Mitylene, where he was sent for to court, and raised to the empire. He no sooner saw himself invested with the imperial dignity, than he banished the eunuch, to the island of Lesbos; where, his eyes being pulled out by the emperor's orders, he died soon after. In the very beginning of Constantine's reign, Maniaces not able to brook the ill treatment he met with from Sclerus, one of the emperor's chief favourites, revolted with the troops under his command, and, assuming the imperial ornaments, passed with his army into Bulgaria, where he was joined by the malecontents of that country. Constantine dispatched Stephen Sebasitophorus against him, at the head of a very numerous army; which, however, was defeated and put to flight by Maniaces at the first onset. Maniaces did not live to reap the fruit of his victory, being slain a few days after it, by a person unknown, who had the good luck to make his escape. Upon his death, those who had been most forward in the rebellion, were the first who threw down their arms, and submitted to Stephen, the emperor's general, who, notwithstanding his defeat, was, on his return to Constantinople, honoured with a triumph. The same year 1043, the Roffi, who had continued long quiet, appeared unexpectedly before Constantinople with a mighty fleet; but being defeated by the emperor's navy in the straits, they were glad to renew their ancient alliance with the empire. Upon their retreat, the emperor marched in person into the caft, and there recovered several cities, which the Saracens had seized in the two late reigns. But while he was pursuing the war with great success, Leo Tornicius, escaping out of a monastery, to which he had been confined, assumed the purple, and caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. Leo was a person of extraordinary parts, and nearly related to the emperor, by whom he had been, out of jealousy, removed from his government of Iberia, and shut up in a monastery; but having found means to make his escape from thence he fled to Adrianople, where he was received with loud acclamations by the people, people, who had been lately disobliged by Monomachus. Being joined there by great multitudes, who flocked to him from all parts, he advanced to Constantinople, and laid siege to that metropolis; but meeting, contrary to his expectation, with a vigorous opposition from the inhabitlants, and several of his accomplices falling off from him, he raised the siege, and retired to Arcadiopolis, where he defended himself for some time against the forces the emperor had sent to reduce him; but being in the end overpowered with numbers, he was taken, and sent in chains to Monomachus, who first cau ed his eyes to be pulled out, and then confined him to a remote island. The rebellion being thus happily suppressed almost in its birth, and the Saracens in the east awed by the emperor’s presence, a profound tranquillity reigned the two following years throughout the provinces. But in 1048, the Roman dominions were invaded by a new enemy, scarce mentioned before in history; but reserved by providence for the utter destruction of the empire, which we shall see them accomplish four hundred years hence, and put a period to the very name of a Roman empire. These were the Turks, who, quitting their ancient habitations in the neighbourhood of mount Caucasian, and passing the Caspian frights, had settled in Armenia Major, about the year 844. There they continued an unknown and despicable people, till the wars of the Saracens among themselves gave them an opportunity of aggrandizing their nation. The Saracens, having, with amazing success and rapidity, subdued Persia, Assyria, Egypt, Africa, and a considerable part of Europe itself, divided their vast spreading dominions into several governments or principalities, which were ruled by their respective sultans or commanders, who, in process of time quarrelling with one another, hastened the ruin of the empire, which they had so successively established. About the year 1030, Mohammed, the son of Sambrail, sultan of Persia, not finding himself a match for Pifar, sultan of Babylon, with whom he was at war, had recourse to the Turks, who sent him from Armenia Major, where they settled, as we have observed above, three thousand of their nation, under the conduct of one Tangrolipix, a leading man among them. Mohammed, strengthened with this supply, gained a complete victory over the sultan of Babylon; but when the Turks, to whom it was chiefly owing, desired leave to return home, he refused to comply with their just demand, being unwilling to part with them, till he had ended

The war, in which he was engaged with the Indians. Hereup on the Turks, withdrawing without his consent to the desert of Carbonitis, and being there joined by several discontented Persians, began to make frequent inroads into the territories of the Saracens. Mohammed immediately dispatched an army of twenty thousand men against them, who were surprized in the night by Tangrolipix, and utterly defeated. The fame of this victory, and the immense booty which the Turks acquired by it, drew multitudes to them, from all parts, of criminals, fugitive slaves, robbers, &c. info much, that Tangrolipix saw himself in a short time at the head of fifty thousand men. Mohammed, enraged at the defeat of his forces, ordered the ten generals, who had commanded them, to be deprived of their fight, and at the same time a new army to be raised, which he headed in person; but as he was riding about in the heat of the engagement to animate his men, he fell from his horse, and soon after died of the fall. His death was no sooner known, than his men threw down their arms, and submitting to Tangrolipix, proclaimed him king of Persia. This battle, which gave rise to the Turkish power, was fought about the year 1034, in the neighbourhood of Apfakan, now Isfahan, the metropolis of Persia. Tangrolipix, now master of Persia, having first opened a passage for his countrymen into that kingdom over the Araxes, parting it from Armenia, made war upon Pifaris or Pifatris, kalif of Babylon, whom he at length slew, and annexed his dominions to his own. He then sent his nephew, Cutlu-Moles or Cuthimufes, against the Arabians; but he was overthrown by them in a pitched battle, and obliged to take shelter in Media, through which Stephen, the Roman governor, denying him a passage, he put his troops to flight, took the governor himself prisoner, and, without any further opposition, reached Brijium, on the confines of Persia, where he sold Stephen for a slave. Returning from thence to Tangrolipix, he excused, in the best manner he could, the bad success of his expedition, acquainting him at the same time with his victory over the Romans in Media, and encouraging him to invade that fertile country, which, he said, might be easily subdued, as it was inhabited by none but women, meaning the Romans. Tangrolipix did not then hearken to his advice, being wholly bent on revenging the late defeat on the Arabians, against whom he marched in persons, at the head of a numerous army; but

but being himself defeated and put to flight by that warlike nation, he gave over all thoughts of reducing them; and reflecting on what Cutlu-Mofes had told him, he sent Afsan, his brother's son, surnamed the Deaf, with an army of twenty-thousand men, to reduce Media; which Afsan entered, committing every-where dreadful ravages. But being in the end drawn into an ambush by the Roman generals, he was cut off, with his whole army. Tangrolipix, no-ways discouraged at this misfortune, sent a new army into Media, near an hundred thousand strong; who, after having laid waste the country without opposition, the Romans shutting themselves up in their strong-holds, laid siege to Artza, a place of great trade, and on that account esteemed the most wealthy in those parts; but not being able by any other means to master it, they set fire to it, which in a short time reduced it to ashes. Of the inhabitants an hundred fifty thousand, and upwards, are said to have perished, either by the sword, or in the flames. After this, Abraham Halim, half-brother to Tangrolipix, who commanded the Turks, hearing that the Romans, reinforced with a body of troops under the command of Liparites, governor of Iberia, had taken the field, marched against them, and offered them battle; which they not declining, the two armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expressed. The victory continued long doubtful; but at length inclined to the Romans, who nevertheless did not think it advisable, as their general Liparites was taken prisoner, to pursue the fugitives. The emperor, greatly concerned for the captivity of Liparites, dispatched embassadors, with rich presents and a large sum, to redeem him, and at the same time to conclude an alliance with Tangrolipix. The sultan received the presents; but generously returned them, with the money, to Liparites, whom he set at liberty without ransom, only requiring him, at his departure, never more to bear arms against the Turks. Not long after, Tangrolipix sent a person of great authority among the Turks, with the character of embassador, to Constantineople, who, having arrogantly exhorted the emperor to submit to his matter, and acknowledge himself his tributary, was by Monomachus dismissed with scorn, and driven out of the city. On his return, he acquainted Tangrolipix with the reception he had met with; who thereupon resolved to renew the war. Monomachus, on the other hand, did not neglect the necessary preparations to oppose so powerful an enemy; but was diverted from it by a war, which suddenly broke out between him and the Patzinaces, a Scythian nation. The Patzinaces break into the empire.

whose king, by name Tyrach, highly provoked at the kind reception Kegenes, after revolting from him, had met with from the Romans, passed the Danube on the ice, and entering, if the authors of those times are to be credited, with eight hundred thousand men the Roman provinces, destroyed all with fire and sword. Constantine Arianites was sent against them with all the troops quartered in Macedon and Bulgaria; but he, not thinking it advisable to venture an engagement, suffered them to ravage the country without control, till great multitudes of them being swept off by the diftempers which raged in their army, he was advised by Kegenes, who joined him with twenty thousand men, to fall upon them suddenly; which he did with so much resolution, that the barbarians, weakened with sickness, and terrified at so sudden an onset, threw down their arms and submitted. Great numbers of them were allowed to settle at Sardica, Naissus, Entzopolis, and in other cities of Bulgaria; some returned to their own country; but Tyrach and an hundred and forty of the most noble among them were sent to Constantinople, where they were kindly received by the emperor; and upon their embracing the christian religion, as Kegenes had done before, with all his followers, they were entertained in a manner suitable to their rank, and even raised to considerable employments. However, the emperor having sent fifteen thousand of those who had settled in Bulgaria, under the conduct of Catalunes, one of their own officers, to reinforce the army in Iberia, they revolted on their march; and being joined by great numbers of their countrymen, encamped on the banks of the Danube, making from thence frequent incursions into the Roman territories. The emperor sent some of his best generals against them; but was not able to suppress them, his forces being, in three successive engagements, put to the rout. Having at length resolved to employ the whole strength of the empire against them, they were so terrified at the noise of the preparations the emperor was making, that they sent deputies to sue for peace; which was readily granted them for thirty years. During this war, Tangerlipix affronted at the reception of his embassador, as we have related above, entered Iberia, and having laid the country waste far and near, returned from thence into Media, and laid siege to Manzichiera, a place defended by a numerous garrison, and fortified with a triple wall and deep ditches. However, as it was situated in a plain and open country, he hoped hoped to be master of it in a short time; but finding, after he had continued before it thirty days together, that the besieged were resolved to defend themselves to the utmost extremity, despairing of success, he resolved to raise the siege, when Alcan, one of his chief officers, prevailed upon him to continue it but one day longer, and to commit to him the conduct and management of the attacks. This being granted, Alcan the next day disposed his men with such skill, and encouraged them by his example to fight with so much bravery and resolution, that, notwithstanding the vigorous opposition they met with, the place would, in all likelihood, have been taken, had not Alcan been slain, while, in spite of the incessant flowers of arrows, darts, stones, &c. he was mounting the wall. The besieged, knowing him by the richness of his armour, drew him by the hair into the city, and cutting off his head, threw it over the wall amongst the enemy, who, disheartened at that sight, gave over the assault, and retired, Tangrolipix pretending some urgent affairs had called him home. However, he returned the spring following, and ravaging Iberia, spared neither sex nor age. But upon the approach of Michael Acolthus, who was sent against him at the head of a considerable army, he retired to Tauris, leaving thirty thousand men behind him, to infest the frontiers of the empire; which they did with great success, the borders being, through the avarice of Monomachus, left unguarded; for, till his time, the provinces bordering on the countries of the barbarians, had maintained, at their own charge, forces to defend them, and were on that account exempted from paying tribute. But Monomachus exacting of them the same sums that were paid by the other provinces, they were no longer in a condition to restrain the incursions of the enemy. About this time died the empress Zoe, and soon after the emperor himself. Though he had always expressed a great esteem and regard for Theodora, the sister of Zoe, yet he was prevailed upon by the eunuchs at court to name for his successor Nicephorus, who commanded the forces in Bulgaria, and was privately sent for, when the emperor's recovery was despaired of. But Theodora, informed by her friends at court of the emperor's intention, privately withdrew from the monastery of St. George, whither she had attended him; and returning to Constantinople, attended by her most faithful friends, caused herself to be proclaimed, and saluted empress; which gave Monomachus so much concern.

cern, that he fell into a swoon, and died soon after, having reigned twelve years and eight months. Some authors write, that both he and Zoe died of the plague, which indeed raged at that time with great fury in Constantinople; but most authors ascribe his death to the gout, which he encreased by his intemperance, lewdness, and debaucheries.

Theodora. Theodora no sooner received the news of his death, than she caused all those to be secured, who had proposed the promotion of Nicephorus; and depriving them of their employments, named others in their room, in whom she thought she could confide. Theodorus, the eunuch, was sent at the head of a considerable army into the east to awe the Turks, who, hearing of the emperor's death, were preparing to renew the war. He prevented with his care and vigilance the enemy from making inroads into the Roman territories; so that the eastern provinces enjoyed, during Theodora's short reign, a profound tranquillity, to which they had been long strangers. Her prudent choice of the great officers and ministers of state, her impartial administration of justice, (for she heard all caufes herself) and her great moderation in the use of the authority with which she was invested, gained her the affections of her people, and the respect and esteem of all foreign nations. But the empire did not long enjoy the many valuable blessings that attended her administration; for in the second year of her reign she was feized with a violent pain in her bowels, which in a few days put an end to her life. Before she died, she was persuaded by Leo Strabospodulus, her prime minister, and her favourite eunuch, to bequeath the empire to Michael Stratificus, a person stricken in years, and altogether ignorant of state-affairs, which chiefly recommended him to the eunuchs, who hoped to govern in his name with an absolute sway. Theodora died, soon after she had named him, in the month of August 1056, having reigned one year and nine months. The death of Theodora, and promotion of Michael, which had been managed with the utmost secrecy, being known at the same time, Theodorus, cousin-german to the deceased emperor, laying claim to the empire, as of right belonging to him, protested against what had been done in favour of Michael; and summoning all his friends, servants, and dependents, moved in the evening with a great train through the most frequented streets to the palace; but finding the gates shut and well guarded, he went from thence to the great church, not doubting but he should be well received there by the patriarch and the clergy. But they refusing, contrary to his expectation expectation, to admit him, he had recourse to the people, who, unmoved by his offers and promises, continued firm in the resolution they had taken a few hours before to support Michael. Theodorus, now well apprised he could not succeed in his attempt, and dreading the resentment of the new emperor, renounced all claim to the imperial dignity, and took refuge with his son in the church; but he was soon dragged from thence by the emperor’s orders, and banished to Pergamus, where he died some years after. The rebellion being thus suppressed, Michael enjoyed the imperial dignity without a competitor, but soon shewed himself altogether unequal to so eminent a post. As he was an entire stranger to state-affairs, having been brought up from his youth in the camp, he suffered the eunuchs, to whom he was indebted for his promotion, to govern without control. At their instigation he disoblige most of the general officers of the army, whom he ought to have regarded as his chief support, and among the rest, Isac Comnenus, and Ambus tus Catacale, men renowned for their eminent services and experience in war. The former he de- prived of his command in the army, and the latter he removed from the government of Antioch, recalling Bryennius, a man of a turbulent and restless spirit, who had been banish- ed by Theodora, and appointing him commander in chief of the eastern forces. Bryennius, upon his return to court, petitioned the emperor for his estate, which had been con- finement in the late reign, but met with a frisky denial; which provoked him to such a degree, that he resolved to revolt, and employ the forces under his command against the person who had entrusted him with them. Having imparted his design to Ambus tus, Comnenus, and several others, who had been disoblige by Michael, they all met, in order to pro- ceed to the election of a new emperor, when, by the unanimous consent of the whole party, Ambus tus was chosen; but he declining the burden on account of his age, Isac Comnenus was proposed next, as a person in every respect well qualified for so great a trust. As the proposal was received by all with great applause, Comnenus did not oppose it, but suffered the conspirators to take an oath of allegiance to him, promising at the same time to govern with justice and moderation. After this, they all departed from Constantinople, where they had met, according to custom, at Easter, and repaired to their several posts, where each of them was, in his respective station, to promote the general design. Bryen- nius hastened to the army in the east; but falling out there with John Orphas, a patrician, whom the emperor had ap- pointed to distribute a largess among the soldiers, the quarrel was carried to such an height, that Bryennius, in defiance of the emperor's orders, committed Oppas to custody, after having caused him to be publicly beaten with rods. Here-upon Lycanthes, who commanded in that neighbourhood a strong body of Lycaonians, and Pisidians, concluding that Bryennius designed to revolt, fell upon him unexpectedly in his camp; and having taken him prisoner, delivered him to Oppas, by whose orders his eyes were pulled out. The officers of the east, informed of his misfortune, and apprehending he might, upon examination, reveal their designs, (for he was sent in chains to the emperor) resolved openly to declare themselves; and accordingly having drawn together, in a spacious plain, all the forces under their command, they sent for Comnenus, who was then at his house in Paphlagonia, and presented him in the imperial robes to the soldiery, by whom he was, with universal consent, saluted emperor on the eighth of June 1057.

Comnenus, thus raised to the imperial dignity, took upon him the command of the army, which he immediately marched over the river Sangarius in Phrygia Major, bending his rout towards Nice, which he surprised, most of the soldiery, who garrisoned it, being retired to their own homes. In the mean time, Stratoticus, receiving news of the revolt, assembled all the forces quartered in the west; and having furnished his army, chose for his generals Theodorus the eunuch, and Aaron Ducas, an officer of great experience in war, and brother to the wife of Comnenus. The two generals marched at the head of their army to Nicomedes, and from thence to Nice, in the neighbourhood of which city they found Comnenus encamped. Upon their approach, he drew up his army, Ambustus having the command of the left wing, Romanus Sclerus of the right, and Comnenus himself of the main body. The emperor's generals accepted the challenge, and the two armies engaged with great resolution and intrepidity. At first Aaron, who commanded the left wing of the imperial army, broke the opposite wing of the enemy, took Romanus himself prisoner, and pursued the fugitives to their camp. But Ambustus, on the other hand, bearing all down before him, pierced into the enemy's camp, which he took and plundered; and then charging with fresh vigor the emperor's left wing, obliged them to give over the pursuit, and retire in some confusion. In their retreat they were attacked by Comnenus, and easily put to flight; which so discouraged the rest of the emperor's troops, that throwing away their arms, they fled in great disorder. Comnenus, having having thus gained a complete victory, began his march to Constantinople, not doubting, but the citizens would open their gates to him, as soon as he appeared before them. In the mean time, Stratoticus, informed of the overthrow of his forces, sent some of the chief men in the senate to Comnenus, with proposals for an agreement, which was concluded on the following terms: That Comnenus should be declared Caesar; that a full pardon should be granted to all his followers; and that such of them as enjoyed employments, should be continued in them, and confirmed by the emperor. But this agreement was made void by the emperor himself soon after he had ratified it: for, at the instigation of some about him, he obliged, partly by promises, partly by menaces, the senate and people to bind themselves by a most solemn oath never to give Comnenus the title of emperor, nor own him for their sovereign. This oath was exacted, when Comnenus was still in Asia; but news was no sooner brought, that he was within a day's march of Constantinople, than he was, by a decree of the senate, and the unanimous consent of the people, proclaimed emperor, and all those, who should oppose him, adjudged enemies to their country. The decree being passed in the senate without opposition, the patriarch dispatched messengers to Comnenus, inviting him to the city, and at the same time some bishops to Stratoticus, commanding him in the name of the senate and people to resign the imperial dignity, and quit the palace. We are told, that when the bishops delivered their message, Stratoticus asked them, What they intended to give him in exchange for the empire? and that they answering, The kingdom of heaven, he immediately devested himself of the purple, and, quitting the palace, retired to his own house, and from thence to a monastery, after he had reigned one year. Comnenus arrived the same evening, and was the next day, the first of September 1057, crowned in the great church by the patriarch Michael Cerularius. The new emperor's first care was to reward those, to whom he was chiefly indebted for his promotion, and above all the patriarch, whose nephews and relations he preferred to the first employments in the state. As he was well skilled in military affairs, and had given signal proofs of his courage and resolution, the neighbouring barbarians continued quiet, during his short reign. At home he

he was more feared on account of his severity than beloved. As he found the exchequer quite drained, he loaded the people with heavy taxes, and at length fell upon the monasteries, depriving them of the immense wealth, with which they had been enriched by his predecessors. This the patriarch highly resented, and with great arrogance threatened to pull him down from the throne, to which he had raised him, unless he restored to the monasteries the estates which he had unjustly seized. But the emperor, instead of yielding to his threats, immediately banished him, and raised Constantine Lichudes to the patriarchal see in his room. Isaac had not reigned above two years, when he was seized with a violent distemper, occasioned, as some authors write, by a flash of lightning. Being sensible that his end approached, and at the same time touched with remorse in reflecting by what means he had obtained the imperial dignity, he voluntarily resigned it, and retiring to a monastery, there spent the remainder of his days in exercises of piety, having reigned but two years and three months. Being advised, before he resigned, to chuse a successor, though he had several children and near relations of his own, yet, preferring the public good to his private interest, he named Constantine Ducas, a person generally esteemed the best qualified in the whole empire for so eminent a station. Ducas, thus chosen by Comnenus, and received by the senate and people, was crowned with the usual solemnity by the patriarch. He applied himself with great diligence to the affairs of state, administered justice with the utmost impartiality, reformed several abuses, which had prevailed under his predecessors, and behaved on all occasions with such moderation, that he might have been reckoned amongst the best princes, had not his intractable avarice drowned, in a manner, all his good qualities. He chose rather to leave the frontiers naked and unguarded, than to maintain the necessary garrisons; which encouraged the Turks to extend their conquests on all sides, and the Uzians, a Scythian nation, to pass the Danube to the number of five hundred thousand men, and ravage the neighbouring countries. Nicephorus Botoniates, afterwards emperor, and Basilus Apocraphe, were sent against them. But the barbarians having put the emperor's forces to flight at the first onset, and taken both the generals in the pursuit, laid waste all Thrace and Macedonia; and, penetrating without opposition into Greece, destroyed all with fire and sword. The emperor, affected with the calamities of his subjects, but yet unwilling to be at the charge of raising the necessary forces to deliver them, them from the oppression under which they groaned, endeavoured at first to purchase a peace with rich presents, and even with promising to pay them an annual tribute. To such meanness was the emperor brought by his fordid temper, but the barbarians refusing to hearken to any terms, he ordered a general fact to be observed throughout his dominions, and then marched out against them with an handful of men. But, in the mean time, the enemy being greatly weakened by a plague that began to reign among them, the Hungri, or Hungarians, whose country they had ravaged, fell unexpectedly upon them, and cut them off almost to a man. Nothing else happened, during this unactive prince's reign, which authors have thought worth transmitting to posterity, except a dreadful earthquake, which overturned several stately edifices at Constantinople, and the appearing of a comet, which was seen for forty days together, and thought to portend the emperor's approaching fate. And indeed Constantine was soon after seized with a violent distemper, which in a few days put an end to his life. He left the empire to his three sons, Michael, Andronicus, and Constantine; but as they were yet very young, he appointed the empress Eudocia, their mother, regent during their minority, after having required of her an oath never to marry, which was lodged with great solemnity in the hands of the patriarch. He likewise obliged the senators solemnly to swear that they would acknowledge none for their sovereign but his three sons. Having thus secured, as he thought, the imperial crown to his family, he died in 1067, after having reigned five years and six months. He was no sooner dead, than the Turks, hearing the empire was governed by a woman, broke with great violence into Mesopotamia, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, destroying all with fire and sword. The empress was no-ways in a condition to oppose them, the greater part of the army having been disbanded in her husband's lifetime, and the troops, that were still on foot, being undisciplined and altogether unfit for service. This gave the empress great concern, which was aggravated by the f cabinet speeches of a discontented party at home, repeating in all assemblies, that the present state of the empire required a man of courage and address at the helm, instead of a weak and helpless woman. As they imagined the empress would never think of marrying, in regard of the oath she had taken, they hoped by these speeches to induce the people to revolt, and and chuse a new emperor. This Eudocia was aware of; and therefore, to prevent the evils that threatened her and her family, she resolved to marry some perfom of merit, capable of defeating the designs of her enemies both at home and abroad.

At this time, Romanus Diogenes, a perfom of a most beautiful aspect, extraordinary parts, and an illustrious birth, for he was descended from the emperor Romanus Argyrus, being accused of aspiring at the empire, tried and convicted, was brought forth to receive the sentence of death, which his ambition had deserved. But the empress, touched with compassion at the appearance of the unhappy prisoner, who, she thought, deserved a better fate, put a stop to the sentence; and, having gently upbraided him with his ill-timed ambition, set him at liberty; and soon after appointed him commander in chief of all her forces; in which situation he acquitted himself so well, that the empress resolved to marry him, if she could but recover the writing, in which her oath was contained, out of the hands of the patriarch. In order to this, she applied herself to a favourite eunuch, who, going to the patriarch, told John Xiphiline, that the empress was so taken with his nephew, by name Bardas, that she was determined to marry him, and raise him to the empire, provided he absolved her from the oath she had lately taken, and convinced the senate of the lawfulness of such a marriage. The patriarch, though a man of great probity and learning, yet dazzled with the prospect of his nephew's promotion, readily undertook to perform both; and accordingly, having first obtained the consent of the senate, by representing to them the dangerous condition of the empire, and excusing against the rash oath, which the jealousy of the late emperor had extorted from the empress, he publicly discharged her from the observance of it, restored the writing to her, and exhorted her to marry some deserving perfom, who, being entrusted with an absolute authority, might protect her and her children, and defend the empire against the many enemies, who threatened it, and were not to be repressed by the hands of a weak woman, or awed by three young children. The empress, thus discharged from her oath, married a few days after, to the great disappointment of the patriarch, Romanus Diogenes, who was thereupon proclaimed emperor. As he was a man of great activity and experience in war, he no sooner saw himself invested with the sovereign power, than, taking upon him the command of the army, he passed over into Asia with the few forces he could assemble, ble, recruiting and inuring them on his march to the militay discipline, which had been utterly neglected in the preceding reigns. Upon his arrival in Asia, he was informed, that the Turks, having surprized and plundered the city of Neocæsarea, were retiring with a rich booty. Hereupon, haftening after them at the head of a chozen body of light-armed troops, he came up with them the third day; and falling upon them, while they were marching in disorder, without the least apprehension of an enemy, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and recovered the booty. He then pursu-his march to Aleppo, which he retook, together with Hie-rapolis, where he built a strong casle. As he was returning to join the forces he had left behind him, he was met by a nuumerous body of Turks, who attempted to cut off his retreat; but the emperor, pretending at first through fear to decline an engagement, attacked them afterwards, when they least expected it, with such vigor, that he put them to flight at the first onset, and might have gained a compete victory, had he thought it advisable to pursue them. After this, several towns submitted to him, the Turks abandoning them upon the first news of his approach. But the autumn being already far spent, he retired to Cilicia, and from thence to Constantinople. The following year, he passed over into Asia early in the spring; and being informed, that the Turks, having defeated Philaretus, who had been left to guard the banks of the Euphrates, were advanced into Cilicia, and had there surprized and sacked Icon-nium, the most rich and populous city of that province, he marched in person against them. But the Turks, not thinking it advisable to wait his arrival, retired in great haste.

However, the Armenians, encouraged by the approach of the emperor's army, fell upon the enemy in the plains of Tarsus, put them to flight, and stripped them both of their baggage and the booty they had taken. The enemy being retired, the emperor spent the remaining part of the summer in settling the affairs of the provinces; and, upon the approach of winter, returned once more to Constantinople, which he entered in triumph, amidst the loud acclamations of the people. The spring following, the emperor marched anew into Asia, at the head of a considerable army, which he had raised, and with incredible pains disciplined, during the winter. As the Turks had already taken the field, several skirmishes happened between the parties detached from the two armies, in one of which Nicephorus Basilacius, one of the emperor's chief officers, was taken prisoner, and carried to Axan, the Turkish sultan, and son of the celebrated Tancrelipix, who received and entertained him with great civility. When the two armies drew near, the sultan, obseving the disposition and number of the emperor's forces, and dreading, as he was a man of great experience and sagacity, the uncertain issues of war, sent embassadors to Romanus, with proposals for a lasting and honourable peace, which being rejected by the emperor with disdain, both armies prepared for an engagement. Though the emperor's troops were not near so numerous as those of the enemy, Rufelius, one of his best commanders, having been detached a little before with a considerable body; yet Romanus, presuming upon the courage of his men and the success that had hitherto attended his arms, caused the signal to be given, and falling with great fury upon the enemy, put them into some disorder. However they soon rallied, and charged with fresh vigor, so that the dispute continued with various success, till the emperor, fearing the sultan should send part of his army to attack his camp, which he had left weakly guarded, caused, as the day was already far spent, a retreat to be founded, and retired in good order with that part of the army, which he commanded in person. But Andronicus, the son of John Ducas brother to the late emperor Constantitine, and in his heart an enemy to Romanus, whose good fortune he envied, cried out, that the emperor was put to flight; and at the same time, turning his horse about, fled with great precipitation to the camp. The rest of the army followed his example, and were pursu'd by the Turks, who in that confusion put great numbers of them to the sword.

The emperor did all that lay in his power to make them rally and face the enemy; but, in spite of his utmost efforts, they continued their flight, every one shifting for himself in the best manner he could. The emperor, though thus forsaken by his army, yet stood his ground, till he himself being wounded and his horse killed under him, he was at length overpowered with numbers and taken prisoner. When news was first brought to the sultan of his captivity, he could hardly give credit to it. But being assured of the truth, both by the embassadors, whom he had sent to him before the battle, and by Basilicus his captive, he ordered the emperor to be brought before him, and tenderly embracing him, "Grieve not, noble emperor, said he, at your misfortune; for such is the chance of war; sometimes

"overwhelming one, and sometimes another; you shall have no occasion to complain of your captivity; for I will not use you as my prisoner, but as an emperor:" which he did accordingly, lodging him in a royal pavilion, assigning him attendants, with an equipage suitable to his quality, and discharging such prisoners as he desired. After he had entertained for some days his royal captive with extraordinary magnificence, a perpetual peace was concluded between them, and the emperor dismissed with the greatest marks of honour imaginable. Being thus set at liberty, he proceeded, attended by the sultan's embassadors, for Constantinople, where the peace was to be ratified. He stopped at Theodosiopolis, and continued some days there to have his wounds dressed, with a design to pursue his journey to the imperial city, as soon as he was able to travel. But, in the mean time, he was informed, that John, the brother of Constantine Ducas, with Pfellus, a leading man in the senate, and several others, having, upon the news of his captivity, driven Eudocia from the throne, and shut her up in a monastery, had proclaimed her eldest son Michael Ducas emperor. Upon this intelligence he left Theodosiopolis, and repairing to a strong castle called Docia, he fortified himself there, not doubting, but he should be soon joined by his friends, and by great numbers of the officers and soldiers, who had served under him. But, in the mean time, John, who had taken upon him to act as guardian to the young prince, and governed with an absolute sway, dispatched his eldest son Andronicus against him with a strong body of troops, who having defeated the small army the unfortunate prince had with him, pursued him to Adana, a city in Cilicia, where he was closest besieged, and in the end forced to surrender. Andronicus carried his prisoner into Phrygia, where he fell dangerously ill, being, as was suspected, secretly poisoned. But the poison being too slow in its operation, John ordered his eyes to be pulled out, which was done with such cruelty, that he died soon after in the island Prota, to which he had been confined, having reigned three years and eight months." Romanus Diogenes being thus removed, Michael Ducas was universally acknowledged emperor; but he being an indolent and unactive prince, the whole power was lodged in John his uncle, who preferred such only as had been instrumental in the late revolution, and,

and, under various pretences, banished those who gave him the least umbrage.

In the mean time, Axan, the Turkish sultan, hearing of the unhappy end of the late emperor, resolved to revenge the death of his friend and ally; and accordingly, having raised a powerful army, he broke into the territories of the empire, not with a design only to spoil and plunder, as formerly, but to conquer and hold what he had once conquered. The emperor, alarmed at the motions of the Turks, dispatched Isaac Comnenus, son to the late emperor of that name, against them, who gained at first some advantages over them; but having soon after ventured a general engagement, his army was, after a long and obstinate dispute, utterly defeated, and he himself taken prisoner. Another army was soon dispatched against them, under the command of John Ducas, the emperor's uncle, who gained several advantages over the enemy, and would, in all likelihood, have put a stop to their farther conquests, had he not been diverted by Rufelius, or Urselius, a native of Gaul, who, revolting with the troops of his own nation under his command, reduced several cities in Phrygia and Cappadocia, causing himself to be everywhere proclaimed emperor. Against him John marched with all his forces, suffering the Turks in the mean time to pursue their conquests; but coming to an engagement with the rebels on the banks of the Sangarius, he received a total overthrow and was taken prisoner. Notwithstanding this victory, Rufelius, to stop the progress of the Turks, who threatened the empire with utter destruction, not only released his prisoner, but joined him against the common enemy, by whom they were both overcome and taken prisoners. However, Axan was for some time diverted from pursuing his conquests, and reaping the fruit of his victory, by Cutlu-Moses, cousin to the late sultan Tangrolipix, from whom he had revolted; but being defeated by him in a pitched battle, he had taken refuge in Arabia, whence he now returned, at the head of a considerable army; and laying claim to the sovereignty, was preparing to decide the controversy by dint of sword. But while the two armies were ready to engage, the kalif of Babylon, who had been deprived of his temporal jurisdiction by Tangrolipix, as we have related above, but still continued to exercise his authority in matters of religion, being looked upon as the successor of their great prophet, interposed; and by representing to them the dangers, to which their intestine dissensions exposed them, brought them to this agreement ; that that Axan should enjoy undisturbed the monarchy lately erected by his father Tangrolipix, and that Cutlu-Moses, and his family, should quietly possess such provinces of the empire as he or his sons should, in process of time, conquer. This agreement being made, Cutlu-Moses turned all his forces against the empire; and being assisted by Axan, made himself, in this and the following reign, master of all Media, Lycaonia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, fixing the seat of his new empire at Nice in the latter province. While the Turks were busied in reducing the above-mentioned provinces, Rufelius, who had been ransomed by his wife, and, notwithstanding his late revolt, restored to favour and entrusted with a considerable command in Asia Minor, revolted anew, and, depending upon the assistance of the Turks, with whom he had privately entered into an alliance, caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. Michael went the best commanders in the empire against him; but they were all successively overcome in the several battles that were fought, Rufelius being powerfully supported by the Turks, whose interest it was to lower and maintain divisions in the empire. At length the emperor was advised to send Alexius Comnenus against him, he being esteemed, though then very young, a man of uncommon address and well skilled in the art of war. Alexius, by intercepting the enemy's provisions, and constantly harrying them on their marches, without ever coming to an engagement, reduced them in a short time to such frights, that they were forced to take refuge in the dominions of the sultan, where they were kindly entertained, and supplied with necessaries at the public expense. But Alexius applying to Tutach, the Turkish commander in those parts, he prevailed upon him with a large sum to seize on Rufelius, and send him in chains to Amaçia, whence he was conveyed to Constantinople. The rebels, destitute of a leader, readily submitted, and surrendered the cities and strong-holds which they had reduced. The civil war being thus ended, Alexius returned to the imperial city, which he found highly dissatisfied with the emperor's conduct, and grievously afflicted with a famine, during which the emperor, instead of relieving the distressed inhabitants, had lessened the measure of the corn, which deftverely procured him the nick-name of Parapanaces. The aversion which people of all ranks had for the emperor, on account of his avaricious temper, encouraged Nicephorus Botoniates, who commanded the forces in Asia, to revolt.
volt, and enter into an alliance with the Turks, upon whom he had been sent to make war. Cutlu-Moses promised to assist him to the utmost of his power; upon which he assumed the purple, and was saluted emperor by the army under his command. At the same time, Nicephorus Bryennius, who commanded in Dyrrachium, caused himself to be proclaimed emperor there; and depending upon the affection of his soldiers, whom he had obliged with his liberality, was preparing to march straight to Constantinople. Michael, well apprised that he was not in a condition to oppose either of the two competitors, resolved to resign the empire, and leave the throne empty for which of them should prevail. Accordingly, devesting himself of the imperial ornaments, he retired to a monastery, where he took holy orders, and was soon after raised to the see of Ephesus*. He had reigned six years and as many months, and resigned in the year 1078. Upon his resignation, Botoniates entered Constantinople without opposition; and being crowned by the patriarch on the twenty-fifth of March 1078, he immediately dispatched Alexius Comnenus with the flower of his army against Bryennius, who was advancing with long marches to the imperial city at the head of a numerous and well-disciplined army, and received with loud acclamations in all the places through which he passed, he being universally beloved by the people, and looked upon as a person in every respect well qualified for the empire. The two armies met at Caulaura in Thrace; and an engagement ensuing, the fortune of the day continued doubtful, till the Scythians, who served under Bryennius, pursuing the advantage they had gained over the forces of Alexius, fell upon his baggage and began to plunder; which occasioned great confusion in the army of Bryennius, the rest of his troops following the example of those barbarians. Of this Alexius took advantage, and charging them with fresh vigor, put them to flight. However, they rallied, and, encouraged by Bryennius, returned to the charge; but Alexius having, in the mean time, taken the horse of Bryennius, adorned as he was, according to the custom of those times, with the imperial ornaments, he ordered him to be led up and down the ranks, giving out that the general was slain. His own men being, by this device, greatly encouraged, and those of the enemy equally demoralized, the victory continued no longer doubtful. Bryennius ennius, by shewing himself at the head of his army, convinced them of their mistake; but, as they were already put into disorder, and had begun to give ground, after having attempted in vain to stop their flight, he was himself obliged to fly with the rest. As he was pursued close by the emperor's forces, he had the misfortune to fall into their hands, after having given extraordinary proofs of his personal valour. Alexius received him in a most obliging manner, entertained him at his own table, and soon after, having put his troops into winter-quarters, set out with his unfortunate prisoner for Constantinople; but was met on the road by Borilus with orders from court to deliver up Bryennius to him, and march back against Basilacius, who had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at Dyrrhachium; and being supported by all the men of interest in the west, had surprized Thessalonica, and was preparing to march to the imperial city at the head of a considerable army. Alexius having drawn his troops out of their winter-quarters, marched against the enemy, and encamping at a small distance from Basilacius, began to ravage and lay waste the neighbouring country. Hereupon Basilacius, having attempted in vain to bring him to an engagement, resolved to fall upon his camp in the night, which he did accordingly; but Alexius, informed beforehand of his design, received him, while he expected to meet with no opposition, so briskly, that his forces were soon put to flight, and he himself obliged to throw himself, with part of his army, into Thessalonica, which was immediately invested by the conqueror. Basilacius, who was a man of great resolution and intrepidity, rejecting the advantageous conditions offered by Alexius, prepared to hold out to the last extremity; but the inhabitants, dreading the emperor's retribution, opened their gates, allowing Basilacius just time enough to retire into the castle, which he defended with incredible bravery, till he was betrayed by his own men, and delivered up to Alexius, who sent him to Constantinople, where his eyes were pulled out by the emperor's orders, and he confined to a monastery. As the emperor was stricken in years and had no issue male, Borilus and Germanus, two brothers, natives of Scythia and the chief favourites of Botoniates, persuaded him to name in his will one Synadmus for his successor, a youth of uncommon parts and nearly related to the emperor. Though this was managed with great secrecy, yet Mary the empress had some intimation of it. She was first married to the emperor Michael Ducas, and afterwards to his successor Nicephorus Botoniates. By her former husband she had Constantine Ducas, who, by marrying the daughter of Botoniates, had acquired an indi-pputed right to succeed him. The empress therefore, highly provoked both against the emperor and his favourites, for thus excluding, with the utmost injustice, her son from the empire, disclosed the whole to the two brothers Alexius and Isaac Comneni, who promised her all imaginable assistance.

But in the mean time, the two favourites, taking umbrage at the intimacy that appeared between the empress and the Comneni, resolved to remove, by some means or other, the two brothers out of the way. Of this Alexius being scapo-ably informed, he applied to Pacurianus, an officer of great experience in war and equally versed in state-affairs, acquainted him with the design they had formed of deposing the emperor, and begged him to assist them with his advice. Pacu-rianus, having heard him with great attention, answered without the least hesitation, “That if they withdrew to the army early next morning, he would attend them in their flight; but if they delayed one moment longer, he would discover to the emperor their treasonable designs.” Alexius, charmed with this resolute and generous answer, fled early in the morning, with his brother Isaac, Pacurianus, and the rest of their friends, towards the army, which then lay encamped on the borders of Thrace. Upon their arrival, they acquainted the chief officers of the army with their design of creating a new emperor; which being universally approved of, a council was summoned; and after some deliberation, whether Isaac or Alexius should be raised to the empire, the latter was unanimously chosen, and saluted emperor by the whole army, which, without loss of time, he led to Constantinople, being received with joyful acclamations in all the cities through which he passed. The inhabitants of Constantinople, awed by the troops of Botoniates, shut their gates against him; but an officer, to whose charge one of the quarters of the city was committed, having privately admitted part of Alexius’s forces, the gates were by them opened in the night to the rest, who, rushing in, made themselves masters of the city, before Botoniates knew it was assaulted.
As Alexius’s army was composed of barbarians as well as Christians, the unhappy city was plundered in a most cruel manner, without any regard to the churches themselves, which, together with the monasteries, were stripped of all their wealth and ornaments. George Paleologus, a person of great authority in the empire and a zealous champion for the Comneni, easily prevailed upon the officers of the imperial navy, then riding in the haven of Constantinople, to declare for the new emperor. Botoniates, thus forsworn by all, sent some senators to Alexius, offering the whole power to him, provided he were suffered to retain the bare name of emperor, and with it the ornaments of the imperial dignity. Alexius was inclined to comply with his request; but John Ducas brother to the late emperor Constantine Ducas, an irreconcilable enemy to Botoniates, would not suffer him to hearken to an accommodation upon any terms whatsoever. Hereupon Barilus, the reigning favourite, observing with how much security the troops of Alexius ranged through the city in quest of plunder, drew together a considerable body of resolute men; and having encouraged them with large sums and greater promises, was preparing to fall upon the unwary enemy. But Cosmas the patriarch, a man famed for his piety, advising Botoniates rather to submit to providence and resign the empire, than suffer the city to be polluted with the effusion of Christian blood, he readily embraced his counsel; and leaving the imperial palace, withdrew to the great church, and from thence to a monastery, where he took the religious habit, after he had reigned two years and ten months.

Botoniates having thus resigned the sovereign power, Alexius was, by the unanimous consent of the senate and people, proclaimed emperor, and crowned by the patriarch in the month of April 1081. His first care was to reward those who had been instrumental in his promotion, conferring on them the chief employments in the state, and even inventing new honours and dignities to gratify them. Constantine Ducas, the son of the late emperor Michael, was suffered to wear an imperial crown, and appear with the other ensigns of sovereignty, pursuivant to a promise, which he is said to have made to the empress Mary, before he took arms against Botoniates. As the barbarous behaviour of his soldiers, upon their first entering the city, had given great offence both to the clergy and people, Alexius, either being really, or pretending to be, touched with remorse for the disorders they had committed, resolved to make an open confession, and undergo a public penance. Accordingly he appeared before the patriarch and several other ecclesiastics, in the attire of a penitent; and, acknowledging himself guilty of the many disorders that had been committed by his soldiers, begged the patriarch to impose upon him a penance answerable to the enormity of his crimes. The patriarch enjoined him, and all his relations and adherents, to fast, to lie upon the ground, and to practise several other austerities, for the space of forty days; which no one performed with more cheerfulness than the emperor himself. Having thus attuned for his crimes, or at least gained the affections and esteem of the clergy, he began to make the necessary preparations for putting a stop to the conquests of the Turks, who had seized on several provinces during the late distractions, and threatened the empire with utter destruction. But Solyman, the son and successor of Cutlu-Moses, alarmed at the warlike preparations that were carrying on in all the provinces of the empire, dispatched embassadors to Alexius with overtures for a lasting peace, which he at first rejected, but was in the end glad to accept, tho' he had gained several advantages over the enemy, upon certain advice, that Robert Guiscard, duke of Puglia and Calabria, was making great preparations against him in the west. Robert was by birth a Norman, the son of Tancred lord of Hauteville, who, having a numerous family and but a small estate, sent his two eldest sons to try their fortune in the wars against the Saracens in Italy, where they distinguished themselves in a very eminent manner; and having driven out the Saracens, seized on the places they had held, establishing by that means a new principality in Italy. Robert, the third son, upon the death of his two elder brothers, did not content himself with the principality of Puglia, which they had held, but reduced the greater part of that country which is now called the kingdom of Naples, taking upon him the title of duke of Puglia and Calabria. Towards the end of the reign of Botoniates, Michael, who had been forced to resign the empire, having made his escape into the west, prevailed upon Robert whose daughter had been some years before betrothed to Constantine, Michael's son, to espouse his cause and attempt his restoration. With this view Robert made great preparations both by sea and land, which were continued even after the resignation of Botoniates, Robert being determined to drive Alexius from the throne, if possible, and restore Michael, or, as some authors intimate, to seize on the empire for himself. Be that as it will, Robert, having left his son Roger as his lieutenant in Italy, sailed with all his forces from Brundusium; and landing at Butthrotum in Epirus, made himself master of that place, while his son Bohemond, with part of the army, reduced Aulon, a celebrated port and city in the country now called Albania. From thence they advanced to Dyrrhachium, which they invested both by sea and land, but met with a most vigorous opposition from George Palæologus, whom the emperor had entrusted with the defence of that important place, and who, in spite of the utmost efforts of the enemy, held out, till the Venetians, with whom the emperor had entered into an alliance, arriving with a powerful and well-appointed navy, fell upon the enemy's fleet commanded by Bohemond, and gave them a total overthrow, the admiral himself, whose ship was sunk with several others, having narrowly escaped falling into their hands. After this victory, the Venetians, landing without loss of time, and being joined by Palæologus from the town, fell with great fury upon Robert's men, who were employed in the siege, destroyed their works, burnt their engines, and having driven them back to their camp, returned to their ships loaded with booty. As the Venetians were masters at sea, the besieged were supplied with plenty of provisions, while a great famine raged in the enemy's camp, attended, as usual, by a pestilential distemper, which is said to have destroyed ten thousand men in the space of three months, among whom were some of the chief officers, and many other persons of great distinction. However, Robert, who was a prince of great intrepidity, address, and resolution, pursued the siege; and, having with great difficulty repaired and equipped his fleet, found means to supply his famished troops with provisions, brought in great plenty from Italy. Palæologus, finding the courage of the garrison and citizens began to fail them, sent repeated advices to the emperor of the straights, to which they would, in all likelihood, be reduced. Hereupon Alexius resolved to march in person to the relief of the place; and accordingly, leaving his brother Isaac at Constantinople, to prevent any disturbances there during his absence, he set out for Thessalonica; and being joined there by Pacurianus and the troops under his command, he pursuèd his march with incredible expedition to Dyrrhachium; and encamping at some distance from the town, on a rising ground, with the sea on the left, and an inaccessible mountain on the right, he summoned a council of war, in which, after a warm debate, it was resolved by a great majority, but contrary to the opinion of the most experienced officers in the army, that the whole should be put to the issue of an engagement; which Robert was so far from declining, that, observing the emperor's preparations, parations, he ordered all his ships to be sunk, which was giving his men to understand, that they had no hopes of safety, but in victory. However, the emperor's forces had at first the advantage, and drove a body of Robert's troops quite to the sea, which occasioned no small disorder in the army; but they being encouraged and brought back to the charge by Gaia, Robert's wife, a woman of a masculine courage and behaviour, the fight was renewed with fresh vigor, and the victory long disputed. At length the emperor's forces began to give ground, and being warmly pressed by the enemy, the whole right wing betook themselves to a precipitous and disorderly flight, most of them escaping to a neighbouring church, dedicated to St. Michael, as to a place of safety. But the victorious enemy, pursuing them close, set fire to the church, which was soon consumed, with all who were in it. In the mean time, Robert having put to flight the main body of the emperor's army, Alexius himself was forced to retire, though he was the last, if we may give credit to his daughter Anna Comnena, who turned his back. The flower of the emperor's troops were cut off, either in the flight or in the pursuit, with an incredible number of officers and persons of distinction, among whom were Constantius, the son of Constantine Ducas, Nicephorus Synadenius, Nicephorus Palæologus, the father of George, Zacharias, Aspetes, &c. The emperor with much ado made his escape, and reached Achris, leaving the enemy master of his camp and the whole baggage of the army. Robert, elated with this victory, returned before Dyrhachium, which immediately submitted, and opened its gates to the conqueror, who, as the year was already far spent, put his troops into winter-quarters, with a design to pursue his conquests early in the spring. In the mean time, Alexius, who had lost the flower of his troops in the battle, ordered new forces to be raised in all the provinces of the empire, feizing for that purpose, as the exchequer was quite exhausted, on the wealth of the churches and monasteries, which gave great offence to the clergy, and had like to have occasioned dreadful disturbances in the imperial city. At the same time, Alexius, entering into an alliance with Henry, emperor of Germany, prevailed to invade the territories of Robert in Italy, which he did accordingly early in the spring, entering Calabria at the head of a numerous army. Robert was no sooner informed of the emperor's motions, than, summoning a council of war, he appointed his son Bohemond his lieutenant in the camp; and having recommended him to the officers, officers of the army, he set out without delay for Italy, where he relieved the pope, besieged by the emperor’s forces in the caffle of St. Angelo, retook Rome, and drove the emperor out of Italy, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place. In the mean time, Bohemond reduced several places in Illyricum; and, having defeated Alexius in two pitched battles, entered Thefaly, and sat down before Larilla; which, being defended by an officer of great experience in war, held out till the emperor, having recruited his army, marched to its relief. Soon after his arrival, he found means to draw a strong party of Bohemond’s men into an ambuscade, who were almost all cut off. However, in the battle, which was fought a few days after, Bohemond had the advantage; but his troops mutinying, and refusing to continue the war, till they had received their arrears, he was obliged to repair to his father in Italy. Alexius, taking advantage of his absence, recovered several cities; and being informed, that Robert was making great preparations against him, he had recourse once more to the Venetians, who, having with incredible expedition equipped a powerful fleet, engaged Robert, and overthrew him in two successive battles, but were soon after surprized by him, and defeated with the loss of almost their whole navy. We are told, that Robert used his victory with the greatest barbarity, putting several of his prisoners to unheard-of torments. The Venetians equipped a second fleet; and, joining that of the emperor, fell unexpectedly upon Robert’s navy, while they were riding without the least apprehension of an enemy near Buthrotum, sunk most of his ships, and took a great number of prisoners, his wife and younger sons having narrowly escaped falling into their hands. But Robert, not in the least disheartened with this overthrow, ordered his fleet to be refitted, new ships to be built, and levies to be made throughout his Italian dominions, with a design to pursue the war with more vigor than ever. But being in the mean time seized with a violent fever, he died in the island of Cephalenia, being then in the seventy-ninth year of his age. Upon his death, Roger, his son and successor, not thinking it advisable to pursue so dangerous and expensive a war, recalled his troops; so that Dyrrachium, and the other places, which they had seized in Illyricum, submitted anew to the emperor.

This war was scarce ended, when another broke out with the Scythians, who, passing the Danube, laid waste the great great part of Thrace, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties. Against them the emperor dispatched Pucurianus and Branas, who, engaging the enemy, tho' far superior to them in numbers, were both cut off, with the greater part of the army, to the unspeakable grief of the emperor, who had a particular esteem for Pucurianus, on account of his extraordinary parts, his experience in war, and his approved fidelity. This overthrow was owing to the rafflnes of Branas, who in a manner forced his colleague to venture an engagement, contrary to his own opinion. Talicius, who had signalized himself on several occasions, being appointed to command the army in their room, fell upon the enemy as they lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Philippopolis, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to retire in the utmost confusion. However, they returned the spring following in such numbers, that the emperor resolved to march against them in person. Accordingly, leaving the imperial city, he set out for Adrianople, and from thence to a place called Lardea, where, contrary to the advice of his most experienced officers, he engaged the enemy; but, after a warm dispute, which lasted almost from morning to night, was put to flight and utterly defeated. Incredible numbers of his men were put to the sword or taken prisoners, he himself escaping with the utmost difficulty to Berea. About the same time, the Turks, finding the main strength of the empire was employed against the Scythians, broke with great violence into the Roman territories, and made themselves masters of several places of great importance in Asia, and among the rest of Clazomene, Phocaea, Mitylene, Methymna, and soon after of the island of Chios. This sudden irruption obliged the emperor to fend part of his forces into the east, under the conduct of John Ducas, brother to the empress, while he himself led the rest, reinforced with new levies, against the Scythians, by whom he was again overthrown with great loss, being betrayed by one Neantzes, a Scythian, who had deserted to him in the beginning of the war; but abandoning him in the heat of the battle, so disheartened the Romans with his sudden flight, that they began to give ground; and being pressed by the enemy and overpowered with numbers, they retired in great disorder, leaving the Scythians masters of their camp and baggage. However, not long after, Alexius gained a considerable advantage over them, and the year following, 1084, having defeated them in a pitched battle and put them to flight, made such a dreadful havoc of the fugitives, that few of

of them are said to have escaped the general slaughter. An end being put to the Scythian war by this victory, the emperor resolved to march in person against the Turks, with whom John Ducas, his brother-in-law, had often fought with various success. Tzachas, a leading man among the Turks, having made himself master of Smyrna, erected there a new principality, independent of the sultan, harassing with frequent incursions the neighbouring countries. He had, besides several other places, reduced Mitylene, which John Ducas, pursuant to his instructions, closely besieged by land, while Constantine Delaffenus who commanded the fleet, invested it by sea. But Tzachas, having committed the defence of the place to his brother, kept the field with a choosen body of troops, watching the motions of the Romans, intercepting their provisions, and harassing them with frequent and sudden onsets, which diverted them from pursuing the siege with due vigor. But John Ducas, having at length drawn Tzachas to an engagement, gave him a total overthrow; after which he sent deputies to Ducas, with proposals for a peace, which was concluded upon the following terms: That Tzachas should be allowed to retire unmolested to Smyrna; that Mitylene should be delivered up to the Romans; and that none of the inhabitants should be injured in their persons or estates, or be forced to attend Tzachas at his departure. These articles were mutually agreed to, and hostages delivered on both sides; but Tzachas having, with a manifest breach of the treaty, obliged several of the inhabitants to quit their habitations and follow him, Delaffenus failed after him; and, soon coming up with him, funk most of his ships, put great numbers of his men to the sword, and released the captives, Tzachas himself having narrowly escaped falling into his hands by embarquing on a light vessel, which carried him safe to Smyrna, where he ordered a new fleet to be equipped, and in the mean time marched with all the forces he could raise to Abydos, which he hoped to reduce, before it could be relieved by the emperor. But the sultan, looking upon him as an enemy no less dangerous to himself than to the empire, marched against him in person at the head of a powerful army, while Delaffenus, the Roman admiral, cut off his retreat by sea. Tzachas, finding himself thus attacked by two powerful enemies at once, chose to submit to the sultan, whose daughter he had married. The sultan received him in a very obliging manner, manner, and invited him to an entertainment; but, in the height of his mirth, caused him to be murdered, and soon after concluded a peace with the emperor

In the year 1093, the Scythian war broke out anew, the barbarians being encouraged to invade the empire by an impostor, who, pretending to be Leo, the eldest son of the late emperor Romanus Diogenes, slain some years before in an engagement with the Turks, laid claim to the empire, and was received with great joy by the Scythians, who wanted only a pretence to renew the war. Alexius, having received timely advice of the design they had formed of falling with all their forces on the empire, visited the borders in person; and having supplied the frontier towns with whatever was necessary for their defence, repaired to the city of Anchialus on the Euxine sea. There he was informed, that the barbarians, having passed the Danube, and caused the impostor to be proclaimed emperor in several towns, which had submitted to them, were advancing with long marches to Anchialus, in order to besiege the place, and, by taking the emperor, put an end to the war at once. Upon this intelligence, Alexius, having left a sufficient garrison in the place, encamped with the rest of his forces on a rising ground at a small distance from the city, and there fortified himself in such manner, that the barbarians, after having viewed his camp and works for three days together, thought it advisable to draw off; and leaving Anchialus, which they could not invest without driving the emperor from his post, marched to Adrianople, the impostor persuading them, that the place would be immediately delivered up to them by Nicephorus Bryennius, who commanded in it, and had, he affirmed, been highly obliged by his father Romanus Diogenes, when emperor. The credulous barbarians, believing all he said, marched cheerfully to Adrianople, but, contrary to their expectation, met there with so vigorous a resistance, that, after they had continued seven weeks before it, they had some thoughts of abandoning the enterprise. But being encouraged by the pretended Leo to pursue the siege, the place was in the end reduced to the utmost extremity, and must have submitted in a few days, had not an officer of the army, by name Alacafeus, preferred it by the following stratagem: In imitation of the celebrated Zopyrus, he disfigured his face, mangled his whole body in a cruel manner, and flying in that condition condition to the impostor, told him, that he was the son of one, who had been inviolably attached to his father, on which account he had been thus inhumanly treated by Alexius, and was come to implore the protection of the lawful emperor, and conjure him, by the memory of both their fathers, to revenge their mutual injuries. The usurper, giving credit to what he said, and reposing an entire confidence in him, followed him, attended by a chosen body of Scythians, to a strong-hold in that neighbourhood, which, Alacaesus pretended, the governor designing to betray to him. He was accordingly received, as had been agreed before-hand, into the place, and invited by the governor to a grand entertainment; at which the mock prince and his Scythians, who, without the least apprehension of treachery, had drunk to excess, were seized and loaded with chains. Hereupon Alexius, informed of what had happened, marched with all possible expedition against the Scythians, now destitute of a leader; and falling upon them, before they had the least intelligence of his approach, slew seven thousand of them upon the spot, took three thousand prisoners, and obliged the rest to save themselves by a precipitous flight. However, they returned the following year with a very numerous army; but, being overthrown in two successive engagements, they sent at length deputies to treat of a peace; which was concluded upon the emperor’s own terms. After this Alexius returned to Constantinople, loaded with booty; which he generously divided among those, who had distinguished themselves most in the war.

During his stay at Constantinople, he was informed that the western christians were making great preparations for the recovery of the holy land, at that time possessed by the Turks and Saracens. As the fortunes of those adventurers are inseparably interwoven with the remaining part of this history, it might be jufully deemed an unpardonable omission, not to acquaint the reader with the motives that prompted them to engage in that mighty undertaking, commonly known by the name of the holy war, or the crusade. About the year 1093, an hermit, by name Peter, a native of Amiens in Picardy, undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, to visit the holy places there; and observing the miserable condition of the christians in Asia, Syria, and Palestine, at that time mostly possessed by the Turks, and the cruel usage they met with from those infidels, on account of their religion, he began to deliberate, deliberate, first with himself, and afterwards with Simon, then patriarch of Jerusalem, about the means of rescuing them from the tyranny under which they groaned. As the eastern empire was in too weak a condition to give any hopes of relief, he resolved to apply to the western princes, and endeavour, by all possible means, to unite them in a league against the common enemy, for the relief of the unhappy christians and the recovery of the holy land. Accordingly, having received pressing letters from the patriarch and the grand master of the hospitalers, to that purpose, to the pope and all the christian princes in the west, he took upon him to be messenger; and embarking on the first ship he met, he arrived at Bari in Puglia; and proceeding from thence to Rome, he delivered the letters to pope Urban II. giving him at the same time a pathetic account of the unexpressible miseries the christians suffered under the Turkish yoke, of which he himself had been an eye-witness. Having received all the encouragement he could with for from the pope, he applied to the other princes; and, travelling from kingdom to kingdom, inspired both princes and people with the pious and commendable desire of relieving the oppressed christians, and rescuing the holy land out of the hands of the infidels. The pope, informed of this general disposition, summoned a council at Clermont in France, where three hundred and ten bishops met, and likewise the embassadors of most christian princes; to whom Peter the hermit made an eloquent speech, representing the sufferings of the oppressed christians, the deflation of the holy places, the cruelty of the Turks, &c. in so lively and affecting a manner, that a religious war was unanimously resolved on, all declaring, as if filled with one spirit, their consent, by often repeating aloud, Deus vult, Deus vult, God will have it so, God will have it so. Upon the dissolution of the council, the crusade was published by the pope, and generally embraced throughout the west, multitudes flocking together from all parts, with red crosses on their breasts, the mark of their expedition, ready to recover the holy land, and redeem the christians from the cruel yoke they groaned under, at the expense of their lives. They are supposed in all to have been no fewer than three hundred thousand men, of whom the chief commanders were, Hugh brother to Philip I. king of France, Robert duke of Normandy, Robert earl of Flanders, Raymond of Toulouse, Godfrey, of Bouillon, with his brothers Baldwin and Leuflace, Stephen de Valois earl of Chartres, Bohemond prince of Tarentum, and Peter the hermit. To the latter was given given the command of forty thousand men; which army he divided into two bodies, leading one himself, and committing the other to the conduct of Gautier, a native of France, surnamed, from his being a soldier of fortune, the Moneyless. Gautier began his march on the eighteenth of March 1096, and, passing through Germany, entered Hungary, where the inhabitants refusing to supply him and his army with the necessary provisions, he was forced to plunder the country. Hereupon the Hungarians, falling upon him on his march, killed great numbers of his men, and obliged the rest to save themselves among the woods and marshes, where they lay concealed, and suffered unexpressible miseries, till the prince of Bulgaria, touched with compassion, furnished them with guides, who conducted them to Constantinople, the place of their general rendezvous, where they waited the arrival of Peter, who did not join them till the first of August, being strangely harassed on his march by the Hungarians, who slew above two thousand of his men, took all their baggage and two thousand wagons, with the money designed to pay the army. To those hostilities Peter himself gave occasion, by suffering his men to commit all sorts of disorders, under pretence of revenging the cruel treatment, which the army under Gautier had met with from the natives. Peter, having with much ado reached Constantinople with the remains of his shattered army, was there received, in appearance, with great marks of friendship and kindness by the emperor Alexius, who nevertheless was in his heart greatly alarmed at the expedition; for though he believed the common people might act upon principles of religion, yet he could not persuade himself, that princes would leave their dominions, and engage in so hazardous an undertaking upon the same motives. However, he supplied Peter’s army with all manner of provisions; who thereupon passed the straits, and marching into Bithynia, encamped not far from the city of Nice. Not long after his departure, the emperor received advice of Godfrey’s arrival at Philippopolis, with ten thousand horse and seventy thousand foot; which gave him no small jealousy, the more, as Godfrey immediately dispatched to him an officer, to demand the liberty of Hugh, brother to the king of France, who, in his passage from Bari to Dyrrhachium, being separated by a storm from the rest of the fleet, had been seized by the governor of the above-mentioned city and sent to Constantinople, where he was detained prisoner. As the emperor refused, under various pretences, to set his prisoner at liberty, Godfrey, who was already already advanced as far as Adrianople, began to act against him as an open enemy, laying waste the country, and marching directly to Constantinople. Hereupon Alexius, not finding himself in a condition to oppose so powerful an enemy, complied at length with his demand, promising at the same time to supply his army with provisions; which, however, he neglected to do, and by that neglect provoked Godfrey to such a degree, that he laid waste the whole neighbouring country to the very gates of Constantinople. Alexius, dreading he might fall upon the imperial city itself, sent ambassadors to treat of an accommodation, offering his own son as an hostage, and promising the provoked prince all possible satisfaction. Godfrey having received the ambassadors in a most obliging manner, and put a stop to all hostilities, the emperor invited him and the other princes and chief officers of his army into the city, where they were received with great magnificence, and entertained in a friendly manner. After several conferences and warm disputes, the following agreement was at length concluded between them and Alexius; that, during the expedition, the emperor should assist them with with all his forces, supply them with arms, provisions, and other necessaries, and treat them on all occasions as his friends and allies. On the other hand, the princes were to restore to the empire such provinces and cities as they should recover out of the hands of the Turks and Saracens. Soon after, the other princes arrived by different ways at the head of powerful armies, and were all received by the emperor with the greatest marks of esteem and affection. After a short stay at Constantinople, the forces passed the Bosphorus, and encamped near Chalcedon, with a design to advance from thence to Nice, and lay siege to that important city.

While Godfrey and the other princes were yet on their march, the army commanded by Peter the hermit, which had entered Bithynia, as we have observed above, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Nice, began to mutiny; and, deposing Gautier, advanced Raymond, a German commander of great prowess, in his room. After this, the Germans and Italians, separating from the French, encamped apart. A strong party of the Italians, having made themselves masters of a town called Xerigordus, were there surprised by the Turks and put to the sword. The French, who lay encamped near Helenopolis and Cibolus, two villages on the gulf of Nicomedia, were, by the Turkish commander in those parts, drawn into an ambuscade, and mostly either cut.

cut off, or taken prisoners; so that of the forty thousand men commanded by Peter, scarce three thousand were left, who with him took refuge in Cinite; which place they defended till the arrival of Godfrey and the other princes of the crusade, with whom they marched to Nice; which city was invested by the christian princes in the month of May 1097. As the place had been strongly fortified by Solyman, then sultan of the Turks, who had chosen it for the seat of his empire, and was defended by a numerous garrison, the siege lasted several weeks; during which time, both the christians and Turks gave many signal instances of their intrepidity and resolution. Solyman, who hadposted himself with a numerous army among the neighbouring mountains, attempted twice to raise the siege; but was as often repulsed with much slaughter. However, the besieged continued to defend the place with great courage and resolution, till the emperor Alexius, who assisted in person at the enterprize, having caused a great number of small vessels to be fitted out, cut off the communication, which, by means of the lake Ascanius, the city maintained with the neighbouring country. The garrison being thus deprived of the constant supplies they received both of men and provisions, and at the same time privately solicited by the emperor with mighty promises to surrender the place, not to the western princes, but to him, they submitted at length, and, on the fifth of July, delivered up the city to his lieutenant, by name Butumites. Among the many captives taken on this occasion, were Solyman's wife and two of his children, who were immediately sent to Constantinople. After the reduction of Nice, the princes, taking their leave of the emperor, of whom they now entertained great distrust, bent their march towards Syria, having first divided the army into two bodies, for the convenience of forage and subsistence. Bohemond, who marched the first, was suddenly attacked by Solyman, at the head of sixty thousand Turks, and would in all likelihood have been put to flight, had not Hugh come scathingly to his relief with thirty thousand men; who falling upon the enemy, cut forty thousand of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to take shelter among the neighbouring mountains. This victory was attended with the surrender of Antioch in Pisidia, of Iconium in Cilicia, Heraclea, and several other places. The christian princes, animated with this success, bound themselves by an oath not to return, till they had rescued the holy city of Jerusalem out of the hands of the infidels. Accordingly, having passed mount Taurus, they made themselves masters of

of the cities of Maresia and Arta sia; and marching from the latter, but fifteen miles distant from Antioch, they encamped before that famous metropolis on the twenty-first of October 1097. As the place was strongly fortified, and garrisoned with seven thousand horse and twenty thousand foot, the siege lasted to the third of June, when one Pyrrhus, who had in appearance embraced the Mohammedan superstition to save his estate, and was entrusted with the defence of a tower called the Two sifters, betrayed the city to Bohemond, whose men entering it in the night, opened the gates to the rest of the army; who falling upon the Turks before they could put themselves in a posture of defence, cut them off almost to a man. Cassianus the governor, with some others, found means to make his escape out of the place; but fell soon after into the hands of the Armenian christians, by whom he was slain. While the christians were engaged in the siege of Antioch, Corbenus, one of the sultan of Persia's generals, attacked Edessa with a mighty army; but Baldwin, to whom the place had submitted some months before, gave him such a warm reception, that he abandoned the enterprize, and marched to the relief of Antioch. Being informed on his march that the city was taken, he resolved nevertheless to venture a battle, in hopes of recovering it; but received a total overthrow, having lost, as we are told, an hundred thousand, partly killed, and partly taken prisoners; whereas of the christians only four thousand two hundred were slain. This memorable battle was fought on the twenty-seventh of June 1098, and the next day the Turks, who still kept the castle of Antioch, despairing of relief, submitted and were made prisoners. The christians, thus become masters of Antioch, chose with one consent Bohemond prince of that metropolis, not thinking themselves bound by the late treaty, since Alexius had, contrary to that agreement, under various pretences, declined lending them the least assistance. However, they sent Hugh, brother to Philip king of France and Baldwin earl of Heynault, to give the emperor an account of their success, and press him to join them with all his forces, pursuant to the treaty; but the earl of Heynault was never afterwards seen or heard of, whence he was generally believed to have been taken prisoner and murdered by the emperor's orders. As for the other, he got safe to Constantinople; but, instead of returning to the princes with an account of his embassy, he departed from thence into France; whence some writers speak of of him much to his disadvantage, as if he had been bribed by the emperor to abandon the enterprize. The emperor had indeed at this time a just excuse for not joining the western princes; for Targripermes, a Turkish pirate, having seized on the cities of Smyrna and Ephesus, and reduced the islands of Rhodes and Chios, infested the coasts of the empire, committing everywhere dreadful ravages. Against him the emperor sent a considerable fleet and army; which arriving safe at Smyrna, besieged that city by sea and land, and having in the end reduced it, marched to Ephesus, which was likewise forced to submit, Targripermes having been defeated with great slaughter in that neighbourhood. The victory gained by the emperor’s forces was followed by the surrender of Philadelphia, Laodicea, and other maritime cities of great importance. Alexius, elated with this success, laid claim to Antioch, and sent embassadors to Bohemond, requiring him to deliver up that city to its lawful owner. Bohemond was so offended at this demand, that, instead of complying with it, he, in his turn, claimed, as prince of Antioch, the city of Laodicea, and dispatched a considerable body of forces, under the conduct of his nephew Tancred, to take it by force; which they did accordingly, reducing at the same time several other strong-holds in Cilicia, belonging to the emperor. Hereupon Alexius, having caused a mighty fleet to be equipped with all possible expedition, resolved to stop the passage of the supplies, which the western princes, especially the bishop of Pisa, were preparing for the support of the christians in the east, till such time as they had restored to the empire the cities they had taken from the Turks. Of this fleet Tatius was appointed admiral, who, meeting that of the western princes near Rhodes, attacked them, and gave them a total overthrow; but was himself overtaken, in his return to Constantinople, by a violent storm, which destroyed the greater part of his fleet. After this, the emperor ordered Catalczenus, one of his generals, to lay siege to Laodicea; which, notwithstanding the supplies Bohemond with much difficulty threw into it, was in the end obliged to submit. Hereupon the prince of Antioch, finding he had not sufficient strength at present to contend with the emperor, either by sea or land, left a strong garrison in Antioch, and passed undiscovered into Italy, with a design to levy new forces there and return early in the spring into the east. Alexius, acquainted with his design, ordered his admiral, by name Contostephanus, to cruise on the coast of Italy, and prevent, by all means, Bohemond’s fleet from passing into the east; but Constantinus, departing from his instructions, made a descent, and laid siege to Brundusium; which, however, he was obliged to raise, his men being with great slaughter put to flight by the inhabitants. Among the prisoners taken on this occasion were five Scythians, whom Bohemond carried to the pope, telling him, that, with the assistance of such infidels and barbarians, Alexius endeavoured to stop the progress of the Christian princes in the east; which inflamed both the pope and the people against him to such a degree, that multitudes crowded daily to Bohemond, desiring to be employed against a prince, whom they looked upon as an avowed enemy to the Christian name. Bohemond, having by this means soon raised a powerful army, passed over into Illyricum; and landing without opposition in the neighbourhood of Dyrrachium, sat down before that important place, after having caused his fleet to be burnt in the flight of the whole army, that, seeing there was no means of making their escape, they might fight the more courageously, and place their safety in victory alone. As the place was defended by a numerous garrison and supplied with great plenty of provisions, it made a vigorous defence, and held out, till Bohemond's army being reduced to the utmost extremity for want of necessaries, that haughty prince began to give ear to the proposals that were made him for putting an end to the war. After several conferences between him and the emperor's ministers, a peace was in the end concluded, upon terms equally honourable to both princes. The war being thus ended, Bohemond returned to Italy, according to Anna Commena; but according to others, to Antioch, where, we are told, he died six months after. Alexius, being disengaged from this war, marched in person against the Turks, who, renewing their incursions, had laid the country waste to the very walls of Nice; and coming up with them in the neighbourhood of that city, gave them a total overthrow. However, the Turks returned the following year; but were, in several successive battles, overcome and put to flight by the emperor's lieutenants, Alexius himself being prevented, by the gout and other distempers, that usually attend old age, from heading his army in person. The Turks, disheartened with the great losses they had sustained, sent to sue for peace; which was readily granted them by the emperor, who thenceforth never appeared more in the field, but spent the remaining part of his life in thriving striving to heal the divisions, which at that time rent the Greek church. Being seized with a violent cold, he died in the year 1118, the thirty-seventh of his reign, and twenty-second after the expedition of the western princes for the recovery of the holy land. There is a great disagreement among authors touching the character of this prince, the Greek historians, especially his daughter Anna Comnena, painting him as the best of princes, and those who have written the history of the holy war, representing him as the worst. However, it is agreed on all hands, that he was a man of great address and penetration, endowed with uncommon parts, and the best statesman of his time. He was grateful, generous, and liberal, as appears from his behaviour to his brother and the rest of his friends, who had been instrumental in his advancement to the throne; for on them he heaped such wealth, as quite drained the exchequer; whence, to carry on the war with the Turks, he was forced to seize on the riches of the churches and monasteries; which has prompted some ecclesiastic writers to paint him in the blackest colours. He seems to have been a stranger to all manner of cruelty; for though many conspiracies were formed against him during the long course of his reign, yet we read of no other punishment inflicted even on the chief authors of them, besides banishment, or the confiscation of their estates. His behaviour to the western princes, though altogether unbecoming one who professed the same religion, may in some degree be excused, in regard of the jealousy he entertained of them, especially of Bohemond, his old enemy, which prompted him rather to oppose and weaken, than assist, them in an undertaking, which, he apprehended, might at last end in his own ruin, as well as in that of the common enemy. During his sickness, he was earnestly solicited, by the empress and his daughter Ann, to exclude his own son John from the succession, and bequeath the empire to Bryennius, the husband of Ann; but the emperor, deaf to their solicitations, declared John his successor, who was thereupon saluted emperor by the people, as soon as the death of Alexius was known, and a few days after, crowned in the great church by the patriarch. He had scarce taken possession of the imperial throne, when some of his nearest relations, at the instigation of Ann, conspired against him, with a design to depose him, and place Bryennius in his room; but, the conspiracy being feasonably discovered, the conspirators were immediately put to death.

immediately seized, tried, and convicted. However, the good natured emperor did not suffer them to be otherwise punished, than by confiscating their estates, which he soon after restored to them, receiving anew into favour all those, who, with his sister Ann, had given life to the conspiracy.
After this, he removed from court such as he had reason to suspect, appointing none to succeed them but persons of known probity and distinguished characters. In the second year of his reign, the Turks, in defiance of the treaty lately concluded with his father, broke into Phrygia; but the emperor, marching against them in person, overthrew them in several engagements; and having recovered such cities as they had taken in Cilicia, and among the rest Laodicea, he laid siege to Sozopolis, a strong town in Pamphylia, which he took by a stratagem, having enticed the Turks out by a pretended flight, and cut off their retreat into the city. The Turks, alarmed at the success that attended his arms, renewed the peace, which they had concluded with his father Alexius. Hereupon the emperor returned in triumph to Constantinople, where he had not been long, when news was brought him, that the Scythians, having passed the Daube and broken into Thrace, were destroying all before them with fire and sword. Against them the emperor led the flower of his army, and falling upon the barbarians before they could put themselves in a posture of defence, cut incredible numbers of them in pieces, took many prisoners, and obliged the rest to save themselves beyond the Danube.
He then turned his victorious arms, first against the Servii, whom he easily overcame, and afterwards against the Hunns, who had invaded the empire, but were driven beyond the Danube with great slaughter. The emperor, crossing that river after them, carried the war into their country; and having taken several of their strong-holds, and forced them to conclude a peace upon his own terms, he returned the second time in triumph to Constantinople. While the emperor was thus employed against the barbarians, the Turks, without any regard to the late treaty, entered unexpectedly Galatia and Cilicia, and made themselves masters of several cities in those two provinces. The emperor therefore, having allowed his men a few days to refresh themselves at Constantinople, led them afterwards into the east, where he soon the Turks before him. The castle of Baca, and the cities of Caftamon, Anazarba, Serep, Capharda, Iftria, and Sezer, made a vigorous resistance; but were in the end obliged to submit. However, having laid siege to Berœa in Syria, he was forced by the numerous garrison to raise it, and drop that enterprise. On his return homewards, he was reconciled to his brother Isaac, who, in the beginning of his reign, having taken some disgust, had fled to the Turks, and affixed them with his advice in all their undertakings against the Christians. Soon after, John, Isaac’s son, defected to the enemy, and, renouncing the Christian religion, embraced the superstition of Mohammed. The emperor, having spent three years in the east, and recovered from the Turks the several cities and strong holds which they had lately taken, returned to Constantinople, where he was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable. Having settled his domestic affairs, he resolved to return once more into the east; and accordingly began his march early in the spring of the year 1140, attended by his three sons, Alexius, Andronicus, and Manuel, giving out, that he had nothing else in view but to secure his conquests in Armenia, and confirm the cities, that had lately submitted to him, in their obedience; but his real design was to recover, if possible, the city of Antioch, held by the Latins, and reunite that lately metropolis to the empire. Heaven seemed to be offended at this undertaking; for soon after he had left Constantinople, his two eldest sons, Alexius and Andronicus, died in the prime of their years, to the unexpressible grief of the afflicted father, who was ready to sink under the weight of so unexpected a calamity. However, he pursued his march, and entering Syria, acquainted the inhabitants of Antioch with his arrival; who thereupon sent some of the chief men in the city to meet him. But when he drew near, they refused to admit him within the gates, till he had solemnly sworn he would attempt no innovation, but quietly depart, after a short stay in the city. He had entertained hopes of gaining over the citizens, and by that means making himself master of the city; but finding them inviolably attached to the Latins, he retired in a great rage, ordering his soldiers, at their departure, to plunder the suburbs. From Antioch he bent his march to Cilicia, where, while he was one day hunting, he was accidentally wounded in the hand with a poisoned arrow, which he carried in his quiver. Though the wound was slight, yet, as the proper remedies were not applied in due time, it caused such a swelling in his his arm, that the physicians were for cutting it off; but he peremptorily refusing to submit to the operation, the strength of the poison prevailed to such a degree, that he was in a short time brought to the point of death; when, summoning the chief of the nobility to his chamber, he named in their presence his youngest son Manuel to succeed him, as better qualified in every respect for that eminent station, than his other son Isaac. Hereupon Manuel was immediately proclaimed and acknowledged emperor by the nobility and the chief officers of the army, who bound themselves by a solemn oath to obey no other. The emperor died soon after, on the eighth of April 1143, having reigned twenty-four years and eight months. It is observable of him, that he put none to death during the whole time of his reign; whence he was no less beloved by his subjects for his humanity and good nature, than feared by the enemies of the empire, on account of his courage, experience in war, and the success that attended him in all his expeditions.

The emperor no sooner expired, than Manuel dispatched Alexius, who had been prime minister to his father, to Constantinople, with orders to secure Isaac; who was accordingly seized, before he had time to assert his right to the empire, and confined to a monastery. Soon after, the new emperor arrived; and being received with loud acclamations by the people, who hated Isaac; he was crowned with great solemnity by the patriarch. Having settled his domestic affairs, and set his brother Isaac at liberty, upon his promising to attempt no innovations during his absence, he passed over into Asia, at the head of a mighty army; and having recovered several cities in Phrygia, lately taken by the Turks, he sat down before Iconium; but not being able to matter that important place, he returned to Constantinople, leaving sufficient garrisons in the frontier-towns to restrain the incursions of the Turks. During his stay in the imperial city, he married Gertrude, sister-in-law to Conrade, the German emperor; but slighting her, though endowed with every perfection becoming a person of her sex and quality, he maintained a criminal conversation with his own niece Theodora; which greatly estranged from him the minds of his people. But nothing has rendered his name more odious to posterity, than his treacherous behaviour to the western princes; for having promised to supply the army of Conrade, who in the year 8 Nicet. c. 7—12.
year 1146, undertook an expedition into the holy land, with forage and provisions, instead of that, he caused the countries, through which they were to pass, to be laid waste, and the gates of the towns to be shut; nay, we are told, that the Greeks, inspired by the emperor with an irreconcilable hatred to those adventurers, mixed the flour they sold them with quick-lime; which occasioned a dreadful mortality in the christian army. Besides, the emperor privately acquainted Mamut, sultan of Iconium in Asia Minor, with the designs of Conrade and the other princes. Whereupon the sultan alarming all the princes of his nation, a formidable army was raised in defence of their common interest, and sent to protect their territories, before the christian princes were in a condition to attack them. By this means the designs of the western princes were defeated, and an army, which otherwise might have easily triumphed over all the east, in a great measure destroyed. Roger, king of Sicily, highly provoked at Manuel's treachery, took advantage of some disturbances raised by the inhabitants of Corcyra, who thought themselves oppressed by too heavy exactions, and made himself master of that island. From thence he sailed to Corinth, which he likewise took and plundered, with Thebes, and most of the principal cities in Boeotia. Hereupon Manuel, having assembled all the forces of the empire and equipped a mighty fleet, proclaimed war against Roger and the Sicilians; which he began with the siege of Corcyra, now Corfu. The besieged defended the place with incredible bravery; but being in the end quite tired out with repeated attacks, they surrendered upon honourable terms. In this siege the emperor, who commanded his troops in person, lost an incredible number of men, and among the rest Stephen, one of his chief officers. However, elated with his success, he resolved to carry the war into Sicily itself; but was overtaken by a violent storm, in which several of his ships were lost, and he himself driven, with most of the transports, to Aulon. Being informed, during his stay there, that the Servians had broken into the neighbouring provinces, he marched against them in person, committing the management of the Sicilian war to Michael Palæologus. Manuel gained great advantages over the Servians, though assisted by the Hungarians, whom he likewise overcame in several battles; and carrying the war into their country, took and razed some of their chief towns, and then returned to Constantinople, loaded with with booty. As for Palæologus, he marched into Calabria, where he frequently defeated Roger's forces, and continued laying waste the country, till, by the mediation of the pope, a peace was concluded between the two princes. The emperor, now disengaged from this war, took a progress into the east, being every-where received in a friendly manner, and entertained with shews and festivals, by the western princes, notwithstanding his unaccountable and treacherous behaviour towards them. On his return, he was attacked unexpectedly by the Turks, who killed several of his men, and took part of his baggage. To revenge this outrage, the emperor, after a short stay at Constantinople, passed over into Asia, at the head of a very numerous and powerful army; which struck the sultan with such terror, that he sent embassadors to sue for peace, offering to conclude it upon such terms, as the emperor himself should judge proper. But Manuel adhering to the young and unexperienced officers, who, pushed on with a false courage, declared with great warmth for war, the offers of the sultan were rejected, and his embassadors dismissed with this haughty answer, That the emperor would come and let him know his pleasure at Iconium, which was the metropolis of the Turkish empire in Asia Minor. Hereupon the sultan, finding a war unavoidable, fixed on the narrow passes of Zibrica, through which the emperor's army was to pass, and falling upon them, as soon as they entered the straits, made a dreadful havock of them with showers of arrows from the mountains and broken cliffs. The Romans attempted to retire; but their retreat being cut off by a strong detachment of Turks, posted at the entrance of the straits, they were forced to pursue their march, being galled the whole time by the enemy's arrows showering down upon them from the eminences. In the mean time, night coming on, the Turks, who were well acquainted with the country, posted themselves of all the outlets; so that the Romans found themselves, when light appeared, hemmed in on every side, without being able either to retire or advance. In this condition, while they looked upon themselves as lost, the sultan, to the great surprise of the emperor and the whole army, sent to Manuel one of his chief officers, by name Gabras, with proposals for a peace; which he immediately signed, to the inexplicable joy of the whole army, who pursued their march unmolested to Chonas, where the emperor distributed what money he had with him among the soldiers, and then proceeded to Phila-Philadelphia, in which city he continued, till his wounds were cured. One of the conditions of the peace was, that the fortifications of Dorylæum and Subleum in Asia Minor should be razed. This the emperor, now out of danger, refused to perform, alledging, that what had been extorted from him by force was not binding. The sultan, highly provoked at this answer, sent a body of twenty four thousand chosen men, under the conduct of Atapacus, to lay waste all Phrygia; which they did with the utmost barbarity, sparing neither sex nor age. But the emperor’s forces, falling upon them as they were crossing the Maeander on their way home, cut them all off to a man, and recovered the whole booty. The Turks were so disheartened with this overthrow, that they continued quiet the remaining part of Manuel’s reign, who, having no wars to employ his thoughts, turned them to religious matters, and, by endeavouring to introduce and establish heterodox opinions, raised great disturbances and divisions in the church, some of the prelates being prompted by their interest to embrace and maintain the doctrine he had broached, and others impugning it with great warmth. Among the latter was Eustathius archbishop of Thessalonica, famous for his learned comments on Homer. But the death of the emperor put an end to these disputes. He was taken ill in March 1180, and died in the following September, having near completed the thirty-eighth year of his reign. Some time before his death, he took the monastic habit, hoping thereby to atone for the debaucheries, to which he abandoned himself in times of peace.

He was succeeded by his son Alexius Comnenus; but, being only twelve years old, his mother took upon her the administration, and governing with an absolute sway, suffered the young prince to indulge himself in his pleasures and diversions, in order to indolise him for applying to the affairs of state. The ministers, whom the empress employed, made it their chief study to enrich themselves at the expense of the public, the empress herself having nothing else in view but to fill her coffers. Public affairs being thus entirely neglected, while every one studied his private interest, the Turks, who let slip no opportunity of enlarging their territories, breaking into the empire, made themselves masters of Sozopolis, and several other important places in Phrygia. This raised in the people a general dislike to the present administration; which being observed by Andronicus, who was cousin-german to the late emperor, and had long aspired at the empire, he thought this the most proper time to attempt the obtaining of what he so ardently wished for. Accordingly, as he was generally beloved on account of his infatuating and popular behaviour, he left Oeneum, to which place he had been confined by the late emperor; and moving with his friends and dependents towards Constantinople, gave out, that he had nothing else in view but to reform the abuses of the state, to assert the imperial dignity, to redress the grievances of the people, and rescue the young prince out of the hands of those who, in a most shameful manner, abused his authority, to the opprobrium of those whom they were bound to protect. He was everywhere received by the credulous people as their deliverer and defender; and such multitudes flocked to him from all parts, that none dared to oppose him, till he came into Bithynia, where the governors of Nice and Nicomedia shut their gates against him, as a public enemy. However, he pursued his march to a castle called Charace, where he was met by a body of the imperial troops commanded by Andronicus Angelus, whom he put to flight; and, advancing with long marches towards Constantinople, encamped at a small distance from Chalcedon, in sight of the imperial city. The empress had committed the whole management of affairs to Alexius, then president of the council, with whom she was thought to be more familiar than was consistent with her honour. As Alexius hoped by her means to be advanced one day to the imperial dignity, he left nothing unattempted to defeat the designs of Andronicus; but being universally detested by the people, on account of his tyrannical and arbitrary government, the troops he had raised fled over to Andronicus, and the fleet, which was committed to the conduct of Contostephanus, followed their example. Hereupon the people, assembling in a tumultuous manner, with repeated acclamations declared Andronicus guardian of the young prince, set at liberty his two sons, John and Manuel, whom Alexius had thrown into prison, and seizing on Alexius himself, carried him in a mock triumph to the sea-side, attended with the scuffles and curfews of the enraged multitude, and thence conveyed him in a small boat to Andronicus, who, after having exposed him to the insults of the whole army, caused his eyes to be pulled out. Soon after, Andronicus, passing the strait, went to wait on the emperor, who was then, with the empress his mother, at a royal seat in the country; and being immediately admitted to his presence, fell on the ground, out of a pretended respect to his prince, repeating several several texts of scripture, adapted to the present purpose. As for the empress, he saluted her with a coldness, which sufficiently betrayed the aversion he bore her. Having stayed some days with the emperor, he made his entry into the city, attended with the shout and acclamations of the people, and was by all, with one voice, declared and acknowledged the protector of the empire, during the minority of young Alexius. But, notwithstanding the tyrannical conduct of Alexius the president, the citizens of Constantinople had soon occasion to repent of the change, there being no kind of cruelty, which the protector did not practice upon the unhappy people, without distinction of sex or condition. Some were deprived of their sight, others banished, and many inhumanly murdered, either out of some private grudge, or because they seemed attached to the young prince. Among the rest Mary, daughter to the late emperor, who had been very instrumental in the late revolution, and her husband Manuel, Andronicus's own son, were poisoned by the tyrant's orders. As for the empress, he caused her to be accused of treason, as if she had by letters invited Bela, king of the Hungarians, her brother-in-law, to invade the empire. Upon this charge, altogether groundless, she was tried, found guilty, no one daring to oppose the tyrant's pleasure, and shortly after strangled by Pterigionites the eunuch. Soon after her death the tyrant, pretending a great tenderness and unshaken fidelity for the young prince, caused him to be solemnly crowned by the patriarch; but took care at the same time to enlarge in an eloquent speech on the dangers that threatened the empire, and required, he said, a person of wisdom and experience to avert them. He had no sooner done speaking, than his friends crying out aloud, as had been agreed on beforehand, "Long live Alexius and Andronicus Roman emperors," the whole multitude saluted him with the title of emperor, and placed him, with the consent and approbation of Alexius, on the imperial throne, the tyrant affecting the whole time an utter aversion to what he had so long coveted; nay, upon receiving, as was customary, the holy eucharist at his coronation, lifting his eyes up to heaven, he solemnly swore by that venerable mystery, that he took upon him the sovereignty for no other end, but to protect the young emperor and support his authority; but notwithstanding his oath, as he had now both the emperor and the empire in his power, he resolved a few days after to dispatch his collegue, and take the whole authority into his own hands. Pursuantly to this wicked resolution, one Stephanus Hagiochristophorites, 493 tes, with some others, entering, by the tyrant’s orders, the unhappy prince’s chamber in the night, strangled him with a bow-string. Such was the miserable end of Alexius II. in the third year of his reign and fifteenth of his life. Andronicus, now sole master of the empire, made it his chief study to establish the power he had usurped, raging without distinction against persons of all ranks, whom he imagined in the least affected to Manuel’s family, or capable of revenging his death. No day passed without some cruel execution; insomuch, that in a short time the flower of the nobility was utterly cut off, the merciless tyrant complaining all the while of the severity of the law, which did not allow him to shew pity to so many deserving men. Some, however, found means to make their escape, and among the rest Isaac Comnenus, Manuel’s near kinsman; who, taking refuge in Cyprus, made himself master of that island, and is said to have exceeded even Andronicus himself in all manner of barbarities. Alexius Comnenus, brother to the late emperor Manuel, fled to Sicily; and having persuaded William, king of that island, to make war upon Andronicus, he attended him to Dyrrhachium, which city the king soon reduced; and marching from thence into Macedon, laid waste that province without opposition, and sat down before Thesalonica, where his fleet had been ordered to attend him.

The city was taken by storm, after a few days siege, through the indolence and cowardice of the governor, and with the utmost cruelty plundered by the Sicilians, who, without di-! ninction of sex or age, put all they met to the sword, not sparing even those who had taken refuge in the churches. An-dronicus, having assembled his troops, ordered them to march under the conduct of the best generals in whom he could confi d e against the enemy. But they were defeated and put to flight at the first onset; which inspired the Sicilians with such courage, that they began to look upon themselves as already masters of the imperial city itself. In the mean time, the tyrant, finding the number of the malecontents increased at home, in proportion to the success of the enemy abroad, began to rage with more cruelty than ever, not sparing even his own favourites, who had been hitherto the executioners of his tyranny against others. Among the many who were defined to slaughter was Isaac Angelus, a person of great di-! ninction, being descended from one of the most ancient famlies in Constantinople. Hagiochristophorites, Andronicus’s prime minister, was ordered to seize him; but Isaac, having killed the assassin with his own hand, made his escape to a neighbouring church, whither he was followed by his uncle John Ducas, by his son Isaac, and by several other persons of the first quality. As Isaac was generally beloved, on account of his popularity and engaging behaviour, multitudes of people flocked from all parts of the city to see him in his asylum. As Andronicus was then absent from the city, Isaac laid hold of that opportunity to stir up the populace against him; which he did so effectually, that, on a day appointed, they flocked in crowds to the church of St. Sophia, and there, with one voice, saluted Isaac emperor, declaring at the same time Andronicus a public enemy. The tyrant, informed of what had happened in the city, and despairing of being able to appease the enraged multitude or make head against them, flled to Melodium, a royal palace on the east side of the Propontis, and from thence attempted to escape into Scythia; but being several times driven back by contrary winds, and pursued, as it were, by divine vengeance, he was in the end apprehended and presented in chains to Isaac; who, having casuied his right-hand to be cut off and one of his eyes to be pulled out, delivered him up to the enraged populace, from whom he suffered indignities answerable to the injuries with which he had provoked them; for having led him, as it were, in triumph, through the most frequented streets of the city on a camel, with his face towards the tail, amidst the reproaches and insults of the incensed multitude, they hung him up by the feet between two pillars, stripped off his clothes, cut off his private parts, and tormented him for three days together; he bearing the whole time with an invincible courage all the torments, the incensed and relentless mob could inflict upon him, sometimes repeating, Lord, have mercy upon me, and sometimes addressing the multitude with these words, Why do you break a bruised reed? At length one, touched with compassion at the sight of an object, which might have drawn tears from cruelty itself, by a mortal wound in his throat, put an end at the same time to his life and torments, after he had lived seventy-three years and reigned two a. He was the last emperor of the Comnenian family.

Isaac, thus raised to the imperial dignity, gained, in the Isac Angesel beginning of his reign, the affections of his subjects, by his lenity and moderation, not only recalling and restoring to their states such as had been banished by Andronicus, but relieving several decayed families out of his private estate. When he though himself sufficiently established on the throne, he dischpatched the flower of the army, under the conduct of Branas, an of-cer of great experience, against the Sicilians; who, being surprized by him as they were roving about the country in quest of plunder, were put to flight, and cut off almost to a man, either by the emperor’s troops, or the natives, whom they had provoked with their barbarities. Their fleet, consisting of two hundred sail, on their return home, being overtaken and dispersed by a violent storm, most of their ships were taken by the emperor’s admiral, and great numbbers of prisoners sent to Constantinople, where most of them perished with famine, the emperor, who was naturally addicted to cruelty, not suffering them to be relieved even with bread and water. Having thus put an end to the Sicilian war, he resolved to drive, if possible, Isaac Comnenus, of whom we have spoken above, out of Cyprus, where he oppressed the inhabitants in a most tyrannical manner. In order to this, he equipped a mighty fleet, which he sent under the command of John Contostephanus and Alexius Comnenus, to make a descent upon that island; which they did accordingly, landing without the least opposition. But while the forces were afoot, Margarites, a famous pirate, who had joined Isaac Comnenus, falling upon the fleet, seized or burnt all the ships, while the tyrant, attacking the forces that were landed and could not retreat, cut them off all to a man. This misfortune encouraged the Macedions, whom the emperor opprefled with heavy taxes, to revolt, and return to the protection of the Scythians; who, having raised a numerous army, over-ran the neighbouring provinces. Against them the emperor dispatched his uncle John Ducas, who gained several advantages over the enemy, and would in all likely-hood have put an end to the war, had he not been recalled by the jealous emperor. John, surnamed Cantacuzenus, being appointed to succeed him, was, through his rashnes and indiscretion, often worsted by the enemy. Wherupon Branas Alexius, the greatest commander of his age, was entrusted with the whole management of the war. Branas, feeling himself at the head of a powerful and well disciplined army, after having gained some advantages over the enemy; returned on a sudden to Adrianople, the place of his nativity; and having caused himself to be proclaimed emperor there, led his troops without loss of time to the imperial city, hop-gence of his revolt; but the citizens putting themselves, upon his approach, in a posture of defence, and haraсking his troops with frequent sallies, he resolved to encamp at some distance from the city, and, by cutting off all communication with the neighbouring country, to reduce it by famine. The emperor, in the mean time, reposing all his confidence in the virgin Mary, (whose image he caused to be placed on the walls) and in the prayers of the monks, continued inactive in his palace, till he was routed by Conrade, son to the marquis of Montferrat, who, happening to be then at Constantinople, encouraged him to draw together his troops, and march out against the enemy; which he did accordingly, being attended by Conrade, who commanded the main body of the imperial army. Branas received him with his men in battle-array; whereupon an engagement ensuing, the dispute was maintained for a considerable time on both sides with great obstinacy; but in the end the emperor’s forces, though a handful in comparison of the enemy’s, prevailing, Branas himself was killed on the spot, and most of his chief officers either slain in the pursuit or taken prisoners. This victory was chiefly owing to the bravery and conduct of Conrade, by whose hand Branas fell, while he was encouraging his men to return to the charge. The rebellion being thus happily quelled, the jealous emperor resolved to employ the whole strength of the empire against the celebrated emperor of Germany, Frederic Barbarossa, who was marching, at the head of a mighty army, to the assistance of the princes of the crusade. He had promised to grant Frederic a free passage through his dominions, and supply his army with all manner of provisions; but being in the mean time gained over by Saladin, the Turkish sultan, who promised to restore Palestine to him, instead of assisting the German army, pursuant to his engagement, he no sooner heard of their arrival on the borders, than he dispatched his cousin Manuel, with a powerful army, to obstruct their passage and intercept their provisions, having first, without any regard to the law of nations, thrown into prison the bishop of Munster, the earl of Nassau, and count Walram, Frederic’s embassadors. The Germans, justly provoked at the emperor’s treachery and perfidiousness, passed, in spite of the opposition they met with from the cowardly Greeks, into Thrace, and there seized on the corn, of which they found great plenty in the fields, before the inhabitants had time to remove it into the fortified fortified towns, pursuant to the orders they had received from court. As they approached Philippopolis, the inhabitants abandoned the place; and Frederic, taking possession of it, halted there a few days to refresh his troops. In the mean time, the emperor, highly incensed against Manuel, whom he accused of cowardice, sent him peremptory orders to engage the Germans; pursuant to which, the Greek general advanced within six miles of Philippopolis. But his whole army being shamefully put to flight by a party of Germans, whom Frederic had sent out to scour the country and watch the enemy’s motions, the cities of Nicopolis and Adrianople, with all the places between the Ægean and Euxine seas, opened their gates to the victorious army, without attempting to make the least opposition. Hereupon the emperor, having set Frederic’s embassadors at liberty, began to sue for peace, offering to supply the Germans with provisions and the necessary ships to transport them into Asia, provided they delivered hostages to him for his security, and crossed the freights without delay. Frederic, now master of the whole country to the very gates of Constantinople, thought it became him to chastise the pride of the presumptuous, but cowardly, Greeks, and therefore returned the following answer to the emperor’s deputies: That he had conquered Thrace, and therefore would dispose of it at his pleasure; that he was determined to winter there, since the emperor had by his perfidiousness retarded his march, till it was too late in the year to pass the freights; that he was resolved to treat the emperor as an enemy, if he had not a sufficient number of ships ready against Easter to transport his troops; and since he could not depend upon his faith, he commanded him to send without delay twenty-four of the principal lords and officers of his court, with eight hundred persons of inferior quality, as hostages for the performance of what he required. To these shamefull conditions the emperor readily submitted, sending immediately the hostages with rich presents to Frederic, who, having wintered at Adrianople, removed early in the spring to Callipolis, where he found a great number of vessels ready to transport his army into Asia. In the year 1193, the eighth of Isaac’s reign, an impostor, pretending to be the son of the emperor Manuel, laid claim to the empire; and, being encouraged by the sultan of Iconium, raised in a short time an army of eight thousand men, made himself master of all the cities in the Meander.

der, in spite of the opposition he met with from Alexius, the emperor's brother, who was sent against him, and would in all likelihood have in the end driven the emperor from the throne, multitudes flocking to him from all parts, had not a priest put an end to his conquests, by stabbing him with his own sword, while he lay asleep, after having drunk to excess. The Scythians, encouraged by these domestic commotions, renewed their incursions, and, over-running the neighbouring provinces, destroyed all with fire and sword. Against them the emperor marched in person; but having passed the summer without daring to attack them, they fell upon him in his retreat, and cut the greatest part of his army in pieces, the emperor himself having with much ado made his escape. After this, the barbarians roved about the country without control, plundering the cities, and carrying the inhabitants into captivity. The emperor dispatched against them first Alexius Guido, and afterwards Batatzes Basilius; but both these generals being defeated, and the latter killed upon the spot with the flower of his army, the emperor, having raised new forces, resolved to march against them once more in person. Accordingly, he set out from Constantinople early in the spring, and arriving at Cypselia on the frontiers of the empire, he halted there, till the troops, that were marching from all parts, joined him. In the meantime, his brother Alexius Angelus, who had long aspired at the empire, observing the general discontent that reigned among the soldiery, resolved to lay hold of the present opportunity of attaining what he had so long wished for. Accordingly, having imparted his design to some of the chief officers of the army, and found them ready to espouse his interest and combine against Isaac, while the emperor was one day diverting himself with the chase, the conspirators, seizing Alexius, as had been agreed on before-hand, carried him to the imperial pavilion, and, with repeated acclamations, saluted him emperor, being therein followed by the whole army. Isaac, judging it impossible to reclaim the revolted army to their duty, fled with great precipitation to Macræ, where he was overtaken by those whom his brother had sent after him, and by his orders deprived of his sight and thrown into prison, after he had reigned nine years and eight months.

Alexius Angelus, thus raised to the throne, abandoned himself to the same vices, for which he pretended to have removed his brother, spending his time in riot and luxury.

ury, while the Scythians on one hand, and the Turks on the other, made themselves masters of several important places, and laid waste whole provinces. As he was an utter enemy to all application, he committed the whole management of affairs to his wife Euphrosyne and his favourites, who oppressed the people in a most tyrannical manner, selling the first employments of the state to the highest bidder, without any regard to their birth or abilities, and using all other means, how unjust soever and dishonourable, to fill their private coffers.

In the year 1202, Alexius, reflecting on the great kindness his brother had shewn him during his reign, and thinking himself now firmly established on the throne, ordered the unhappy Isaac to be set at liberty, and called his son Alexius, at that time about twelve years old, to the court, treating him as his own child. But Isaac, still mindful of the indignity that had been offered him, and the injustice done both to himself and his son, began to entertain thoughts of recovering his former dignity, and asserting his undoubted right to the imperial crown. With this view he maintained a private correspondence with the Latins, and by their means with his daughter Irene, wife to Philip emperor of Germany, earnestly pressing her to persuade the emperor to undertake the protection of her unfortunate father and brother. Irene giving them hopes of a speedy and powerful assistance, young Alexius made his escape from Constantinople; and embarking in a ship belonging to a merchant of Pisa, riding then at the mouth of the Hellespont, landed safe in Sicily, where he spent some days in private conferences with his father, who was then in that island, and from thence pursued his journey to Rome, to solicit the assistance of the pope, by whom he was kindly received and warmly recommended to Philip. That prince received young Alexius with the greatest demonstrations imaginable of kindness and esteem, and was sensibly touched, as he had an entire affection for Irene, with the misfortunes of her family; but being then engaged in a troublesome war with Otho, who disputed the empire with him, he could not espouse the young prince's cause. However, by means of his embassadors, he engaged the French and Venetians, who had then a powerful army in Dalmatia, ready to march against the Turks, to attempt the restoration of his brother-in-law, and employ their whole strength against the usurper. The treaty, after some warm disputes, was concluded; in virtue of which the French and Venetians were to establish Alexius on the imperial throne, and Alexius, upon his restoration, to pay two hundred thousand marks in silver towards towards the expences of the holy war, maintain ten thousand men one year to be employed in the conquest of Egypt, and, during his life, five hundred knights well armed for the defence of such places as they should conquer in the holy land. The treaty being ratified with mutual oaths, the army embarked and failed for Corfu, the place of the general rendezvous.
As they appeared before Dyrrhachium, the inhabitants were no sooner informed, that the young prince was on board the fleet, than they presented him with the keys of the place, and swore allegiance to him. Encouraged with this happy pre-sage, they pursued their course to the island of Corfu, and from thence, after a short stays, to the port of St. Stephen, on the Propontis, where they refreshed themselves, and then failed to Chalcedon, opposite to the imperial city, where they landed their troops. In the mean time, the emperor, having drawn together all his forces, encamped on the Bosporus, over against the confederates, who notwithstanding palsied the firetines, the emperor having but twenty galleys to oppose them, and landed in sight of the emperor's army, who, at their approach, retired in great disorder. The next day, the French made themselves masters of the castle of Galata, and the Venetians, being favoured by an easterly wind, sailed up to the chain that locked up the mouth of the harbour; and having cut it with sheers of steel, that opened and shut by means of an engine, they took or sunk all the Greek vessels in the haven. After this, the Venetians having battered the walls for ten days together by sea and the French by land, a general assault was given on the seventeenth of July. The Greeks made a more vigorous opposition than was expected; and being assisted both by the advantage of the place and their numbers, often repulsed the aggressors. But at length the celebrated Henry Dandalo, duke of Venice, though then above eighty years old, putting himself at the head of his countrymen, whom he encouraged more with his example than his words, broke in, maugre all opposition; and having seized on one of the towers, planted on the top of it the great standard of St. Mark. The emperor, finding part of the enemy's troops was got into the town, fell out with a design to charge them in the rear, and by that means oblige them to draw off their men from the attack; but being repulsed with great slaughter, and the brave Dandalo having by this time made himself master of twenty-five towers on the side of the haven, the cowardly prince, abandoning his people, went privately on board a small vessel, kept ready for that purpose, and escaped with his treasures and the imperial ornaments.
nments, to Zagora, a city of Thrace, at the foot of mount Hæmus. It was no sooner known, that the tyrant had fled, than the people, crowding to the prison, where Isaac had been detained ever since the flight of his son Alexius, saluted him anew with the title of emperor, placed him upon the imperial throne, from which he had been driven about eight years before; and acquainting the confederates with the flight of the usurper, and the re-establishing of Isaac, invited the young prince to share the empire with his father. The confederates were transported with joy at the news of so sudden and unexpected a revolution; however, as they had been but too often deceived by the Greeks, they refused to acknowledge Isaac, till he had ratified the treaty concluded with his son; which he had no sooner done, though not without some reluctance, the articles appearing to him very hard, than the confederates owned him for emperor, and conducted the young prince in great triumph into the city, where he was affiliated with his father in the empire, and crowned with extraordinary pomp and solemnity on the first of August 1203.

As the usurper continued still in Thrace, supported there by a strong party; and Theodorus Lascaris, his son-in-law, was at the head of a numerous body of troops on the other side of the Bosphorus, the two emperors earneffly entreated the confederates to put off their expedition to the holy land, till they had completed the work, which they had so happily begun. To this they readily agreed; and marching against the tyrant, who had seized on Adrianople, drove him from thence, and obliged him to fly for refuge to the neighbouring barbarians. Theodorus Lascaris no sooner heard, that the confederates were preparing to cross the straits, in order to attack him, than he disbanded his army, and withdrew to the territories of the Turks. The confederates, having thus established the two princes on the throne, returned about the middle of winter to Constantinople, where they were received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable; and from thence passed early in the spring over into Asia. The same year, 1203, happened a dreadful conflagration at Constantinople, occasioned by some Latin soldiers, who having plundered a mosque, which the late emperor had suffered the Mohammedans to build in the imperial city, and being on that account attacked by the Turks, who were much superior to them in number, set fire to some wooden houses, the better to favour their escape. The flame, spreading in an instant from from street to street, reduced in a short time great part of the city to ashes, with the capacious store-houses, that had been built at a vast expense on the key. The emperor Isaac died soon after the departure of the Latins, leaving his son Alexius sole master of the empire. The young prince, to discharge the large sums he had promised to the French and Venetians, was obliged to lay heavy taxes on his subjects, which, with the great esteem and friendship he shewed to his deliverers, raised a general discontent among the people, who were sworn enemies to the Latins. This encouraged John Ducas, furred Murtzuphlius from his joined and thick eye-brows, to attempt the sovereignty. As he was a person of great address and uncommon parts, he not only ingratiated himself with the multitude, by exclaiming against the Latins, as the only cause of the present miseries; but having found means to gain the young prince's confidence, he by degrees brought him to disoblige the Latins, and even to treat them as enemies. As the hostilities were returned by the western princes, Murtzuphlius dispatched in the emperor's name one of his friends to the marquis of Montferrat, with proposals for an accommodation, offering to deliver up to him the palace and fortress of Blachernæ, within the walls of Constantinople, provided he would come and deliver him from the enraged populace, who, he said, had revolted and proclaimed another emperor. The marquis giving credit to the ambassador, prepared to march to Constantinople: but, in the mean time, the treacherous Murtzuphlius, having stirred up the people by giving out, that Alexius had sold the city to the Latins, who were in full march to take possession of it, entered, in the height of the tumult, the prince's chamber, and strangled him with his own hands. After this, he presented himself to the people, acquainted them with what he had done to secure their liberties, and earnestly entreated them to chuse an emperor, who had courage enough to defend them against the Latins, who were ready to oppress and enslave them. He had no sooner ended his speech, than those who were privy to his wicked design, saluted him with the title of emperor, and were followed by the whole multitude, who, with loud acclamations, placed him on the imperial throne, as one capable of defeating the pretended designs of the Latins. The princes of the crusade no sooner heard of the death of Alexius and the promotion of the treacherous affassin.

afflatus, than they unanimously agreed to turn their arms against the usurper, to revenge the murder of a prince, whom they had placed upon the throne; and since they had been so often betrayed, and retarded in their several expeditions to the holy land by the Greek emperors, to make themselves masters of Constantinople, and seize on the empire for themselves. Pursuant to this resolution, having mustered all their forces in Asia, they crossed the freights, and closely besieged the imperial city both by sea and land. The tyrant, who was a man of courage and great experience in war, made a vigorous defence. However, the Latins, after having battered the walls for several days together with an incredible number of engines, gave a general assault on the eighth of April, which lasted from break of day till three in the afternoon, when they were forced to retire, after having lost some of their engines and a great number of men. It was nevertheless resolved the same night in a council of war, that the attack should be renewed, which was done accordingly on Monday the twelfth of April, when after a warm dispute of several hours, the French planted their standard on one of the towers; which the Venetians observing, they quickly made themselves masters of four other towers, where they likewise displayed their ensigns. In the mean time, three of the gates being broken down with the battering rams, and those who had scaled the walls having killed the guards and opened the gates between the towers they had taken, the whole army entered, and drew up in battle-array within the walls. But the Greeks flying up and down in the greatest confusion, several parties were detached to scout the streets, who put all they met to the sword, without distinction of age or condition. Night put a stop to the dreadful slaughter, when the princes, founding the retreat, placed their men in the different quarters of the city, with orders to stand upon their guard, and fortify themselves, not doubting but they should be attacked early next morning. They were therefore greatly surprised, when, instead of an armed enemy, they saw by break of day processions of suppliants advancing to them from every quarter of the city, with croffes, banners, images of saints, relics, &c. to implore mercy. The princes touched with compassion, promised them their lives, but at the same time, ordering them to retire to their houses, they gave up the city to be plundered by the soldiery for that day, strictly enjoining them to abstain from slaughter, to preserve the honour of the women, and
and to bring the whole booty into one place, that a just distribution might be made according to the rank and merit of each particular. The Greeks had, without all doubt, removed and concealed their most valuable effects during the night; the most eminent persons had made their escape, and carried with them infinite treasures; most of the soldiers had, in all likelihood, reserved several things of great value for themselves, as it commonly happens, notwithstanding all prohibitions to the contrary; and yet the booty, without the statues, pictures, and jewels, amounted to a sum almost incredible. As for Murtzuphlus, he made his escape in the night, embarquing on a small vessel with Euphrofyne, the wife of the late usurer Alexius Angelus, and her daughter Eudoxia, for whose sake he had abandoned his lawful wife. This great revolution happened in the year 1204, of the christian æra, eight hundred and seventy-four years after the removal of the imperial seat from Rome to Constantinople.

C H A P. XXXVI.

The Roman history, from the expulsion of the Greeks, to the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, and the utter destruction of the Roman empire.

The Latins, now masters of the imperial city, proceeded to the election of a new emperor; when Baldwin, earl of Flanders, a prince in every respect equal to that high trust, was, after some deliberation, chosen, and crowned with extraordinary pomp and magnificence in the church of St. Sophia. To him was allotted the city of Constantinople and the country of Thrace, with a limited sovereignty over the other provinces, which already were, or should afterwards be, taken from the Greeks. To Boniface, marquis of Montferrat, they assigned Thessaly, which was erected into a kingdom. The Venetians had for their share the islands of the Archipelago, part of Peloponnesus, and several cities on the Hellespont. But while the Latins were thus dividing dividing their new acquisitions, Theodorus Lascaris, son-in-law to the tyrant Alexius Angelus, having, at the taking of Constantinople, made his escape into Bithynia, was there joyfully received by the inhabitants; and poaching himself not only of that country, but of Phrygia, Myidia, Ionia, and Lydia, from the Meander to the Euxine sea, took upon him the title of emperor, and fixed his imperial seat in the famous city of Nice. At the same time, David and Alexius Comnen, grand-children to the late tyrant Andronicus, seizing on the more eastern countries of Pontus, Galatia, and Cappadocia, erected a new empire at Trapezus or Trapezond where their posterity reigned, till their empire, as well as that of Constantinople, fell into the hands of Mohammed the Great, as we shall relate in a more proper place. Thus the Greek empire was no longer one, but divided into several empires, Baldwin reigning at Constantinople, the marquis of Montferrat in Thessaly, Theodorus Lascaris at Nice, the Comnen at Trapezond, and the Venetians in the islands, not to mention several other toparchies or principalities erected on the ruins of the Constantinopolitan empire. But to resume the thread of our history, Baldwin, the new emperor of Constantinople, having with the assistance of the other princes, reduced all Thrace, except Adrianople, whither great numbers of Greeks had fled for shelter against the prevailing power of the Latins, resolved to lay siege to that important place, and accordingly set down before it with all his forces. The Greeks defended themselves with great resolution, and at the same time, by means of some of their nation, who had withdrawn into Bulgaria, prevailed upon John, king of that country, to espouse their cause, who marching at the head of a powerful army, consisting partly of Bulgarians partly of Scythians, to the relief of the place, drew the emperor, by a pretended flight, into an ambuscade, cut off most of his men, and took Baldwin himself prisoner. After this victory, the Bulgarians over-ran all Thrace, plundering the cities, laying waste the country, and committing every-where unheard-of cruelties. As for the unhappy emperor Baldwin, he was sent in chains to Ernon, or Ternova, the capital of Bulgaria, where after his hands and feet had been cut off by the king's orders, he was carried into a desert, and there left exposed to the wild beasts and birds of prey. In that miserable condition he lived three days, and then expired. The Greek historians themselves, who, we may well imagine, were no-wars prejudiced in his favour, allow him to have been a prince endowed with every good quality becoming a person in his high station.

In the mean time, Alexius Angelus, the late usurper, hearing that Theodorus Lascaris, his son-in-law, reigned in Asia, left Greece, where he then lay concealed; and passing over into Asia, went privately to the court of Jathatines sultan of Iconium, his ancient friend and ally; and laying before him the miserable condition to which he was reduced, with tears in his eyes, implored his assistance for the recovery of his empire, especially of that part of Asia Minor, which was, with the utmost injustice, withheld from him by Theodorus Lascaris. Jathatines, at this time sultan of Iconium, was the younger son of sultan Aladin, who, at his death, divided his kingdom between his two children Aratines and Jathatines. But, they quarrelling about the sovereignty, the latter was driven out by the former, and forced to fly for refuge to Constantinople, where he was kindly received, and entertained in a manner suitable to his rank by Alexius, then emperor. Jathatines therefore espousing, out of gratitude, the cause of his unfortunate friend, sent embassadors to Lascaris, requiring him in a threatening manner, to deliver up the country he unjustly possessed, to the lawful owner Alexius, his father-in-law. Before the return of the embassadors, the sultan, attended by Alexius, advanced at the head of twenty thousand men to Antioch on the Meander, and laid siege to that place; which Lascaris no sooner understood, than he marched with two thousand men, the moff he was able in that exiguity to raise, to the relief of the besieged city, being well apprised, that if he suffered it to fall into the enemy's hands, as it stood on that river and was the boundary of his empire, it would open a way for them into the heart of his dominions. The sultan at first could scarce give credit to those who brought him intelligence of the approach of Lascaris with so small a force. However, he drew up his army in the best manner the narrowness of the place would allow of; which he had scarce done, when eight hundred Italians, of Lascaris's army, charging the Turks with incredible resolution, broke through the sultan's army, disordered his ranks, and put his men into the utmost confusion. As the Greeks had not courage enough to follow them, they were separated from the rest of the army, and on their return surrounded by the Turkish cavalry, and all to a man cut in pieces. The Greeks,

Greeks, disheartened at so great a loss, were upon the point of turning their backs, when the sultan, now, as he imagined, sure of the victory, singling out the Greek emperor, and trusting to his own strength, engaged him in person, and at the first blow struck him off his horse. But Lafragis, quickly recovering himself, unhorsed the sultan, and, before he could put himself in a posture of defence, cut off his head; and fixing it upon the point of a spear, in sight of the enemy's army, struck such terror into them, that they immediately betook themselves to a precipitous and disorderly flight, leaving the Greeks, who before were ready to fly, masters of their camp and baggage. Alexius, the author of this war, was taken prisoner, and carried to Nice, where he was confined to a monastery, in which he ended his days some years after. This victory was followed by a peace, concluded with the Turks upon the Greek emperor's own terms, who being now at leisure to secure his dominions against Henry, brother to the late emperor Baldwin and his successor in the Constantinopolitan empire, a bloody war was continued for several years between these two princes, with various success; but the Greeks being divided among themselves, and several princes of the imperial family erecting, in different provinces, independent principalities, Lafragis was in the end obliged to acknowledge the authority of Henry, and conclude a peace with him. After this, Henry turned his arms first against the Bulgarians, whom he drove out of Thrace, and afterwards against Michael Angelus, a Greek prince of the imperial family, who having seized on Aetolia and Epirus, during the confusion that ensued upon the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, caused himself to be acknowledged despot or lord of the country. The emperor waged war with him and his brother Theodorus, a warlike prince, during the greater part of his reign; but was not able to recover the countries which he held. Henry, after having reigned ten years, nine months, and twenty days, with great glory and success, died at Thessalonica in the fortieth year of his age. He was succeeded by Peter, count of Auxerre, who had married his sister, and signalized himself upon several occasions. This prince, arriving at Rome on his way from France to Constantinople, was solemnly crowned there by pope Honorius III. on the ninth of April 1217. From Rome he proceeded to Venice, whence he entered into an alliance with that republic against Theodorus, who who had succeeded his brother Michael in the principality of Eetolia and Epirus. Leaving Venice, he entered that prince's dominions, and laid siege to Dyrrhachium, which Theodorus had lately taken; but not being able to reduce it, he was forced to abandon the enterprise, and soon after to come to an agreement with Theodorus, who promised him a free passage through his dominions; but nevertheless fell upon him unexpectedly, cut most of his forces in pieces, and having taken the emperor himself prisoner, put him to death soon after *. Upon his death, the Latins named his eldest son Philip, count of Namur, to succeed him; but he declining that burden, Robert, the deceased emperor's second son, was, with much ado, prevailed upon to submit to it. In the third year of his reign died Theodorus Lascaris, after having governed, for the space of eighteen years, that part of the empire, which the Greeks still retained in Asia, and defended it with no less courage than success against the Turks on one side, and the Latins on the other. He left behind him one son and three daughters; but the son being yet an infant, he bequeathed the empire to John Ducas, surnamed Vataces, who had married his eldest daughter Irene, and was by the dying emperor not undeservedly judged more capable than his own brothers, Alexius and Isaac, of defending, and even enlarging, the empire, which he had founded. John Ducas was crowned in the year 1222, by Manuel, patriarch of the Greeks, at Nice. Alexius and Angelus, the late emperor's brothers, thinking the empire belonged of right to them, withdrew to Constantinople, to improve the protection of the Latins against one, whom they looked upon as no other than an usurper. Robert, the Latin emperor, readily espoused their cause; and having raised a considerable army, committed it to their conduct. But John, having assembled in the mean time all his forces, met the two brothers at a place called Poemenium; and having engaged them, gained a complete victory, the flower of the Latin army being cut off, and the two commanders taken prisoners. The Greek emperor, encouraged with this success, built with incredible expedition a great number of galleys in the several ports of Asia; and falling unexpectedly upon the islands in the Archipelago, reduced most of them, driving every-where the Latins before him. The fame of his exploits reaching Aaffan or Azen, king of Bulgaria, that prince, courting his friendship, proposed a match between his daughter Helena and Theodore,

* Georg. Acrop. L i. c, c.
Theodore, the emperor's son, which was readily embraced by Ducas, who well knew how advantageous to his affairs an alliance would prove with so powerful a prince. At the same time, the sultan of Iconium, apprehending an irruption of the Tartars, who had already driven the Turks out of Persia, sent embassadors to Nice, to confirm and prolong the truce between the two crowns; which Ducas readily agreed to, and then employing his whole strength against the Latins, made himself master of all the places held by them on the Bosphorus and the Hellespont. While the Latins were thus distressed on the other side of the straights by John Ducas, Theodorus, prince or despot of Epirus, invading Thessaly and Thrace, made himself master of those countries; and, assuming the title of emperor, caufed himself to be crowned with great solemnity by Demetrius, patriarch of Bulgaria. He had lately concluded a peace with John, the son and successor of Azen, in the kingdom of Bulgaria; but elated with his success against the Latins, and desirous of enlarging his dominions with new conquests, in defiance of the late treaty, he broke into Bulgaria. But John, whom he looked upon as no-ways a match for so renowned a conqueror, having raised a mighty army, engaged him: and having after a long and bloody dispute, put his forces to flight, took the despot himself prisoner, and caused his eyes to be pulled out. Not long after, that is, about the year 1228, died Robert, emperor of the Latins in Constantinople, in the ninth year of his reign. He died in Achaia, as he was returning from Rome, which city he had visited, according to some writers, in order to be crowned there in a more solemn manner by the pope. He had married the daughter of Baldwin of Neville, though she had some time before been betrothed to a Burgundian lord, who, highly provoked at her forsaking him to marry the emperor, seized on her and her mother, during the prince's absence; and having caused the ambitious mother to be thrown into the sea, ordered the nose, ears and lips of her beautiful daughter to be cut off. The sense of this barbarous outrage sunk so deep into the emperor's mind, that it was thought to have occasioned his death. He was succeeded by Baldwin II. his brother, or, as some writers will have it, his son, who being but eight years old, John of Brienne, formerly king of Jerusalem, and one of the greatest captains of this time, was appointed regent and guardian of the empire during his minority. Some writers reckon reckon him among the Latin emperors of Constantinople, and tell us, that it was agreed among the Latin princes, that he should be honoured with the title of emperor during his life, he being then near eighty years of age; and that upon his death the empire should return to Baldwin, who was to marry Martha, or, as some stile her, Mary, the daughter of John, by his second wife Bevengaria, the daughter of Alphonso, king of Castile. Be that as it will, it is certain, that John governed with an absolute and uncontrolled power and was by all respected and obeyed as emperor. In the beginning of his administration, John Azen, king of Bulgaria, and John Ducas, the Greek emperor, entering into an alliance, fell with their united forces upon the territories of the Latins, and laid close siege to Constantinople itself. But the regent, behaving with a courage and resolution equal to his former reputation, sallied out with no more than two hundred horse and an handful of foot, put the enemy’s army, though a hundred thousand men strong, to flight; and having obliged them to raise the siege, and pursued them with great slaughter, returned to the metropolis loaded with booty. However, the following year 1236, the confederate princes, depending upon their numbers, appeared anew before the imperial city; but were attended with no better success, being a second time defeated and put to flight. But the enemy receiving daily new supplies, and the Latin army being in time greatly weakened and diminished, partly by sickness, and partly by frequent battles and skirmishes, the regent was at length obliged to flout himself up in the imperial city, having no more men left alive than were necessary to defend the walls. The enemy, well apprised of the state of his affairs, returned once more, and renewed the siege; whereupon John, knowing he could not rely upon the Greeks, who abhorred a foreign yoke, and were entirely devoted to the families at Nice and Trapezond, sent the young emperor Baldwin to solicit succours in person from the western princes. During his absence, the Venetians, arriving with a powerful fleet at Constantinople, obliged the confederate forces of Azen and Vataces to raise the siege. But John of Brienne dying soon after, that is, in 1237, the ninth year of his administration, the loss of so great a man would have proved fatal to the Latins, but for a misunderstanding that arose between the Greek emperor and king of Bulgaria, and was carried to such an height, that the latter having by a stratagem recovered his daughter, whom he had married to the emperor’s son, joined the Latins against him, and with them laid laid siege to the city of Chiorli. But, in the mean time, news being brought him of the death of his wife Ann, daughter to the king of Hungary, he dropped that enterprize and returned home, where he soon after married the daughter of Theodorus Angelus, the late despot of Epirus, whom he had taken prisoner a few years before and deprived of his sight, as we have related above. This alliance produced a great change in the affairs of Theodorus; for Azen not only set him at liberty, but assisted him in the recovery of his dominions, which had been usurped by his brother Manuel. Being thus restored to his former power, he appointed his son to govern in his room, causing him to be acknowledged as emperor. This gave no small umbrage to John Vataces, who pretended to be the sole emperor of the Greeks; and therefore, upon the death of Azen, which happened soon after, he passed over into Thrace; and entering into an alliance with the Scythians, who had lately settled in Macedon, he entered the mock-emperor’s territories, stripped him of great part of his dominions, and obliged him to renounce the title of emperor, and content himself with that of despot. In 1239, the emperor Baldwin, returning from the west, arrived at Constantinople, and was there crowned by the patriarch in the church of St. Sophia. He concluded an alliance with the Comneni reigning at Trapezond, and, with their assistance, besieged and took the city of Chiorli, which, however, was soon after retaken by Vataces, together with the island of Rhodes, surprized a few years before by the Genoese. Vataces, having thus recovered such places as had been by the Latins dismembered from his empire, and not only made himself master of the greater part of Asia, but extended his conquest in Europe almost to the very gates of Constantinople, died, after a glorious reign of thirty-three years, being then in the sixty-second year of his age. Vataces was succeeded by his son Theodorus Laefaris, who having renewed the antient alliance with the sultan of Iconium, passed the Hellespont at the head of a powerful army, and made war upon the king of Bulgaria and the despot of Epirus, who had invaded his dominions in Macedon and Thrace, with such success, that they were forced to sue for peace, which he granted them upon his own terms.

* Acrop. in Vat. c. 12——21.
While he lay at Thessalonica, he received letters from Nice, informing him, that Michael Palæologus, whom he had left governor of Aia during his absence, had secretly withdrawn to the Turks, under pretence, that his enemies at court, by misrepresenting his conduct, had rendered him suspected to the emperor, whose displeasure he feared. As Michael was an officer of great courage and experience in war, the sultan of Iconium received him with uncommon demonstrations of kindness and esteem, and gave him the command of a body of Greeks in the Turkish pay, at the head of which he distinguished himself soon after in a battle between the Turks and Tartars, and would have gained a complete victory, had not the sudden revolt of a chief officer, who was nearly related to the sultan, turned the fortune of the day. The Turkish army being almost entirely cut off, the victorious Tartars, who had already driven the Turks out of Persia, and the more eastern provinces, ravaged without control the countries belonging to them in Aia, and reduced the sultan to such straits, that he was forced to fly for refuge to the emperor Theodorus, who received him in a very obliging manner, and sent him back with a body of chosen troops, under the command of Isaac Ducaς, an officer of great reputation, and the emperor’s chief favourite. The sultan, in his turn, delivered up to the emperor the city of Laodicea. In the mean time, Theodorus, unwilling to lose a subject of such extraordinary parts as Palæologus, wrote to him a most kind and obliging letter, inviting him home, and promising to receive him anew into favour, and restore him to his former honours and employments. With this invitation Palæologus readily complied, and was, upon his return, reinstated in the emperor’s favour, after having taken an oath of allegiance to Theodorus and his son. The emperor died soon after, having scarce reigned three years complete, leaving his son John, then about nine years old, to succeed him. Some time before his death, he took the monastic habit, distributed great sums among the poor, and applied himself with exemplary piety to acts of devotion. On his death-bed, he appointed Arsenius, the patriarch, and George Muzalo guardians to the young prince. Muzalo was a person of a mean descent, but had, by his great fidelity and inviolable attachment to the emperor, deserved to be raised to the highest employments in the state, which he had ever discharged with wonderful integrity, and a character altogether unblemished. However, the nobility, thinking the care and tuition of the young prince belonged of right to... them, began to complain of his conduct, and malign all his measures. Hereupon Muzalo, who sincerely desired to retire, and lead a private life, having assembled the nobility, offered to resign the administration to such as they thought the best qualified for the discharge of so great a trust. But they all declining it, he obliged them to renew their allegiance to the emperor, and bind themselves under a solemn oath to obey him, and, during his minority, those whom the deceased emperor judged proper to entrust with the care of his son and the government of the state. But, notwithstanding this oath, the leading men among the nobility, conspiring against Muzalo, on the day appointed for the obsequies of the late emperor, repaired to the abbey of Sofandra, where he was to be interred; and mixing with the crowd, in the midst of the service, fell upon Muzalo with their drawn swords, and dispatched him at the very altar, whither he had fled for refuge, with his two brothers Andronicus and Theodorus, men of distinguished characters. Muzalo being thus removed, the conspirators, without any regard to the patriarch, who was a man of learning, but an utter stranger to state-affairs, declared Michael Palæologus guardian to the young prince, and protector of the empire. He signalized the beginning of his administration with a signal victory over Michael Angelus, despot of Epirus, who, taking advantage of the distractions of the state, after the death of Vataces, had broken into Thrace and Macedon, at the head of a numerous army; but was obliged to retire into his own dominions by John Palæologus, the protector's brother, after having loit, in a bloody engagement, the flower of his army. When news of this victory was brought to Magnesia, where Palæologus then resided, he was, by the most powerful among the nobility and the populace, saluted with the title of emperor, which he did not reject. The patriarch threatened at first to cut off from the church both Palæologus and his adherents; but the protector binding himself, by a solemn oath, to resign the empire to the young prince, as soon as he should be of age, the credulous patriarch was prevailed upon to place the crown upon his head. Palæologus, thus raised to the empire, dispatched his brother Constantine with a considerable army into Peloponnesus, which was then held partly by the despot of Epirus, and partly by the Latins, but soon recovered by Constantine. After this, Michael passed in person with a numerous army into Thrace, having nothing less in view than the reduction of Constantinople itself, the dominions of the Latins being now so dismembered, that that scarce any thing was left to the inactive and slothful Baldwin besides the imperial city. However, Palæologus apprehending the difficulty and dangers of such an extraordinary undertaking, resolved to put it off to a more favourable opportunity, and in the mean time to make himself master of the castle of Pera, in order to disquiet the Latins more effectually. But, being in several successfull assaults repulsed with great loss, he was obliged to give over the enterprise and retire. However, as he was master of the neighbouring country, before his departure, he dispersed his troops in such manner, that the city being in some degree blocked up, the inhabitants were reduced to the utmost extremity. In the mean time, Alexius Angelus, despot of Epirus, attempting, in defiance of a late treaty with Palæologus, to recover the places he had lost in Thessaly and Greece, Alexius Strategopolus, a person descended of an illustrious family, and for his eminent services distinguished with the title of Caesar, was sent against him, with orders to try whether he could on his march surprize Constantinople. Alexius, having passed the streights, encamped at a place called Rhegium, where he was informed by the natives, that a strong body of the Latins had been sent to the siege of Daphnusa; that the garrison was in great want of provisions; and that it would be no difficult matter to surprize the city. Hereupon the Greek general resolved at all events to attempt it; and being encouraged by some of the inhabitants, who, coming privately to his camp, offered themselves to be his guides, he approached the walls in the dead of the night, which some of his men scaled without being observed; and killing the centuries, whom they found asleep, opened one of the gates to the rest of the army, who rushing in, put all they met to the sword; and at the same time, to create more terror, set fire to the city in four different places. The Latins, concluding from thence the enemy’s forces to be far more numerous than they really were, did not so much as attempt either to drive them out, or to extinguish the flames; but, struck with terror and amazement, suffered themselves to be cut in pieces in the streets or their houses, which were soon filled with blood and slaughter.

In this general confusion, the emperor Baldwin, quitting the ensigns of majesty, fled with Justilian, the Latin patriarch, and some of his intimate friends, to the sea-side; and thence embarking on a small vessel, sailed first to Ephesos, and from thence to Venice, leaving the Greeks in possession of the imperial city, after it had been held fifty-eight, or, as some will have it, sixty, years, by the Latins. This happened pened in the year 1261, of the Christian æra, the second of the reign of Michael Palæologus. When news of the surprizing, and altogether unexpected, successes of Alexius was first brought to Palæologus, residing then at Nymphaeum, he gave no credit to it; but receiving soon after letters from Alexius himself, with a particular account of so memorable an event, transported with joy, he ordered public thanks to be returned in all the churches with great solemnity, appeared in public in his imperial robes, attended by the nobility in their best apparel, and ordered couriers to be immediately dispatched with the agreeable tidings into all the provinces of the empire. Soon after, the emperor, having settled his affairs at Nice, set out for Constantinople with the empress, his son Andronicus, the senate, and the nobility, to take possession of the imperial city, and fix his residence in the place, which, at first, had been destined for the seat of the western empire. Having puffed the freights, he advanced to the Golden gate, and continued some days without the walls, while the citizens were busied in making the necessary preparations to receive him with a magnificence suitable to the occasion. On the day appointed, the Golden gate, which had been long shut up, was opened, and the emperor entering it amidst the repeated acclamations of the multitude, marched on foot to the great palace, being preceded by the bishop of Cyzicus, carrying the image of the virgin Mary, supposed to have been done by St. Luke, and followed by all the great officers, the nobility, and the chief citizens, in their most pompous apparel. Public thanks were again returned in the church of St. Sophia, at which the emperor assisted in person, with the clergy, the senate, and the nobility. The exercises of piety were succeeded by all sorts of diversions, which lasted several days, the nobility, and chief citizens, striving to excel each other in testifying their joy by banquets and public sports, on such an extraordinary occasion. When the public rejoicings were over, the emperor carefully surveyed the imperial city, which alloyed in great measure the senate of his present good fortune; for he observed the stately palace of Blachernæ, with the other magnificent dwellings of the Roman emperors, lying in ruins; the many capacious buildings, that had been erected by his predecessors at an immense charge, destroyed by fire and other unavoidable accidents of war; several streets quite abandoned by the inhabitants, and choaked up with the rubbish of the ruined

ruined houses, &c. These objects gave the emperor no small concern, and kindled in him a desire of rebuilding the city, and restoring it to its former lustre. In the mean time, looking upon Alexius as the restorer of his country, he caused him to be clad in magnificent robes, placed with his own hand a crown upon his head, ordered him to be conducted through the city, as it were in triumph, decreed that for a whole year his name should in the public prayers be joined to his own, and to perpetuate the memory of so great and glorious an action, he commanded his statue to be erected on a stately pillar of marble before the church of the apostles. His next care was to repeople the city, many Greek families having withdrawn from it, while it was held by the Latins, to settle elsewhere, and the Latins now preparing to return to their respective countries. The former were recalled home; and the latter, in regard of the great trade they carried on, prevailed upon with many valuable privileges not to remove. The Genoese were allowed to live in one of the most beautiful quarters of the city, to be governed by their own laws and magistrates, and to trade without paying customs or taxes of any kind. Great privileges were likewise granted to the natives of Venice and Pisa, which encouraged them to lay aside all thoughts of removing, and carry on a trade, which proved highly beneficial and advantageous to the state. The emperor being soon after informed, that Baldwin had married his daughter to Charles, king of Sicily, and given him by way of dowry the city of Constantinople, which that warlike prince was making great preparations to recover, he ordered the Genoese, who were become very numerous, and might have done great mischief, if the city had been attacked, to remove first to Heraclea, and afterwards to Galata, where they continued. As for the Pisans and Venetians, who were not so numerous and wealthy, they were allowed to continue in the city. The emperor, having thus settled the state, and gained the affections both of the natives and foreigners, began to think of securing to himself and his posterity the sovereignty, which he only held as it were in trust, and was to resign to the young prince as soon as he came of age. Having therefore caused himself to be crowned anew in the imperial city, he soon after ordered the young prince to be deprived of his right, pretending that no one but himself had any title to the city or empire of Constantinople, which he alone had recovered from the Latins.

tins. This treason and barbarity involved him in endless troubles and dangers. For Arsenius, the patriarch, immediately excommunicated him and all those who had been anyways accessory to his crime, which occasioned great disturbances in the city. At the same time, Michael, despot of Epirus, and Constantine, king of Bulgaria, who had married the young emperor's sisters, breaking into Thrace, laid waste that country, destroying all with fire and sword. Pauleologus marched against them in person; but as he was returning home without performing any thing worthy of notice, he was attacked unexpectedly by the Bulgarians, and had unavoidably fallen into their hands, had he not escaped by sea on board a small vessel, which conveyed him safe to Constantinople. The troops he had with him were for the most part cut in pieces or taken prisoners; and the Bulgarians, being reinforced with twenty thousand Tartars, roved about the country without control, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties. The Venetians, observing the distracted state of the empire, laid hold of that opportunity to recover the islands in the Archipelago, which Pauleologus had seized after the reduction of Constantinople. The Venetians were joined by the king of Sicily and most of the western princes, who combining against Pauleologus, would, in all likelihood, have driven him from the throne, had he not engaged pope Urban IV. to espouse his cause, by promising to submit himself and his dominions to the Latin church, and by that means diverted the storm that threatened him. The pope persuaded Charles count of Anjou and king of Sicily, to conclude a peace with him; and Pauleologus, on his side, did all that lay in his power to bring about an union between the two churches, acknowledging by his embassadors, or in person, as some will have it, the supremacy of the pope in the famous council of Lyons held in the year 1274. This occasioned great disturbances at Constantinople and throughout the empire, Joseph the patriarch, and with him most of the clergy, openly inveighing against these innovations; which provoked Pauleologus to such a degree, that he caused such as appeared most obstinate to be imprisoned and cruelly racked, and banished the rest with the patriarch Joseph, in whose room Vecceus was chosen. However, not long after, Simon of Bive, a native of France, being, by the interest of Charles, king of Sicily, chosen pope, on which occasion he took the name of Martin IV., he solemnly excommunicated Michael for having contributed to the famous massacre of the French in Sicily, which happened on Easter-day, the thirtieth of March 1282, and is commonly known by the name of the Sicilian vespers. At length the unhappy prince, oppressed with cares, was taken ill as he was marching against the Turks, who had broken into the eastern provinces; and, his distemper increasing daily, he was obliged to halt at a place called Allogium. There he received the embassadors of the Tartars, whom he had invited to his assistance, and soon after died, having lived fifty-eight years, and reigned twenty-four, wanting one month. He was succeeded by his son Andronicus Palæologus, who, thinking he could not begin his reign by a more popular act than by restoring the ceremonies of the Greek church, and refusing to acknowledge the supremacy of the pope, annulled whatever his father had done with respect to the union of the two churches. But such as had received the Latin ceremonies defending them with great obstinacy, and those of the contrary faction, now countenanced by the emperor, returning the evil treatment they had met with in the late reign, the schism was revived, and such animosities raised in the state, as threw the whole empire into a ferment. However, his endeavouring to restore the ancient ceremonies disoblged such only as were addicted to the Latin church; but his conduct towards his brother Constantine estranged from him the minds of both parties. Constantine was the darling of the people; and being sent by the late emperor his father into Asia, to defend the frontiers of the empire, he had there in several battles overthrown the Turks. His great popularity, and the reputation he had gained by his victories, rendering him suspected to the emperor, he was by his orders seized and thrown into prison, with several other persons of great distinction, amongst whom was Michael Strategopulus, son to the celebrated Alexius, who had recovered Constantinople from the Latins. Upon the removal of these two brave officers, the Turks, under the conduct of the famous Othoman, made themselves masters of several places in Phrygia, Caria, and Bithynia, and among the rest of the city of Nice. To put a stop to their conquests, the emperor dispatched into Asia Philanthropenus and Libadarius, two officers of great reputation and experience in war, appointing the latter governor of the cities of Ionia, and committing to the former the defence of the frontiers on the Meander. Philanthropenus gained several advantages over the Turks; but, elated with his his success, he assumed the purple, and causing himself to be proclaimed emperor, marched against Libadarius, who had declared him a public enemy, and set a price upon his head. As the two armies were ready to engage, the Cretans, who served under Philanthropenus, and had been before-hand gained over by Libadarius, seizing their leader, delivered him up to his adversary, who cau ted his eyes to be put out. In the mean time, the Turks, taking advantage of these intestine disturbances, not only extended their dominions in Asia, but conquered most of the islands in the Mediterranean; and, being masters at sea, infested the coasts of the empire, to the utter ruin of trade and commerce. In this distracted state of affairs, the emperor, distrusting his own subjects, took into his pay ten thousand Messagetes or Alans, who, being driven out of their own country by the Tartars, had passed the Danube. These being sent over into Asia, under the conduct of Michael, the emperor's eldest son, whom he had lately declared his colleague in the empire, the Turks, at their approach, retired to the mountains; whence soon after they came suddenly down, and falling upon the Messagetes, while they lay in their camp, without the least apprehension of danger, put them to flight, in spite of all the efforts of the young emperor, who, on that occasion distinguished himself in a most eminent manner, but was in the end obliged to fly with the rest, and take refuge in the strong castle of Magnesia. The Messagetes, abandoning him, marched directly to the Hellespont, ravaging the countries through which they passed, and thence crossed over into Europe. The Turks, pursuing them, made themselves masters of all the strong-holds to the sea-side. As for Michael, having narrowly escaped falling into their hands, he got in the end safe to Constantinople. The emperor, notwithstanding the shameful conduct of the Messagetes, reposing still greater trust in strangers than in his own subjects, of whom he was grown jealous since the rebellion of Philanthropenus, took into his service a body of Catalans, under the command of one Ronzerius or Rouzerius, who had formerly served in the wars between the kings of Sicily and Naples; and, having conferred extraordinary honours upon him, sent him with his troops to the relief of Philadelphia, then closely besieged by the Turks, whom, upon his arrival he obliged to abandon the enterprise and retire. Upon their retreat, he turned his arms against those whom he was sent to protect; and roving about the country, committed every-where unheard-heard of cruelties, subjecting all to the rage and lust of those dissolute vagabonds. Having plundered the few places that were left to the emperor in Asia, he returned with his Catalans to Europe; and leaving the rest at Callipolis, went with two hundred chosen men to demand of the young emperor Michael, lying then at Oreftias in Thrace, the arrears which he pretended to be due to himself and his men. Michael, justly provoked at his late conduct in Asia, and now incensed against him on account of his insolent carriage, ordered his guards to fall upon him, who accordingly cut him and most of his men in pieces. Those, who escaped, flying to Callipolis, acquainted their countrymen with the death of their general, who thereupon, transported with rage, first put all the citizens to the sword, and then, fortifying themselves in the best manner they could, prepared for a vigorous defence. However, as they distrusted their own strength, they sent for assistance to the Turks dwelling over-against them in Asia, who immediately conveyed over the sttreights five hundred chosen men to reinforce them. These were soon followed by others, who, joining the Catalans, laid waste the neighbouring country; and having, with great expedition, equipped and manned eight galleys, plundered all the merchant-ships in the streights, and would have greatly distressed the imperial city itself, had not their small fleet been encountered and destroyed by the Genoese. On this occasion the Turks came first into Europe; an event which we may deservedly reckon one of the most fatal that ever happened to the empire. The young emperor Michael marched against the Catalans and Turks, with a considerable army, consisting of Greeks, Maffagetes, and other auxiliaries; but the auxiliaries withdrawing, as soon as the signal for battle was given, and standing at a small distance as idle spectators, at whose instigation was never known, the Greeks were so discouraged, that the emperor could neither by threats or promises stop their flight. He performed in person all that could be expected from an experienced officer and valiant soldier; but not being able to encourage his men, either with his words or example, and his horse being killed under him, he was forced to retire, and make his escape to Didymothicum, where his father lay encamped. After this victory, the Catalans and Turks over-ran all Thrace, destroying every thing with fire and sword, till finding it impossible for them to subsist longer there, the Catalans resolved to invade Thessaly; but the Turks, desirous of returning home with their booty, booty, separated from them, being then thirteen thousand horse, and eight hundred foot; and bending their march through Macedonia, acquainted the emperor, that they were ready peaceably to depart, provided he would allow them a safe passage through his dominions, and supply them with ships to transport them into Asia. To this the emperor, willing to get rid of such troublesome guests, readily condescended, and accordingly ordered the necessary vessels to be got ready with the utmost expedition. But the Greek officers, observing the immense booty with which they were loaded, began to contrive how they should make themselves masters of it, and in the end resolved to fall upon the Turks in the night; and by cutting them all off, revenge the injuries they had done to the subjects of the empire, and enrich themselves with the booty. The matter was not managed with such secrecy, but the Turks had timely intimation of it. Hereupon, having surprized a strong castle in that neighbourhood, they prepared for a vigorous defence, and at the same time found means to acquaint their countrymen on the other side of the straits with the danger that threatened them, who, enticed with the hopes of booty, hastened to their assistance; and crossing the Hellaspoint, ravaged the adjacent country, making excursions to the very gates of Constantinople. The emperor, awaked at length by the daily complaints of his people, resolved to root them out; and accordingly marched against them with all his forces, the country-people flocking to him from all parts with their spades, mattocks, and other instruments of husbandry, in order to-afflict him in the reduction of the castle. The Turks were greatly alarmed at their approach, and began to look upon themselves as inevitably lost; but afterwards observing, that the Greeks, who had closely besieged the place, confining in their strength and numbers, utterly neglected all discipline, they took courage, and falling out with no more than eight hundred horse, penetrated almost without opposition to the emperor's tent, which struck the undisciplined multitudes with such terror, that they betook themselves to a hasty flight. Their example was followed by the rest of the army, tho' the emperor, and some of the officers, made several bold stands, hoping thereby to stop the flight of the defeated multitude; but the cowardly Greeks could not by any means be prevailed upon to stand before the enemy, who, after having made a dreadful slaughter of the fugitives, and taken some of the chief officers officers prisoners, made themselves masters of the emperor's camp, in which they found a large sum, designed for the payment of the troops, several standards, the imperial crown, enriched with precious stones of an ineffimable value, and all the baggage of the army. After this unexpected victory, the Turks roved up and down Thrace for two years together, without control; which brought unspeakable calamities upon the inhabitants, confined within their walled towns, without daring to stir out to till their ground. At length Philes Palæologus, a person nearly related to the emperor, touched with the calamities of his country, defined leave to march against the enemy, with such officers and soldiers as the emperor should think fit to appoint for that service, not doubting, he said, but, with the assistance of Heaven, he should revenge the injuries done to his country, and return in triumph. As Philes was an utter stranger to the art of war, but remarkable for his piety and the integrity of his life, the emperor, looking upon him as one chosen by providence for the relief of his oppressed country, readily complied with his request. Philes's first care was to establish good discipline among his soldiers, exhorting them to live with temperance and sobriety, encouraging them with frequent donatives, and promising to reward each of them at the end of the war according to his deserts. Having thus modelled his small army according to his desire, he took the field, attended by the prayers and good wishes of the emperor and the whole people. Being informed, soon after his departure from Constantinople, that Chaleb, the Turkish commander, was ravaging the country about Bizia, with one thousand foot and two hundred horse, he marched immediately against him; and encamping the third day in a large plain near a little river called Xerogiolum, he received at midnight certain intelligence, that the enemy with their booty were at hand. Hereupon having drawn up his men in battle-array, and with a pathetic speech, encouraged them to exert themselves in the defence of their country, he waited the enemy's arrival, who began to appear at sun-rising. The Turks, not in the least terrified with the surprise, having formed a strong barricade with their waggons, and secured their prisoners, advanced in good order against the imperial troops, who received them with great resolution and intrepidity. Philes, having first invoked the divine assistance, charged at the head of the right-wing the enemy's cavalry, who began to give way; but his horse being killed under him, him, he was obliged to withdraw; which somewhat damped the courage of his men. However, he quickly appeared again at the head of the army; and falling with fresh vigour upon the enemy with the most resolute of his men, put their horse to flight; and then dismounting, charged their foot at the head of his infantry with such resolution, that the Turks, no longer able to withstand them, betook themselves to a precipitous flight. Philes pursuèd them with great slaughter to the entrance into the Chersonesus, and there encamped, with a design to cut off their communication with the neighbouring country. The emperor, transported with joy at the news of this victory, dispatched immediately five galleys, which were reinforced with eight more sent by the Genoese of Peræ, to guard the streights, and prevent their receiving any assistance out of Asia. At the same time, Philes’s army was strengthened with two hundred chosen horse, sent him by Crales king of Servia, who had married the emperor’s daughter. The Turks being thus shut up both by sea and land, Philes, advancing with his forces to the castle they had seized, began to batter it with an incredible number of engines; which did great execution. The Turks, now despairing of relief, and weakened by daily skirmishes, resolved to use an utmost effort, and attempt to break through the Greeks sword in hand; but finding them, when they first sallied out, upon their guard and ready to receive them, they returned to their castle; but not so discouraged as not to attempt a few days after to open themselves a way through the Servians; which attempt proving equally unsuccessful, they began utterly to despair. Having therefore cast away their arms, and taken with them their gold and silver, of which they had great plenty, in the dead of the night they made towards the seaside with a design to surrender themselves to the Genoese, who, they hoped, would shew them more mercy than the Greeks, as they had never injured nor provoked them; but the night proving dark, many of them, mistaking the Greek for the Genoese galleys, fell into the hands of their most implacable enemies, by whom they were cut in pieces without compassion. The rest fared not much better; for the Genoese killed such as brought the most money with them, lest in time they should discover it to the Greeks, who would have claimed it. The poorer sort they loaded with chains, sending some of them to the emperor, and keeping the rest.

for their own slaves. Thus was Europe delivered for the present from the Turks; but the time is drawing near, when we shall see them, through the indolence of the emperors and cowardice of the Greeks, firmly established on this side of the freights, to the utter ruin of the empire.

The unhappy emperor was soon after involved in far greater troubles: Michael, his eldest son and colleague in the empire, had two sons, Andronicus and Manuel, of whom the former was greatly beloved by his grandfather Andronicus, though a youth of a most untractable temper, debauched, dissolute, and abandoned to all manner of wickedness. Being greatly addicted to women, and suspecting he had some rival in the affections of his favourite mistresses, he charged certain ruffians to watch her one night, and dispatch the perfon that should come to visit her. It unluckily happened, that Manuel came that very night, with little or no attendance, to the house, in quest of his brother. The assassins, not knowing him in the dark, mistook him for the prince’s rival, and falling upon him, gave him several mortal wounds, of which he died a few days after. When news of his death was brought to the emperor Michael his father, the good prince was so affected with it, that he died soon after of grief. The grandfather Andronicus, notwithstanding his deep concern for the death of Manuel, still continued to cherish and favour Andronicus, who, answering his kindnesfs with the utmost ingratitude, contracted an intimate friendship with Syrgiannes, John Cantacuzenus, Theodorus Synadenus, and Alexius Apocaus, all perfons disaffected to the emperor, and ready to lay hold of the first opportunity that offered to raise disturbances in the empire. As they were men of uncommon parts and great experience in affairs of state, they soon gained an ascendant over the young prince, and finding him a subject proper for their designs, they inspired him with a thirst after power, and an utter aversion to the aged emperor his grandfather. The court being thus rent into two opposite factions, that of the young prince grew daily more powerful. The emperor did all that lay in his power to reclaim him; but his endeavours proving, to his great grief, unsuccessful, he resolved in the end publicly to reprove him before the patriarch and the chief of the nobility.

bility. The prince, receiving timely intimation of his grandfather’s design, went, when sent for, to the palace, attended by a great number of his followers and partizans, with arms under their garments, ready, if any violence was offered to the young prince, to rush upon the aged emperor with their drawn swords, and, dispatching him, proclaim Andronicus emperor in his room. But the emperor, who was passionately fond of him, reproved the youth in a tender and affectionate manner, that, bursting into tears, he fell at the grandfather’s feet, and promised an entire submission for the future. The grandfather, on his side, embracing him with paternal affection, promised to appoint him his heir, and name him for his successor in the empire. Thus they parted, thoroughly reconciled; but this reconciliation was short-lived, for the prince, returning to his favourite counsellors and companions, soon fell from the resolution he had taken, and began to entertain the same ambitious thoughts he had done before. Hereupon the emperor, perceiving he was become irreclaimable, resolved to secure him, and by that means prevent the disturbances, in which he foreflew the state would be otherwise unavoidably involved. This resolution was communicated by the emperor to Gerafimus the patriarch, and by him scandalously betrayed to the prince, who thereupon fled with his accomplices and partizans the very night he was to have been apprehended, and escaped to Adrianople. The emperor, upon the first notice of his flight, caused him to be declared a public enemy, proscribed all his adherents, and obliged the inhabitants of Constantinople, whose fidelity he suspected, to renew their oath of allegiance. On the other hand, the prince, arriving at Adrianople, was there acknowledged for emperor by Syrgiannes, Cantacuzenus, and the other officers, who commanded the troops quartered in Thrace; so that, finding himself in a few days at the head of a considerable army, he detached a strong body of horse and foot to attempt, under the conduct of Syrgiannes, Constantinople itself, before the citizens could put themselves in a posture of defence. The emperor, alarmed at their approach, dispatched Theoleptus, bishop of Philadelphia, with other persons of distinction, to the young prince, then encamped at Orestias, with proposals for an accommodation; which, after a warm and long debate, was concluded on the following terms; that the empire should be divided, and the prince have Thrace, from Christopolis to Rhegium, and the suburbs of Constantinople, for his share; that his followers should enjoy, without without molestation, the lands and honours he had conferred upon them; and that, on the other hand, the emperor should retain Constantinople, with all the cities and islands in the east, and in the west the whole country lying between Christopolis and Dyrhachium. In the mean time, the Turks, taking advantage of these intestine broils, enlarged their dominions in Asia, and reduced most places on the Meander, and among the rest the strong and important city of Prusa in Bithynia. Othoman had some years before attempted to take it by storm; but being repulsed with great loss, he had built two strong castles at a small distance from the city, and left in them numerous garrisons, under the command of two of his best generals, Acemur and Balabanzuch, who, by cutting off all communication between the place and the neighbouring country, reduced the inhabitants and the garrison to such straights, that great numbers of them dying for want of necessaries, the rest, despairing of relief, were in the end obliged to capitulate, and submit to Orchanes, the son of Othoman, who was then indisposed, on the following terms; that the inhabitants and garrison should be allowed to retire unmolested whither they pleased, and to take with them all the effects they could carry on their backs. These two articles were faithfully observed by Orchanes, who, entering Prusa, took possession of that important place in the year 1327, and, upon the death of his father Othoman, chose it for the seat of the Turkish empire. To return to Andronicus: the agreement between him and his grandson was but short-lived; for Syrgiannes, who had first advised the young prince to revolt, not thinking his services sufficiently rewarded, wrote letters full of submission to the emperor, and, upon promise of impunity, withdrew privately from the army in Thrace, and repaired to Constantinople, where he incensed the emperor against his grandson to such a degree, that the war was renewed on both sides. Constantine, the emperor's son, was sent with a considerable army to Thessalonica, to take upon him there the government of Macedonia, and to invade from thence the territories lately yielded to the prince, while Syrgiannes, at the head of a body of Turks, who had entered into the emperor's service, reduced that part of Thrace, which lay next to Constantinople. Against Syrgiannes the prince dispatched Synadenus, an officer of great reputation in war; but marched in person against his uncle Constantine, being highly provoked against him for having seized on his mother Xenie, and sent her prisoner.

The prince of Constantinople. Constantine gained several advantages over him; which reduced him to great frights: but the prince having caused a report to be spread abroad, that his grandfather was dead, Constantine was so alarmed at that unexpected news, to which he gave entire credit, that he retired in the utmost consternation to Thessalonica. He had not been long in that city, when he was informed, that the emperor was alive; and soon after received letters from him, with orders to apprehend twenty-five of the chief citizens, suspected of maintaining a private correspondence with the prince, and send them in chains to Constantinople. The letters were delivered to Constantine with the utmost secrecy; but the citizens nevertheless, receiving timely intimation of the danger that threatened them, stirred up the populace; who, seizing on Constantine, delivered him up to his nephew, by whom he was kept closely confined as long as he lived. At the same time, the Turks under Syrgiannes, quitting the emperor's service, retired home; which obliged that general to return in great haste to Constantinople. Upon his retreat, Synadenus reduced several places in Thrace, and threatened with a siege the imperial city itself; which so alarmed the emperor, that he released Xene, and sent her to her son, then encamped at Rheidium, with proposals for an accommodation; which were readily embraced by the prince, the emperor promising to take him for his colleague in the empire, and to cause him to be solemnly crowned, with his wife Ann of Savoy, whom he had lately married upon the death of Irene his first wife. The ceremony was accordingly performed in the church of St. Sophia with the utmost magnificence; but the prince, prompted by his ambition, and impatient of a colleague, resolved soon after to remove his aged grandfather, that he might reign without control. With this view he entered into an alliance with Michael prince of Bulgaria, his brother-in-law, who was to make a diversion in Servia, if the prince of that country should move, as it was suspected he would do, to the assistance of the emperor. After this, the prince, withdrawing privately from Constantinople, seized on the public revenue in Thrace; of which the emperor receiving intelligence, refused to admit him on his return into the imperial city, ordering at the same time his lieutenants in Macedon and the neighbouring provinces to act against him, as a public enemy. The prince, in the mean time, by pretending a great readiness to comply in any thing reasonable with the emperor, gained the affections of the people to such a degree, that they could fear be restrained. restrained in Constantinople itself, from openly declaring in his favour. Hereupon the emperor, to estrange from him the minds of the multitude, having summoned the patriarch and the chief of the clergy, ordered them to declare him unworthy of the empire, and exclude him from the communion of the faithful. To this moit of them consented, and agreed that his name should be omitted in the public prayers of the church; but the patriarch and some others, who privately favoured him, summoning the people together, pronounced sentence of excommunication against such as should presume to omit the name of the young prince in their public prayers; which provoked the emperor to such a degree, that he caused the patriarch to be deposed, and confined him to the monastery of Mangana. The prince, who was then at Rhegium, being informed of what had passed in the metropolis, approached it with thirteen hundred chosen men, and leaving his army at some distance, rode up, with Cantacuzenus and a guard of thirty soldiers, to one of the gates, desiring to be admitted, and allowed to confer with his grandfather. The emperor, acquainted with his demand by Phocas Maroles, who commanded the guards on the walls, sent him by the same officer orders to retire forthwith, without attempting to debauch his subjects, on pain of being treated as a public enemy; nay, some reviled him from the walls with most bitter language: upon which the young prince, after having solemnly declared, that he desired nothing so much as to be reconciled to his grandfather, whom he charged with all the calamities that were to follow, retired to Selymbria, and from thence into Macedonia, where he took, almost without opposition, several castles and strong-holds; and then marched to Thessalonica, being invited thither by his friends, who, at his approach, opened the gates to him, and joined him in reducing the citadel, which made a vigorous resistance, but was in the end obliged to submit, the prince having surprised and cut off a body of three hundred chosen men, sent by the emperor to reinforce the garrison. The emperor, alarmed at the progress of his grandson's arms, applied to the king of Bulgaria for assistance, who immediately dispatched a considerable body of forces to his relief; but the prince, having in the mean time defeated the emperor's army on the banks of the Mates, advanced with long marches to Constantinople. However, three thousand Bulgarian horse reached the imperial city before him, to the great joy of the emperor, who nevertheless, disquitting foreign troops, from whom the empire had already suffered unspeakable calamities, admitted only their commander in chief and a small number of officers into the city, assigning to the rest quarters in the suburbs. As this gave the prince, who arrived soon after, an opportunity of conferring with them, he, by rich presents to their generals, prevailed upon them to return to their own country. The Bulgarians being thus removed, the prince prepared for the siege of Constantinople; but in the mean time, two of the soldiers, who were appointed to guard the walls, coming to the prince in the dead of the night, offered to betray the city into his hands; and accordingly, being encouraged by him with the promise of a reward answerable to that important service, they returned into the city undiscovered; and the following night, while the rest of the guard were intoxicated with wine, with which they had supplied them in great plenty, they drew up by ladders of ropes about eighteen men, who, breaking open that which was called the Roman gate, opened an entrance for the young prince and his whole army. When day appeared, the inhabitants were so far from making any opposition, that, on the contrary, with loud acclamations they saluted young Andronicus emperor Gregoras, tho' greatly biased in favour of the old emperor, and not a little prejudiced against young Andronicus, tells us, that the prince, ascribing the success that had attended his arms ever since the beginning of the war to Heaven, upon his entering the city, issued orders, forbidding on pain of death any of his officers or soldiers to offer the least affront or injury to the emperor his grand-father. The same writer adds, that he went immediately to wait on the emperor in person, and was so affected with the speech, which the unfortunate prince made him, that falling at his feet, he tenderly embraced, and, with words full of duty and respect, endeavoured to comfort the emperor in his greatest distress. After this, he returned solemn thanks to Heaven, for having thus put an end to the war almost without bloodshed; and then, repairing to the monastery of Mangana, he reconducted the patriarch in a kind of triumph to the church, and restored him to his former dignity. Young Andronicus, now master of the imperial city, and universally acknowledged and obeyed as emperor, suffered his grandfather to continue in the palace, and wear the ensigns of majesty; but would not allow him the least share in the administration, which he took entirely into his own hands, governing with an an absolute sway, without so much as consulting the aged emperor in what related to public affairs. He allowed him yearly twenty-four thousand pieces of gold for his maintenance, and the imperial palace for his habitation, while he himself resided in that of the depot Demetrius. He granted a general pardon to all those who had adhered to his grandfather, and even preferred some of his chief favourites to the first employments in the state.

In the very beginning of his reign, the king of Bulgaria, entering Thrace at the head of a numerous army, confounding partly of Bulgarians, and partly of Scythians, plundered several cities, and laid waste the whole country. Andronicus, having with incredible expedition drawn together a considerable army, appeared unexpectedly at Byzantium, in the neighbourhood of which city the king of Bulgaria lay encamped. His sudden arrival struck the enemy with such terror, that the following night they decamped, and fled back into their own country, leaving behind them great part of the booty. Andronicus pursued them, and carrying the war into Bulgaria, ravaged the country far and near, destroying all with fire and sword, till the king, not daring to venture an engagement, tho' at the head of a very powerful and numerous army, sent embassadors to sue for a peace; which, after several conferences, was concluded upon terms highly honourable to Andronicus. After this, the two princes had an interview on horseback, when they confirmed the treaty, and renewed their ancient friendship, which they agreed to cultivate by meeting yearly in such places as should be most convenient for both.

The emperor, having nothing to fear from that quarter, turned his arms against the Turks, who, taking the advantage of domestic quarrels among the Greek princes, had greatly enlarged their dominions in Asia. Othoman, whom we may justly style the founder of the Turkish empire, being lately dead, the emperor laid hold of that opportunity to recover several places, which that warlike prince had reduced, and among the rest the famous city of Nice, with a strong castle on the Sangarius, which commanded the passes leading into Bithynia. This castle, however, was soon after retaken by Urchan or Orchanes, son and successor of Othoman, who, having happily settled his affairs at home, raised a formidable army, and entering Bithynia as soon as the emperor had left that country, made himself master of several places there, and at last sat down before Nice. The emperor, who was then at Constantinople, leaving the imperial city, hastened back into Asia; and advancing as far as Philocrene, encamped there at a small distance from the Turks; who, after having harassed his men with frequent skirmishes, and sudden onsets, fell upon him at length with their whole army. Hereupon a battle ensued, in which both sides behaved with great bravery and resolution; but in the end, the emperor being wounded in the foot with an arrow and obliged to withdraw, his troops, no longer animated with his example, retired in the utmost confusion to their camp. As the emperor had removed to Philocrene, to have his wound dressed there, a report was spread in the camp, that he was killed; which so disheartened his men, that they betook themselves to a precipitous flight, leaving their camp, arms, and baggage, to the enemy, who, after having pursued them for some time with great slaughter, seized on the rich booty which they had left, and amongst other things, on all the emperor's plate and furniture. Andronicus, quite despaired of at this misfortune, returned to Constantinople, while the Turks, having now no enemy to contend with, made themselves masters of all the maritime towns in Bithynia, and in the end of Nice itself, by the following stratagem: Andronicus, in leaving Asia, had promised to reinforce the garrison of Nice with a thousand horse; Orchanes, being informed of this, armed the like number of his own men after the Roman manner, and marching with them in person through by-ways into the road leading from Constantinople, dispatched three hundred more, armed like Turks, to ravage the country within view of the city. As he approached the place, he pretended all on a sudden to have discovered the enemy; and leading his men against the foragers, put them to flight, and recovered the booty. As this was done in the sight of the citizens, who from the walls beheld the whole, the pretended Romans, were received with great joy by the inhabitants; but the gates were no sooner opened, than they fell sword in hand upon the guard, and being joined by the three hundred, who were returned from their pretended flight, they cut the garrison in pieces, and made themselves masters of the city. After this, Orchanes, leading his men to the sea-side, laid siege to Abydos; which was betrayed to him by the governor's daughter, while his two sons, Solyman and Amurat, reduced several other important places in Asia, and among the rest the ancient city of Nicomedia. As the emperor was at this time time seized with a dangerous malady, in which his life was despaired of, the court was in too great a confusion to think of the proper measures for putting a stop to the conquests of the Turks in Asia. Such as had been instrumental in the late revolution could not reflect, without dread and horror, on the condition to which they must inevitably be reduced, if the young emperor should die, and his grandfather be restored to his power and authority. This consideration prompted Cantacuzenus and some others, if Gregoras is to be credited, to resolve on the old emperor’s death; but this resolution being generally disapproved, they all agreed at last to confine him to a monastery, and force him to take the monastic habit, and exchange the name of Andronicus for that of Antony; which was done accordingly. Thus Gregoras says. But Cantacuzenus tells us, that the old emperor, apprehending a more severe usage from his enemies, if his grandson should die, retired to a monastery of his own accord, and, taking the monastic habit, continued there unmolested to his death, which happened two years after, that is, in 1332, he being then in the seventy-second year of his age. Young Andronicus intended, during his malady, to restore the crown to his grandfather; but, upon his recovery, he suffered him to continue in the monastery, retaining the whole power to himself. In the mean time, the Turks pursued their conquests in Asia, and threatened Europe itself with an invasion. As the emperor was no ways in a condition to oppose so powerful and formidable an enemy, he was persuaded by Cantacuzenus to conclude a dishonourable peace with them, in virtue of which they were to hold all the places and countries they had conquered in Asia, and suffer the Romans peaceably to enjoy what they had not yet wrested from them. Not long after the inhabitants of Thessaly revolting, the emperor marched against them in person; but while he was employed in reducing them, the Turks, who observed the peace no longer than it suited their interest, passed over into Europe; and having ravaged the sea-coast, repassed the straights with an immense booty, and a great number of captives. Andronicus died soon after, in the forty-fifth year of his age, the thirteenth of his reign, reckoning from the time he deposed his grandfather, and 1341st of the Christian era. Cantacuzenus, in the history he has left us, endeavours to justify his conduct towards his grandfather. The old emperor designed, as that writer pretends, to have excluded him from

from the succession, it was no more than the debauched life he then led well deserved. Gregorius, on the other hand, lays the whole blame on young Andronicus, and will not allow that the old emperor gave his grandson the least provocation. All the disorders in the state were owing, according to him, to the unbounded ambition of the youth, and the evil counsels of Cantacuzenus and his favourites. But, after all, we cannot help concluding, that if the grandfather was to blame, the grandson was altogether inexcusable. Andronicus the younger left two sons, John and Manuel, of whom the eldest was, upon his father's death, declared emperor; but as he was then only nine years old, John Cantacuzenus was appointed his guardian, and protector of the empire, during his minority. Cantacuzenus governed with great equity and moderation, took particular care of the education of the young prince and his brother, provided, as far as the weak condition of the empire would allow him, for the security of the provinces; and in short, omitted nothing that could be expected from a faithful, zealous, and disinterested minister. But as he had been declared guardian to the young prince against the will and approbation of John the patriarch, who thought that office belonged to him, and claimed a share in the administration, the ambitious prelate did all that lay in his power to render him suspected to the empress Anne, representing him as one who had nothing left in view than the imperial dignity. As the patriarch was in great credit with the empress, Cantacuzenus, apprehending he might in the end gain the ascendant over her to his utter ruin, was for resigning his charge, and earnestly pressed the empress for leave to retire; but the refusing to comply with his request, and assuring him, that she was fully convinced of his integrity, and consequently determined to shut her ears against the unjust calumnies and malicious informations of his enemies, he was prevailed upon to continue in the administration. However, the patriarch, and his faction at court, which was very powerful, by continually alarming the princes with the dangers she was to apprehend from the protector, and misconstruing all his actions, prevailed upon her at length to take such meafures, as involved the empire in a civil war; for giving entire credit to the malicious insinuations of the patriarch, who conjured her with tears in his eyes to provide for her own safety and that of her children, against the wicked designs of the protector, she began to look upon him as an enemy to herself and her family; and having caused some of his friends and relations to be apprehended, while he was absent at Didymothicum, he sent him orders to resign his office forthwith, and retire to a private life; which he refusing to do, till he had an opportunity of justifying his conduct, and convincing the world of his innocence, the empress, at the instigation of the patriarch, declared him a public enemy and traitor. Cantacuzenus, now apprized, that his enemies aimed at nothing less than his utter destruction, thought it high time to provide for his own safety. Being then at the head of a powerful army, which he had raised to oppose the Servians, who, upon the emperor’s death, had broken into the empire, and having with him several persons of the greatest authority in the empire, who all advised him to assume the purple, as the only means of defeating the designs of his enemies, he hearkened to their advice, and suffered himself to be proclaimed emperor at Didymothicum in 1342, the second year of his administration. When news of his revolt was brought to Constantinople, his mother and the rest of his friends and relations in the city were immediately apprehended, and thrown into prison, his estate was confiscated, and troops levied to suppress the rebellion in its birth. Thus Cantacuzenus himself in his history; and with him most other historians agree, laying the whole blame on the patriarch and his faction, who, in a manner, forced the persecuted minister to take arms in his own defence. Having thus assumed the purple, he acquainted the nobility and soldiery in a long speech with the motives that had prompted him to take that step, which, he said, the malice of his enemies had rendered necessary. He then gave leave to all those, whose friends and relations were at Constantinople, to depart, left, by continuing with him, they should occasion the ruin of their innocent friends. The rest of the army declaring themselves ready to stand by him to the last, he advanced to Adrianople, the inhabitants of which city had seized on all those whom they suspected to favour him, and sent them in chains to Constantinople. On his march he was informed, that a numerous body of Bulgarians were advancing to join the imperial troops, and fall upon him with their united forces. This obliged him to lay aside the design he had formed against Adrianople, and retire to the sea-side, that he might with more ease receive supplies from the Turks in Asia, with whom he had entered into an alliance.

upon his first assuming the imperial dignity. Tho' they offered him large supplies, yet he did not think fit to accept them, till he had tried all possible means for bringing about an accommodation. With this view he wrote to the patriarch, exhorting him to peace and concord; but the messenger who brought the letters was seized, and thrown into prison, Cantacuzenus was declared anew a public enemy, and such of his relations, as had not the good luck to make their escape, were treated with the utmost cruelty. His mother was delivered up to Apocaucus, his most inveterate enemy, who treated her with the utmost barbarity, telling her sometimes, that her son was taken prisoner; at others, that he was killed in an engagement, and his head was brought to Constantinople. Her concern and the cruel usage she met with, having thrown her into a violent fever, Apocaucus would suffer no physician to attend her, till the empress, hearing the danger she was in, and pitying her condition, recommended her to her own physicians, who nevertheless were not admitted by the patriarch and Apocaucus to visit her, till they had solemnly sworn not to administer any remedy to her that might relieve her. Being thus destitute of all help, and daily insulted by her enemies, she died soon after, to the great grief of the empress, who, being informed of the unspeakable miseries she had undergone, and on that account highly provoked against the patriarch and Apocaucus, obliged them to send deputies to Cantacuzenus with overtures for an accommodation; but the deputies, who were their creatures, returning, told the empress, that Cantacuzenus would hear no terms; that he was obstinately bent upon war, and determined not to lay down his arms, till he had accomplished the ruin of her two sons and the whole imperial family. A war being therefore resolved on, Andronicus and Thomas Palaeologi were appointed to command the land-forces, which were to march into Thrace, of which country most cities had declared for Cantacuzenus. At the same time a fleet, consisting of sixty galleys, was equipped, to prevent the Turks from supplying the enemy with men or provisions. Of this fleet Apocaucus took upon himself the command; and having driven back the Turks, attempting to cross the strights and succour their ally, reduced Cantacuzenus, who was at the same time warmly pressed by the land-forces under the conduct of the two above-mentioned Palæologi, to such straits, that he was forced to quit Thrace and take refuge in the dominions of Crales, prince of Moesia, who received received him with the greatest demonstrations of esteem and affection, and sent him back at the head of a powerful army, with which he gained several considerable advantages over the emperor's forces, and made himself master of the greater part of Thrace. Hercupon his enemies, finding they could not suppress him by force, had recourse to treachery, and, with mighty promises, prevailed upon one Monomachus to try whether he could dispatch him with poison. Accordingly Monomachus, repairing to his camp at Selymbria, the better to compass his wicked purpose, owned the errand on which he was come; but pretending to be touched with remorse, he fell down at his feet, and delivered to him the poison, which he was to have administered. Cantacuzenus received him in a most obliging manner, loaded him with presents, and taking him into his favour, reproved so great a trust in him, that the traitor would have soon found an opportunity of putting his design in execution, without incurring the least suspicion, had not Cantacuzenus been privately warned by his friends at Constantinople to be upon his guard. In the mean time Cantacuzenus, having made himself master of all Macedon and Thrace, approached the imperial city, with a design to reduce it, either by force or famine; but he had not been long before it, when several citizens, apprehending the calamities attending a long siege, resolved to prevent them, by admitting him privately into the city. Accordingly, having first acquainted him with their design, they fell in the night upon the guards, and making themselves masters of one of the gates, admitted him and the whole army, saluting him, as he entered, with the title of emperor. They were joined by the generality of the people, who, flocking from all quarters of the city, attended him with loud shouts to the forum. As for the empress, she continued in the palace, which she seemed determined to defend to the last extremity, having a considerable body of troops at her devotion; but the young emperor earnestly entreats her not to expose herself and him to the fury of the incensed multitude, she was in the end prevailed upon to hearken to accommodation, which was happily brought about upon the following terms: viz. that Cantacuzenus should be declared colleague to the young prince, and have the sole administration of affairs for the space of ten years, Palæologus being then but fifteen; that afterwards they should both reign with equal power and authority; and that an act of oblivion should pass on both sides. This agreement being signed and sworn to by Cantacuzenus, Palæologus, and the empress Ann, and crowned emperor. on the eighth of February 1347, the new emperor was received the same day into the palace, and soon after crowned with the usual solemnity by Isidore, the new patriarch of Constantinople, John his predecessor being deposed, and sent into banishment. That the union between the two princes might be better settled and more lasting, Cantacuzenus gave his daughter Helena in marriage to young Palæologus, and caused her to be likewise crowned, and acknowledged empress by the nobility and people. As Cantacuzenus had been powerfully assisted by Orchanes the Turkish sultan, who had even married his daughter, he could not help entertaining a friendly correspondence with that prince; which gave great offence to the clergy and some zealous christians, who, by exclaiming against the strict an alliance and intimacy between a christian and a Mohammedan prince, estranged the minds of the multitude from Cantacuzenus; which proved very prejudicial to his affairs. However, he governed the empire for the space of ten years with such equity and moderation, that even his most inveterate enemies could lay nothing to his charge. In the sixth year of his administration, the Genoese of Galata, who were become very powerful, provoked at the emperor's refusing them leave to enlarge their city, set fire to several buildings in the suburbs of Constantinople, seized on all the emperor's ships then riding in the harbour, and made open war on the empire, in which they gained several advantages at sea, and made themselves masters of some islands in the Archipelago, which the emperor was obliged to yield to them. When Palæologus came to govern jointly with him, Crales king of the Servians, highly provoked against Cantacuzenus, for having obliged him to restore some cities, which he had seized during the late troubles, gained over with rich presents several persons of distinction, who, by intimating to the young emperor, that Cantacuzenus designed to confine him to a monastery, to usurp the whole power, and transmit the sovereignty to his posterity, raised a difference between the two princes, which soon after broke out into an open war, Palæologus being on one hand assisted by Crales king of Servia and Alexander prince of Bulgaria: and Cantacuzenus on the other hand by Orchanes the Turkish sultan. In a battle which was fought in Thrace, the young emperor's army was utterly defeated, and he himself obliged to take refuge in Constantinople; all the other cities in Thrace having opened

ed their gates to the conqueror. However, not long after, a peace was concluded between the two princes; which was no sooner signed, than Cantacuzenus, devesting himself, by a voluntary refiguration, of all his power, retired to the monastery of Mangana, and there took the monastic habit. But his son Matthew, whom he had some time before declared emperor, pursued the war, and seized on several cities in Thrace, and among the rest on Adrianople. Against him Palæologus marched in person; and having utterly defeated his army, tho’ reinforced before the battle with five thousand Turks sent by Orchanes, obliged him to quit the field, and take refuge in one of his strong-holds; whence while he was making his escape at the approach of the emperor’s army, he was besieged by one Boienas, and delivered up to Palæologus, who, upon his renouncing all claim to the empire, restored him to his liberty.

During these civil commotions, the Turks, under the conduct of Solyman, the son, or, as others will have it, the brother of Orchanes, passed the Hellepont, and having seized on a strong castle called Coiridocuftron, marched from thence against Gallipolis, which Solyman took, after having defeated the governor of the place, who came out with the garrison to offer him battle. Thus the Turks, having reduced all Asia, first settled in Europe, where they have continued ever since. This happened in the year 1357, Orchanes dying soon after, Amurath his son and successor pursed the conquests, which Solyman had begun; and having made himself master of several strong-holds in Thrace, laid siege at length to Adrianople, which was forced to submit, the emperor not being in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy. Amurath, having in a short time mastered all Thrace, made Adrianople the seat of his empire in Europe, as the most proper place for the enlarging his dominions, and extending his conquests to Greece and the neighbouring provinces. In the mean time, Andronicus, the emperor’s eldest son, having conspired against his father, was by his orders deprived of his sight, and kept under close confinement. Ducas the historian tells us, that Andronicus and Cantuzes, Amurath’s younger son, having contracted an intimate friendship, conspired the death of their fathers, binding themselves by mutual oaths to live in amity and friendship, when the one should be emperor, and the other sultan. The same writer adds, that the conspiracy being discovered

discovered to Amurath, he ordered his own son's eyes to be pulled out, and required the emperor to inflict the same punishment on his son, threatening him with a war, if he refused to comply. The emperor, dreading the power of the sultan, caused the eyes both of his son and grandson, who was yet an infant, to be pulled out, declaring at the same time his second son Manuel his colleague in the empire. Andronicus, however, after two years confinement, made his escape, being favoured therein by the Genoese of Galata, with whose assistance he made war upon his father; and being admitted into Constantinople, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor; and having got his father and two brothers, Manuel and Theodorus, into his power, he confined them to the same prison in which he had been detained; but they having likewise, after two years, made their escape, Andronicus, dreading the calamities of a civil war, while the Turks were ready to fall upon the few countries that were still left to the empire, restored his father and brother to the throne, who thereupon gave him Selymbria, and several other places in that neighbourhood. In the meantime Amurath, the Turkish sultan being treacherously slain, his son Bajazet succeeded him in his dominions; and pursuing the conquests which had been so successfully carried on by his predecessors in Europe, made himself master of Thessaly, Macedon, Phocis, Peloponnesus, Mydia, and Bulgaria, driving out the despots, or petty princes, who held those countries. Elated with his frequent victories, he began to look upon the Greek emperor, to whom nothing was now left but Constantinople and the neighbouring country, as his vassal, and accordingly sent him an arrogant and haughty message, requiring, or rather commanding, him to pay him a yearly tribute, and send him his son Manuel, to attend him in his military expeditions. With this dishonourable demand the emperor was obliged to comply, being no-ways in a condition to oppose so powerful and formidable an enemy. The unhappy prince died soon after, that is, in 1392, the thirty-seventh of his reign, leaving no son behind him but Manuel, the other two, Andronicus and Theodore, being dead some time before. Manuel, who was then in Bajazet's court, hearing of his father's death, hastened to Constantinople, without taking his leave of the sultan, or acquainting him with the motives of his sudden departure; which Bajazet, highly resenting, punished the officers who had suffered him to escape with the utmost severity; and passing with great expedition out of Bithynia, where he then was, into Thrace, destroyed by fire and sword the country adjoining to Constantinople, and, after having reduced the neighbouring towns, invested the imperial city itself both by sea and land. In this extremity Manuel had recourse to the western princes, who having raised an army 130,000 strong, sent it to his relief, under the conduct of Sigismund king of Hungary and John count of Nevers. The western troops were at first attended with good success; for entering the countries lately subdued by the sultan, they recovered Widin, and several other places of great importance in Bulgaria, and invested Nicopolis. Hereupon Bajazet, raising the siege of Constantinople, marched, with all the forces he could assemble, to relieve the place. Upon his approach, Sigismund, leaving part of the army to pursue the siege, marched with the rest to meet the enemy. Hereupon an engagement ensued, in which great numbers fell on both sides, and the victory continued long doubtful. At length, the French cavalry having dismounted to fight on foot, the rest of the army observing the horses without their riders, and concluding from thence they were all cut in pieces, began to give ground, and retire to their camp. This gave new courage and vigour to the enemy, who making an utmost effort, and charging the christians in their retreat with incredible fury, broke their ranks, and obliged them to fly in great confusion. The Turks pursued them to their camp, which they took with all their baggage, and an incredible number of prisoners, among whom was the count of Nevers, and three hundred officers of distinction, who were all, except the count himself and five more, put to death in Bajazet’s presence, after having been insulted by him in a most outrageous manner.

As for Sigismund, he had the good luck to make his escape, and crossing the Danube in a small boat, to get safe to his own dominions. This memorable battle, in which 20,000 christians were slain, and a far greater number taken prisoners, was fought in the second year of Manuel’s reign, and 1393d of the christians æra n. After this victory, Bajazet returned to the siege of Constantinople; but finding the citizens determined to defend themselves to the last extremity, he applied to John the son of Andronicus, to whom, as we have observed above, the emperor had yielded the town of Selymbria. With him he entered into a private agreement, in virtue of which

which Bajazet was to place him upon the throne, to which he had a just claim, as being the son of Manuel's elder brother. On the other hand, John was to yield the city of Constantinople to Bajazet, and remove the imperial seat to Peloponnese, which the sultan promised to relinquish to him and his posterity. This agreement being privately signed and sworn to by both parties, Bajazet dispatched deputies to the inhabitants of Constantinople, offering to withdraw his army, and abstain from all hostilities, provided they would drive out Manuel, and place his nephew John on the throne, to which he had an unquestionable right. This politic proposal rent the whole city into two factions, some favouring Manuel, and others declaring for his nephew. Of this the emperor being apprized, and apprehensive of the evils attending a civil discord at so critical a conjunction, he acquainted his nephew, then in the Turkish camp, that, to deliver his subjects from the calamities under which they groaned, he was ready to resign the sovereignty to him, on condition he was allowed to depart with his wife and children, and to convey himself by sea to whatever place he should think fit. With this condition John readily complied, and Manuel, having received him into the city, and conducted him to the palace, embarked on board a galley, and set sail for Venice, where he landed, and from thence went to the several courts of the Christian princes, to sollicit aid against the overgrown power of the Turks, now become formidable to all Europe. He was everywhere received with the greatest demonstrations of esteem, and promised large supplies, all Christendom being alarmed at the late conquest of the infidels. In the meantime, John being crowned with the usual solemnity, Bajazet took care to put him in mind of their agreement, and press him to a speedy execution of the main article, which was to yield Constantinople to him, and retire to Peloponnese or Morea; but the citizens refusing, notwithstanding the unspeakable hardships they suffered, to comply with such a scandalous treaty, Bajazet renewed the siege, and assaulted the city with more fury than ever. When he had already reduced it to the utmost extremity, news was brought him, that Tamerlane the victorious Tartar, after having subdued Persia and the more easterly provinces, had turned his arms against him, and was preparing, with a numerous and formidable army, to break into Syria. Hereupon, alarmed at the danger that threatened him, he in great haste raised the siege, and passing the Hellespont, marched with the utmost expedition to Pruth, which he had appointed the place of the general rendezvous, both both for his eastern and western forces. From Prusa he advanced, at the head of a very numerous and well-disciplined army, to meet Tamerlane, who gave him a total overthrow in the plains of Angoria in Galatia, on the twenty-eighth of July 1401, cut most of his men in pieces, and having taken the sultan himself prisoner, to punish his excessive pride, cruelty, and arrogance, shut him up in an iron cage, against which he is said to have dashed out his brains the year following, tho' some ascribe his death to poison, as we shall relate more at length elsewhere. Manuel was no sooner informed of the overthrow and captivity of his inveterate enemy Bajazet, than he returned to Constantinople, where he was received with loud acclamations by the people, who being highly provoked against John for his servile compliance with the Turks, drove him from the throne, and restored Manuel, by whom he was banished to the island of Lesbos. This great overthrow of the Turks had like to have occasioned the total dissolution of their empire, both in Europe and Asia; for the five sons of Bajazet, taking arms against each other, a civil war was kindled, and continued with great fury for ten years together. Ha-Zelebis, Bajazet's third son, upon his father's death, caused himself to be proclaimed sultan; but was soon driven from the throne by his brother Solyman, as was Solyman by his brother Musa. At length Mohammed, Bajazet's youngest son, having overcome all his competitors, was universally acknowledged sultan, and the sole monarch of the Turks. The emperor Manuel in the mean time, taking advantage of these intestine divisions, and finding sometimes with one of the competitors, and sometimes with another, recovered several provinces, which Mohammed, whom he had assisted against his brother Musa, suffered him peaceably to enjoy till his death, which happened in 1424, the seventy-fifth year of his age, and thirty-seventh of his reign. Some authors write, that he resigned the empire to his son John Palæologus five years before his death, and retiring to a monastery, took the monastic habit, with the name of Antony. Be that as it will, he was succeeded by his son John, in whose reign Amurath II. the son and successor of Mohammed, recovered all the provinces which had been seized after the death of Bajazet by the emperor and the other Christian princes. In the beginning of his reign he laid siege to Constantinople, being provoked against the emperor for espousing the cause of an impostor, who, pretending to be Mustapha the son of Bajazet, jazet, was acknowledged for sultan in all the provinces of the Turkish empire in Europe. The citizens defended themselves with great bravery; but, being harassed with continual at-faults, must have in the end submitted, had not the emperor prevailed upon the prince of Caramania to countenance another Mustapha, Amurath’s younger brother, who, having revolted in Asia, was, with the supplies sent him by his new ally, enabled to lay siege to the city of Nice, which he soon reduced.

This obliged Amurath to raise the siege of Constantinople, and march with all his forces against the usurper, who was betrayed and delivered up to him by one Itras, in whom he reposed great confidence. Amurath, having got him into his power, caused him to be immediately strangled with a bow-string; and then turning his arms against the prince of Caramania, obliged him to sue for peace; which the sultan granted him upon what terms he thought proper to prescribe.
Having now no other enemies to contend with, he entered Macedon at the head of a powerful army, and having ravaged the country far and near, laid siege to Thessalonica, which he took, and plundered with the utmost cruelty, as he did most of the cities of Aetolia, Phocis, and Boeotia. From Greece he marched into Servia, which country he soon reduced; and then breaking into the dominions of the king of Hungary, besieged the strong city of Belgrade, which made a vigorous defence, no fewer than fifteen thousand Turks being slain by the christians in one sally; which obliged Amurath to drop the enterprize, and retire. In his retreat he was attacked by the celebrated John Hunniades, who cut great numbers of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest to shelter themselves under the walls of Sinderovia. Not long after he gained a still more signal victory over the enemy in the plains of Transilvania, with the loss of no more than three thousand of his own men, whereas twenty thousand Turks were killed on the spot, and almost an equal number in the pursuit. Amurath, who was then at Adrianople, sent another army into Transilvania, far more numerous than the two former; but they were attended with no better successe, being cut off almost to a man by the brave Hungarian.
He gained over the Turks several other no less remarkable victories, and recovered all Bulgaria and Servia; but was in the end overthrown and put to flight by Amurath, in the memorable battle of Verna, fought in the year 1444, the christians being disheartened by the death of Uladilas, king of Hungary, who, while he was attacking the enemy with more courage than prudence, was by them hemmed in on all sides, and cut in pieces. However, Hunniades, having had the good luck to make his escape, and being appointed protector of the kingdom during the minority of Ladislaus, who was chosen king of Hungary in the room of Uladislaus, he raised a considerable army, and advancing to Cossowa, engaged Amurath, who lay encamped there. The battle lasted three days, both armies retiring to their respective camps when night approached, and renewing the fight early next morning. The two first days the Christians had the advantage; but the third day, being quite tired out and overpowered with numbers, Amurath charging them with fresh troops, they were, after a long and vigorous resistance, put to flight and utterly routed. In this memorable battle, which was fought in 1448, thirty-four thousand Turks were slain, and eight thousand Christians, with the flower of the Hungarian nobility. As for Hunniades, he made his escape into Servia, and from thence returned into Hungary. In the meantime, John Paleologus, the Greek emperor, fearing the victorious sultan should turn his arms against him, sent ambassadors to Adrianople, where Amurath then resided, with orders to conclude a peace upon any terms. The sultan received them with great arrogance, declaring he would march directly to Constantinople, unless the emperor yielded to him some strong-holds, which he still possessed on the Euxine sea, and engage to pay him a yearly tribute of three hundred thousand ducats. To these shameful terms the unhappy prince was obliged to submit, in order to enjoy the poor remains of the Roman empire, now reduced to the imperial city and the adjoining country. However, as he did not doubt but Amurath, as soon as he had put an end to the war, in which he was then engaged with George Castriot, surnamed Scanderbeg, prince of Epirus, would, under some pretence or other, attempt Constantinople itself, he applied to the western princes; and the more effectually to engage them in his cause, he promised to do all that lay in his power to reconcile the Greek and Latin churches. Accordingly, hearing a council was to be held at Ferrara, he went thither in person, attended by Joseph the patriarch, a great number of prelates and the flower of the Greek nobility, who were all received at Venice, where they landed, and afterwards at Ferrara, with great pomp and magnificence. From Ferrara the council was removed soon after, by reason of a plague which broke out there, to Florence, where the union was affected between between the two churches, and subscribed to by the patriarch and the other prelates. The patriarch died soon after at Florence; but the emperor and the other prelates, returning by land at the pope's charge to Venice, were conveyed from thence on the galleys of the republic to Constantinople. Upon his return, he found the people highly dissatisfied with his conduct, and that of the bishops, some of whom had refused to subscribe the decrees of the council, till the money was paid down, for which they had before-hand agreed to sign them. The disturbances which this union raised in the church, the death of the empress Despina, and the insupportable arrogance with which the unhappy prince was treated by the sultan, gave him such concern, that, being already broken with age, he sunk under the weight of his calamities and misfortunes in 1448, the twenty-seventh of his reign, leaving the empire, now confined within the walls of Constantinople, to his brother Constantine. Amurath the Turkish sultan, did not long survive him; but dying in the beginning of February 1450, was succeeded by his son Mohammed, who had no sooner taken possession of the throne than he caused all his brothers to be strangled, and ordered his father's lawful wife (for he is said to have been the son of a concubine) to marry a slave, by name Isaac. In the beginning of his reign, he entered into an alliance with Constantine, the Greek emperor, who, upon the first news of his father's death, had sent embassadors to congratulate him upon his accession to the throne. The embassadors were received very graciously, the new sultan declaring, that he had nothing so much at heart as to live in peace and amity with the emperor and the other christian princes. The embassadors of the Walachians, Lesbians, Bulgarians, Rhodians, Servians, &c. were likewise received in a most obliging manner; which encouraged them to celebrate with public rejoicings the accession of Mohammed to the throne, whom they looked upon as a friend to the christians, the more because his mother was of that religion, being, according to the most credible writers, the despot or prince of Servia's daughter. But notwithstanding the friendship and regard he pretended to have for the emperor, he had no sooner put an end to the war with Ibrahim, king of Caramania, who, upon the news of his father's death, had invaded his dominions in Asia, than he began to entertain thoughts of making himself master of Constantinople, and abolishing the very name of the Roman empire. With this view he built on the Europe side of the Bosphorus a strong castle, called by the Turks Genichcar, and by the Greeks Neosaltrum, opposite to another in Asia called Apocaftron, which he caused to be repaired, placing in both strong garrisons. These two castles commanded the strights, and the former, being but five miles from Constantinople, proved a curb upon that city, and kept it in a manner blocked up. Mohammed had no sooner begun the work, than the emperor and the citizens of Constantinople, alarmed at the undertaking, dispatched embassadors to the sultan, with orders to do all that lay in their power to divert him from it. But Mohammed was so far from granting them their request, that tho' the emperor even offered to pay him an annual tribute, provided he put a stop to the work, he threatened, with the utmost arrogance, to cause such as should be sent to him upon the like errand to be fled alive. He added, that nothing beyond the ditches of the city belonged to Constantine, and that he had an unquestionable right to build in his own dominions what castles and forts he pleased. When the fort in the neighbourhood of Constantinople was finished, the garrison left there by the sultan began to ravage the country adjoining to the city, and making excursions to the very gates, returned to their strong-hold loaded with booty. This occasioned several skirmishes between the christians and Turks; in one of which a considerable number of the latter being killed, the sultan, to revenge their death, ordered his men to fall upon the christians, while they were reaping their corn in the open fields, and put them all to the sword, which was done accordingly. Hereupon the emperor, having caused the gates of the city to be shut, ordered all the Turks within the walls to be arrested, but set them at liberty the next day, sending at the same time embassadors to Mohammed, with proposals for concluding a laffing peace between the two crowns. As the sultan seemed averse to an accommodation, and was assembling his forces from all parts, Constantine, well apprised of his design, in the first place took care to fill the public magazines, and supply the city with great plenty of all sorts of provisions; then by his embassadors to the western princes, acquainted them with the designs of the sultan, and the storm that was gathering against the imperial city, the taking of which might prove fatal to all Christen- som. critical a conjunction, he renewed the union of the two churches, and received with extraordinary demonstrations of esteem and respect the pope’s legate, which gave great offence to the ecclesiastics zealously attached to the ceremonies of their ancestors, and occasioned a misunderstanding between the prince and his people. Neither did the emperor’s zeal, in confirming the union, procure him the least assistance from the Latins in the west, who, by a strange infatuation, suffered the city, which they looked upon as the bulwark of Christendom, to fall into the hands of the avowed enemy of the christian name, who, they well knew, would not stop there, but extend his conquests to the neighbouring, and perhaps to the most distant, kingdoms. While Constantinople was soliciting aid from the western princes, Caracia, one of Mohammed’s chief commanders, reduced several places on the Euxine sea, which were still held by the emperor, viz. Mecembria, Acheloun, Bifon, &c. then advancing towards the city, took by assault a strong castle called St. Stephen’s tower, and put the garrison to the sword. Other forts in that neighbourhood submitted at the approach of the enemy; but Schelmoia held out for some time, the inhabitants defending the place with incredible bravery and resolution; but being in the end tired out with repeated assaults, the town was taken, and they all to a man cut in pieces. All the forts, castles, and strong-holds in the neighbourhood of the imperial city being thus reduced, Caracia was ordered to scour the country during the winter, in order to prevent the inhabitants from receiving any supplies of men or provisions; by which means the city was in a manner blocked up by land. But as the Greeks were still masters at sea, their galleys ravaged the coasts of Asia, and returned with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives, who were sold for slaves in Constantinople.

In the mean time, Mohammed, having drawn together from all parts an army of three hundred thousand men, left Adrianople; and bending his march towards the imperial city, encamped before it on the sixth of April 1453, covering with his numerous forces the adjoining plains. His Asiatic troops were posted on the right towards the Bosphorus; those of Europe on the left towards the haven; and he himself, with fifteen thousand janizaries, and other choicest troops, between both, over-against the gate named Karbasi. On the other side of the haven, Zoganus, one of his chief officers.

officers, encamped with a considerable body of troops, in order to cut off all communication between the city and country on that side. At the same time Pantologes, the Turkish admiral, appeared before the haven with a fleet of near three hundred sail; but the emperor had taken care to secure the haven, in which were three large ships, twenty small ones, and a good number of galleys, by means of a chain drawn cross the entrance from the city to Pera. Mohammed having thus assigned to each part of his army their several quarters, and surrounded the city both by sea and land, he began the siege by planting batteries as near the city as he could, and raising mounts in several places as high as the walls themselves; whence the besieged were incessantly galled with showers of arrows. He had in his camp a piece of ordnance of a prodigious size, which carried, according to Ducas, a ball of an hundred pound weight, made of hard black stone brought from the Euxine sea. It had been cast by an Hungarian engineer, who, not meeting with the encouragement he expected from the emperor, had fled over to Mohammed, while he was busied in building the above-mentioned forts. With this vast piece, the enemy made several breaches in the walls, which, however, were with great expedition repaired by the besieged, who behaved with incredible bravery and resolution, being encouraged by the example of the emperor, and directed by John Justiniani, a Genoese adventurer, who arriving before the siege, with two large ships and a considerable number of volunteers on board, had been by the emperor, on account of his extraordinary skill in military affairs, appointed commander in chief of all his forces; and besides, for his farther encouragement, promised the sovereignty of the island of Lesbos, provided he obliged the enemy to raise the siege. That brave commander, animated with the hopes of so great a reward, performed exploits, says our historian, that no-ways biaffed in favour of the Latins, worthy of the most renowned heroes of antiquity. Not satisfied with repulsing the enemy in their frequent assaults, he often sallied out against them at the head of his volunteers, overturned their machines, destroyed their works, and made such a dreadful havoc of their best troops, that his name soon became formidable. But Mohammed, to carry on the siege with more vigour, ordered new levies to be made throughout his extensive dominions; which reinforcements arriving daily from all parts, his army was soon encreased to the number of near four hundred thousand men, while the garrison consisted only of nine thousand regular troops, viz. six thousand Greeks, and three thousand Genoese and Venetians. As the enemy continued battering the walls, night and day without intermission, great part of them, with the tower called Baclatina, near the Roman gate, was beaten down; but while the Turks were buffeted in filling up the ditch, in order to give the assault, the breach was repaired, and a new wall built. This threw the tyrant into a rage hardly to be exprest, which was greatly heightened, when he beheld from the shore his whole fleet worsted by five ships, four of which belonged to the Genoese of Galata, and one to the emperor: the latter was fraught with corn from Peloponnesus, and the others with all manner of provisions from the island of Chios, where they had passed the winter. When they first appeared, Mohammed ordered his admiral to take them, if possible, or at least to prevent their entering the harbour and joining the rest of the fleet. Hereupon the whole Turkish navy, weighing anchor, failed out to meet them, covering the streights, as they were in all three hundred sail, from shore to shore. The above-mentioned ships pursued their course; and falling into the midst of the enemy's fleet, sunk some of their galleys, disabled others, and made such a dreadful havock among them, that Mohammed, who beheld the whole from the shore, could not forbear rushing with his horse into the sea, as if he intended to swim to his fleet, and encourage them with his presence. But being soon apprized of the danger, he turned back, and filling the air with loud outcries, and dreadful curses, he tore his hair, and upbraiding his men with cowardice, uttered such menaces against the admiral, and his other officers, as struck all with terror who heard him. But notwithstanding his impotent rage, and the loud shouts of the whole Turkish army, encouraging their mariners to behave more manfully, the five ships opened themselves a way through the midst of the enemy's fleet, and, to the unexpressible joy of the christians, got safe into the harbour. The Turks attempted several times to force the haven, in order to attack the city on that side; but all their efforts proving unsuccessful, Mohammed formed, and, to the great terror and amazement of the besieged, put in execution, one of the boldest designs we find mentioned in history. For, not being able to remove the chain chain drawn crofs the entrance into the harbour, and the ships within it making a dreadful fire on the Turkish fleet as often as they drew near in order to break it, he commanded a large road to be levelled from the Bosphorus behind Pera to the haven of Constantinople, and then, by means of certain engines, the contrivance of a renegade, conveyed eighty galleys over land for the space of eight miles into the haven, of which he was no sooner master, the ships riding there being either taken or funk, than he caused a bridge, a work no less wonderful and surprising, to be built over it with incredible labour and expedition. By means of this bridge, which reached from the camp of Zoganus at Pera to the walls of Constantinople, the city was laid open to an assault on that side too. And now the place being invested, and battered night and day with incredible fury on all sides, the emperor, well apprised he could not with his small garrison hold out much longer against such a mighty fleet and so numerous an army, sent deputies to Mohammed, offering to acknowledge himself his vaffal, by paying him yearly what tribute he should think proper to impose upon him, provided he raised the siege and withdrew. The tyrant answered, that he was determined at all events to become master of the city; but if the emperor delivered it up forthwith, he would yield to him Peloponnesus, and other provinces to his brothers, which they should peaceably enjoy as his friends and allies, whereas, if he held out to the last extremity, and suffered it to be taken by assault, he would put him and the whole nobility to the sword, abandon the city to be plundered by his soldiers, and carry all the inhabitants, stripped of their wealth and effects, into captivity. The city was already reduced to great straits; but the emperor being determined to perish within, rather than give it up upon any terms whatsoever, the siege was carried on with great vigor till the twenty-fifth of May, when a report being spread in the Turkish camp, that a mighty army was advancing full marches to the relief of the city under the conduct of the celebrated John Hunniades, the common soldiers, feized with a panic, began to mutiny, and press Mohammed in a tumultuous manner to break up the siege; nay, they openly threatened him with death, if he did not immediately abandon the enterprize, and retire from before the city, which they despaired of being able to reduce before the arrival of the supposed succours. Mohammed, tho' hitherto an utter stranger to fear, alarmed at the menaces of the incensed and ungovernable soldiers, was upon the point of yielding to the form, and raising the siege, agreeable to the advice of the grand vizier Haly who favoured underhand the christians. But Zagan, a Turkish officer of great intrepidity, and an irreconcilable enemy to the christians, having confirmed the sultan in his former resolution, advised him to give, without loss of time, a general assault; to which, he said, the soldiery, however mutinous, would not be averse, provided he solemnly promised to abandon the city to be plundered by them. As this advice befitted the humour of Mohammed, he readily embraced it, and caused a proclamation to be published throughout the camp, declaring, that he gave up to his soldiery all the wealth of that opulent city, requiring nothing for his share but the empty houses. The desire of plunder, and the prospect of an immense booty, soon got the better of the fear, which had seiz'd the army: they all demanded with one voice to be led immediately to the assault. Hereupon the emperor was summoned for the last time to deliver up the city, with a promise of his life and liberty. To this summons the brave emperor answered, that he was unalterably determined either to defend the city, or fall with it. With this answer the messenger returned, and on the evening of the same day, which was Trinity Sunday, the twenty-seventh of May, the Turkish camp and fleet appeared illuminated with an incredible number of lights set up by the sultan's orders on every tent and vessel to admonish the whole army, that a solemn fast was to be observed the next day, to implore the protection of heaven. Constantine, concluding from thence, as he had been privately informed beforehand by his friend Haly, that on the Tuesday following he should be attacked by sea and land, made the necessary preparations for sustaining the assault, his life, liberty, reputation, and whatever else was dear to him lying at stake. He ordered in the first place a general procession, after which, in a pathetic and eloquent speech, he encouraged the nobility and citizens to exert themselves in the defence of the empire and the christian religion. He then retired to the church of St. Sophia, attended by the cardinal Isidor and several other prelates, who had conformed to the ceremonies of the Latins; and there, after assisting with exemplary piety at divine service, he received the holy eucharist. Zygomola, a modern writer, tells us, that Constantine, having first caused the empress and his children to receive the sacrament, ordered immediately after their heads to be struck off, to prevent their falling alive into the enemy's hands. But this we look upon as one of the many fables that are to be found in most of the modern Greek writers, it being manifest... feet from Ducas and other contemporary writers, that Theodoras, Constantine's first wife, and Catharina Catalula, his second, died long before, without his having children by them; and that the king of Georgia's daughter, who not long before had been betrothed to him, died before the came to Constantinople, or was married to him. From the church Constantine repaired to the great palace, and there, after taking leave of his ministers, as if he were never to see them again, he ordered every man to his post, and, putting on his armour, marched in person at the head of a chosen body to the gate Karisia, where a considerable breach had been made by the piece of ordnance, which we have mentioned above. Here the emperor and Justiniani his lieutenant-general, with 300 Genoese and a select body of Greeks, lay all night on their arms, hearing a great noise in the Turkish camp, and expecting every moment to be attacked. Accordingly, at three in the morning, the attack was begun by such troops as they sultan left valued, and therefore, designing them for slaughter, had ordered them to march the first, with no other view but to tire the christians, who tho' few in number, made a dreadful havock of that disorderly multitude. After the carnage had lasted some hours, the janizaries, and other fresh troops, advanced in good order, and renewed the attack with incredible vigor and fury. The christians, summoning all their courage and resolution, twice repulsed the enemy, but in the end being quite spent, and fresh troops pouring every moment in upon them, they were no longer able to stand their ground; so that the enemy in several places broke into the city. In the mean time, Justinian having received two wounds, one in the thigh and the other in the hand, he was so disheartened at the sight of his blood, that, abandoning his post, he caused himself to be conveyed to Galata, where he died soon after, not of his wounds, but of grief, in reflecting on his cowardly and ignominious conduct. The Genoese and Greeks, who served under him, dismayed at the sudden retreat of their general, quitted their posts, and fled in the utmost confusion. However, the emperor, attended by Theophilus Paleoegus, Francis Comnenus, Demetrius Cantacuzenus, John of Dalmatia, and a few more of the most resolute among the nobility, still kept his post, striving, with an unparallelled courage and intrepidity, to oppose the inundation of the barbarians, who, like a violent storm now broke in on all sides. Being in the end overpowered with numbers, and seeing all his friends lying dead on the ground around him, What! he cried. cried aloud, is there no christian left alive to strike off my head? He had scarce uttered these words, when one of the enemy, not knowing him, gave him a deep cut cross the face with his sabre: at the same time, another coming behind him, with a blow on the back part of his head, laid him dead on the ground. Thus died, in the forty-ninth year of his age and tenth of his reign, Constantine XV. courageously defending that city which Constantine I. had founded. Some writers relate his death differently, and tell us, that being overpowered with numbers, and no longer able to stand his ground, he fled with the rest, and was slain and pressed to death in the crowd. But we have followed Ducas and Phranzes, of whom the latter was chancellor to Constantine, and in the city when it was taken; the former was in the neighbourhood during the whole time of the siege, and, a few days after the city was taken, learnt both of the Turks and christians the particulars which he relates concerning that unhappy prince's death. Ducas adds, that Mohammed, admiring his courage, commanded all the funeral honours to be paid him, that were due to an emperor. The emperor being thus slain, the few christians, who were left alive, betook themselves to flight, and the Turks, meeting with no further opposition, entered the city, and scouring the streets, filled that once stately metropolis with blood and horror. They gave no quarter, but put all they met to the sword, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. But of the unspeakable miseries the inhabitants suffered, during the three days which Mohammed had allowed his soldiers to plunder the city, the reader will find a minute and affecting account in Ducas and other contemporary writers. Many thousands took refuge in the church of St. Sophia, but they were all massacred without pity in their asylum by the enraged barbarians, who, prompted by their natural cruelty, the desire of revenge, and the love of booty, spared no place nor person. Most of the nobility were by the sultan's orders cut off, and the rest reserved for purposes more grievous than death itself. However, many of the inhabitants, amongst whom were some men of great learning, found means to make their escape, while the Turks were busied in plundering the city. These embarking on five ships then in the harbour, arrived safe in Italy, where, with the study of the Greek tongue, they revived the liberal sciences, which had been long neglected in the west. When the three days were expired, Mohammed

Ducas, c. 39.
Mohammed commanded the soldiers, on pain of death, to forbear all further hostilities, and they put an end to the most cruel pillage and massacre mentioned in history. The next day, he made his public and triumphal entry into the city; and chusing it for the seat of his empire, he solemnly promised to take under his protection such of the inhabitants as should continue in it, or, being fled, should return to their antient habitations, and even to allow them the free exercise of the christian religion. The death of the last Roman emperor, the loss of Constantinople, and the final dissolution of the Constantinopolitan Roman empire, happened on the twenty-ninth of May in the year of the Greeks 6961, of the Hegira 857, and of the christian era, according to the most probable opinion, 1453.

The downfall of a state, once so mighty and powerful, was not sudden or unexpected, but brought on by degrees, and after a visible decay of several ages. To what causes that was owing, we have, on proper occasions, pointed out in the course of the present history; and therefore, not to trespass on the reader's patience with tedious repetitions, we shall only beg leave to remind him here, that we have all along confined ourselves to the immediate causes of so great a revolution, such as human policy may account for; not daring to pry into the decrees of Providence, nor ascribe, as some have done, the calamities, that befal a nation, to the sins of those on whom they are inflicted.

The history of the Carthaginians, to the destruction of Carthage by the Romans.

S E C T. I.

A description of Carthage, and some account of the origin of that city.

Where the materials afforded us by the antients for writing the history of Carthage, in any manner proportioned to the power and opulence of that famous republic, few nations would make a greater figure in this work; but such has been the infelicity of this state, that notwithstanding the immense riches, the extended commerce, the consummate policy and military genius of its inhabitants, rendered it formidable to all its neighbours, and even enabled it to contend with Rome for the empire of the world, yet we have but very short and scanty memorials left us of the great transactions in which it was concerned. Scarce a fragment of any of its own historians has reached us: the principal actions in which it bore a part, that have escaped oblivion, have either been transmitted to posterity by its enemies, or such as were favourably disposed towards them, and consequently many things omitted, which might have contributed towards giving us a juster idea of it. And yet, notwithstanding this, by collecting all the remarkable passages relating to it, scattered in the Greek and Roman authors; by comparing these together, and connecting them in a proper manner; and lastly, by making some observations of our own, in order to illustrate and explain them; we doubt not but to supply the defects of all former historians, and give the most complete, as well as the most entertaining, history of the Carthaginians, that has yet been offered to the public.

Carthage, the metropolis of Africa Propria for several centuries, was, according to Velleius, built sixty-five years before before Rome, tho' Trogus b and Justin will have it to be seventy-two years older than that mistress of the world. Livy c seems to place its foundation twenty-years higher than these; and Solinus d exceeds him twenty-seven years. Timæus e of Sicily intimates, that Carthage and Rome were founded at the same time, viz. thirty-eight years before the first Olympiad. Lastly, from Menander f the Ephesian, as cited by Josephus (A), and the Tyrian annals, it appears to have preceded the Roman æra an hundred and forty years. We shall not take upon us to determine which of these is in the right, nor whether any of them deserves absolute credit; but only observe, that as Carthage g consisted of different parts, which were supposed to have been built at different times, it is no wonder, that the antients should hand down such a variety of accounts, nor that the moderns should disagree so much amongst themselves in this affair. It is not very material to our present purpose, whether we can hit upon the precise year of this city's foundation, or not; and therefore

(A) Josephus, in his computation from Menander Ephesian (1), seems inconsistent with himself, or at least very inaccurate; but Petavius (2) has endeavoured to correct him, and makes him to fix Dido's arrival in Africa an hundred and forty years before the foundation of Rome. Solinus (3) tallies very well with this account; for he tells us, that Carthage, at its final destruction by Scipio Africanus, had stood seven hundred and thirty-seven years. As therefore this destruction happened in the year of Rome fix hundred and fix, or fix hundred and seven, it is evident, that, according to this author, Carthage was built an hundred and thirty, or an hundred and thirty-one years before Rome; and if, with Sir Isaac Newton (4) and Salmasius, we suppose Solinus intended the encœna or dedication of the city for its beginning, and that it was nine years in building, Dido's arrival in Africa, will be found to have happened an hundred and thirty-nine, or an hundred and forty years before the commencement of the Roman æra; which agreeing so well with Petavius, from whom it differs but two years, a trifle in a point of so remote antiquity, we may justly look upon it as coming pretty near the truth.

therefore we shall not be over solicitous about it. However, i may not be amis to refer our curious readers to Petavius b who has been very particular on this subject. That learn-man, after considering the jarring opinions of the antien-twith great attention, endeavours to rectify their mistakes, and at last, with an appearance of exactness, fixes the time of Dido's beginning to build Carthage an hundred thirty-seven years i before the foundation of Rome, if, with Varro, we place this in the third year of the sixth olympiad, or an hundred forty-two, if, with archbishop Usher, we prefer the account of Fabius Pictor k (B), who will have it to be near the beginning of the eighth olympiad, and, for aught we know to the contrary, comes as near the truth as any other chronologer whatsoever.

But whatever disagreement may be found amongst historians and chronologers as to the exact year of the foundation of Carthage, yet it is agreed on all hands, that the Phonicians were its founders. The Greek poet Nonnus l, from some authors, whose works are now lost, assures us, that Cadmus made a very successful expedition into these parts.

lowed herein by Onuphrius Panvinius (6), as well as archbishop authority, particularly with regard to the point under considfore Christ, relates, that the first traces of Carthage were owing to Zorus and Charchedon, two Tyrians or Phœnicians, thirty years before the destruction of Troy, according to Eusebius. Appian, who undoubtedly received his notion from Philistus, attributes this event to Zorus and Charchedon, the two said Phœnicians, fifty years before that period; and from him Scaliger corrects Eusebius’s numbers. In confirmation of which opinion, Virgil seems to hint, that Dido was rather the finisher than founder of this city, by giving us to understand, that the ground on which it stood was, before her time, occupied by people who dwelt in huts or cottages, or, in other words, that a town stood upon it. What likewise renders the account of Philistus and Appian not a little probable is, that the Greeks always called this city Charchedon, for which no reason so proper can be assigned, as that the person who first settled with a colony on this spot of ground, was called by that name. Besides, something must have determined Dido to choose this particular place for her Tyrians before any other. Now, no more likely motive can be conceived, than that it had been inhabited for some time by the Phœnicians, who were her countrymen, and from whom therefore she had reason to expect the kindlest and most friendly reception. Add to this, that both the coast of Africa, and the coast of Spain opposite to it were known in very early ages to the Tyrians; since it is remarked by Velleius, that they built the cities of Cadiz in Spain, and Utica in Africa, a little above eighty years after the Trojan war; and Strabo declares, that the Phœnicians were possesed of the best parts of Spain and Africa a considerable time before the age of Homer; all which considerations strongly support the first Phœnician settlement mentioned by Philistus and Appian. But as nothing can be laid down with certainty concerning the transactions of those very remote times, except what is deducible from the inspired writings of the old testament, and as nothing is left to be depended upon, than the relations we have of the origin of many ancient cities, we leave it to our readers to believe as much or as little of this as they please.

However,

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

However, if most of the events, mentioned by profane historians as happening before the destruction of Troy, may seem liable to dispute to some persons of a critical exactness, it cannot well be denied, as being the concurrent voice of antiquity, that Elia, called also Dido, sister of Pygmalion, king of Tyre, flying with her brother Barca, in the seventh year of the reign of that prince, from Tyre, fixed her residence at Carthage, and either founded, or much enlarged, this noble city. Were there any beginnings of a town there before, yet it could not have been a place of very great consideration till her arrival. The wealth of her husband, and the Tyrians she brought with her, who, at that time, were the most polite and ingenious people in the world, enabled her to enlarge and beautify the place, if she did not lay the foundations of it; to wall it round, and build a strong citadel in it; to lay the basins of a most flourishing and extensive commerce, for which the Tyrian nation was so renowned; and to introduce a form of government, which seemed, in Aristotle's opinion, by his descending largely upon it, to have been one of the most perfect that ever was known in the world, at least, in his time. Dido's arrival in Africa, as we have observed, was an hundred thirty-seven years before the building of Rome, according to the Varronian account; an hundred forty-two, according to Fabius Pictor; an hundred and fourteen before the first olympiad; eight hundred ninety-two, or eight hundred and ninety, before the birth of Christ, and near three hundred after the destruction of Troy, unless, with Sir Isaac Newton, we will suppose the antient chronologers to have anticipated that destruction near three hundred years. Virgil indeed seems to have allowed this supposition; for notwithstanding what has been advanced by several learned men to excute him on that head, had he been of the common opinion, the monstrous anachronism he makes, by bringing Æneas and Dido together as contemporaries, would have been utterly inexcusable. We shall hereafter give a full and ample account of the occasion and manner of Dido's flight from Tyre, of her putting into the island of Cyprus, and steering afterwards her course.

course for the coasts of Africa, where she happily arrived; so that it will be entirely unnecessary, even so much as to touch upon these particulars in this place.

How this city came to be called Carthage, authors are not fully agreed. Solinus tells us, that its true name was Carthad, which, in the Carthaginian language, signified the New City; and herein he is followed by Salmassius, Schindler, Bochart, and others, who deduce it from the two Oriental words, Charta Hadatta, which are of the same import. But, besides that it is too fetched and unnatural, these very authors themselves supply us with arguments to overthrow this etymon; for Schindler derives Carthago from the Oriental word Charta, a city; and the other two allow, that the city was founded long before Dido came into Africa, and that the only built that part of it called Byrsa, or the citadel. Dr. Hyde derives it either from Chadre Hanacha, i.e. The chamber of rest, or place of repose, or from Card Haneca, the New City, as before, because Plautus in his Cænus intimated, that it was called by the natives Chaeedreanech; but these derivations likewise are too forced and unsatisfactory, and are besides overthrown by Bochart. Servius therfore seems to come nearer the truth, when he says, that, according to the Carthaginians themselves, who must be supposed to be the beet acquainted with their own origin, it received its name from Charta, a town not far from Tyre, to which Dido bore a near relation; and this town is called by Cedrenus Chartica, or Chartaca, i.e. Charta Aca, or Charta Aco, the city of Aca or Aco, a celebrated sea-port of Phœnice (C), near Tyre and Sidon, in the territory of the the tribe of Apher, tho’ possessed by the Tyrians or Phœnicians. In support of Servius and Cædrenus’s authority, it may be observed, that the Sidonians, Tyrians and Canaanites inhabiting that part of Phœnicie, frequently prefixed the word kiriath, cariath, or charta, i.e. city, to the proper names of towns, as Kiriath, or, according to St. Jerom, Cariath-Arsba, Cariath-Baal, Cariath-Sanna, Cariath-Sepher, &c. tho’ sometimes they stylized them simply Cariath, or Charta, city, and, for the most part in writing, used their proper names alone; so that is no wonder the town under consideration, should be known by the names Charta, Aco, Aco, Chartica, Chartaca, Cartaco, &c. since this was perfectly agreeable to the genius of its inhabitants. Farther, tho’ Dido’s city was constantly called by the Latin writers Carthago, yet its true name amongst the antient Romans, who undoubtedly received it from the Carthaginians themselves, was Cartaco, as is evident from the columna rostrata (D) of Duilius. This, together with what has been observed in the second volume of this history, seems to render the authority above mentioned incontestable.

In order therefore to render our history as complete as possible, and convince the point at present in view, we shall here present our readers with the inscription itself, and the chart of it, as supplied by Lilius and Ciacconius, together with a version of it into the Latin of the Augustan age:

led from Thebes in Egypt; Pisa in Italy, from Pisa in Peloponnesus; Salamis in Cyprus, from Salamis in Attica, to omit several others that might be mentioned, are sufficient instances of it.

SALMASIUS * will have the Greek name Charchedon to be derived from Solinus's Carthada; because the Sicilians now-and-then used the Greek letter chi for theta. But sure nothing can be more weak than this; besides, were it much more plausible, it could not be admitted, because it clashes with the authority of Philistus (F), Appian, Eusebius, and St. Jerom. Herodotus, Menander Ephesius, Polybius, &c. the most antient Greek authors, mentioning the Carthaginians, likewise disprove it, because they were not Sicilians.

The Carthaginians were called by the Greeks, sometimes Libyans, on account of the country they possessed, and sometimes Phœnicians, on account of the country from whence they were originally descended. The Romans also flyed them Pœni, or Phœnicians, for the same reason; and every thing belonging to them, or their city, Punic or Pœnic, i. e. Phœnician, or belonging to the Phœnicians.

We must not omit observing, that, according to Stephanus * and Eustathius, this city was antiently named, in Punic, Caccabe, from a horse's head, which was found by the Tyrians, whilst they were digging for the foundations of Byrsa. This was looked upon as a happy omen, portending the martial disposition of the inhabitants, and the future greatness of the city. Our readers will find the whole story in Virgil z and Justin, and to these authors we refer them. In the mean time, we shall only remark, that the learned Bochart a has shewn the word Caccabe to have signified, in the from Shechem; so that whether we look upon Cadmus as a Phœnician or an Egyptian, it can scarce be doubted, but that Thebes in Boctia was so denominted from some more antient city.

(P) All these authors are clearly of opinion, that Carthage was built a considerable time before Dido came into Africa; and therefore, if their authority be of any weight, it is highly improbable, that from the citadel Byrsa only, the addition she made to the old city, the place was called Carthada, or the New city; and if this be allowed, it must likewise be admitted, that Salmasius endeavours absurdly to reduce Carchedon from Carthada.

the Phcenician language, the head of the animal above-mentioned; and that, upon account of this event, the Carthaginians had frequently upon the reverses of their coins, either a horse's head, or the body of a horse dimidiated, or a horse entire, with Victory upon him. Most of these coins have likewise a Punic inscription upon their said reverses, with several other symbols; as is evident from Agostini, Paruta, and others, as well as from the cabinets of the curious.

In order to avoid all future digressions on this head, we shall here give a faithful and particular account of the situation, dimensions, different parts, and power of the city of Carthage, according to the condition it was in at the beginning of the third Punic war, extracted from Polybius, Strabo, Diodorus, Appian, and other antient authors of the best reputation and authority.

Carthage stood at the bottom of a gulf, upon a peninsula three hundred and sixty stadia, or forty-five miles, in circumference, the isthmus joining this peninsula to the continent of Africa, being twenty-five stadia, or three miles and a furlong, in breadth. On the west side there projected from it a long tract of land, in shape resembling a tongue, half a stadium broad; which shooting out into the sea, separated it from a lake or moras, and was strongly fortified on all sides by rocks, and a sledge wall. In the middle of the city stood the fortresses or citadel, erected by Dido, called Byrsa, having on the top of it a temple sacred to Aesculapius, seated on a very high hill, upon rocks, and to which the ascent was by sixty steps. This temple was rich, beautiful, and of a considerable extent; so that when Byrsa was taken by Scipio, towards the close of the last siege of Carthage, nine hundred Roman defectors fortified themselves there. At last Asdrubal's wife setting fire to it, entirely consumed it, together with herself, her children, and the said nine hundred defectors, to avoid falling into the hands of Scipio. On the south side, towards the continent, where Byrsa had its situation, the city was surrounded with a triple wall, thirty cubits high, abstracted from the parapets and towers, with which it was flanked all round at equal distances, each interval being fourscore fathoms, or four hundred and eighty foot. Every tower had its foundations sunk thirty foot deep, and was four stories high, tho' the walls were but two; they were arched, and in the lower part, corresponding in depth depth with the foundations above-mentioned, were stalls large enough to hold three hundred elephants, with their fodder &c. Over these were stables for four thousand horses, and lofts for their food. There likewise was room enough to lodge twenty thousand foot and four thousand horse. Such a number of forces and beasts of war were contained within the walls, without in the least incommoding the inhabitants. The walls were weak and low in one part only, and that was an angle, which, from the first building of the city, had been neglected, beginning at the long tract of land advancing into the sea towards the western continent, before taken notice of, and extending as far as the harbours, which were on the same side. Of these there were two, which were disposed in such a manner, as to have a communication with one another, and had one common entrance, seventy foot broad, and shut up with chains. The first was appropriated to the merchants, and included in it a vast number of places of refreshment, and all kinds of accommodations for the seamen. The second, or inner port, was, as well as the island called Cophon in the midst of it, lined with large kays, in which were distinct receptacles for securing and sheltering from the weather two hundred and twenty ships, it being designed chiefly for ships of war. Over these were magazines or store-houses, wherein was lodged whatever is necessary for the arming and equipping of fleets. The entrance into each of these receptacles was adorned with two marble pillars of the Ionic order; so that both the harbour and the island represented on each side two magnificent galleries. Upon the island was the admiral’s palace, from whence orders were given, and proclamations issued out; and as it stood opposite to the mouth of the harbour, he could from thence discover whatever was doing at sea, tho’ no one there could see what was transacting in the inward part of the harbour; nay, the merchants themselves, when they entered into their port, had no prospect of the men of war, being separated from them by a double wall, and each port having its particular gate that led to the city, without passing through the other.

Hence it is apparent, that the city consisted of three parts, Byrsa, Megara (G) or Magaria, and Cohon. Byrsa, according to the common opinion of many writers, was the chief part of the city. (G) The true name of the exterior part of Carthage, (or that which was, properly speaking, the town) was Megara or Megaria, not Magalia, as we formerly imagined. Appian, Iudor, and Servius put this point beyond dispute (10).

Of how many parts it is divided.

ding to Servius, was twenty-two stadia, or near three English miles, in circumference; tho’ Eutropius says, it did not much exceed two thousand paces, which is not quite two English miles. It was not so precisely in the middle of the city, but that it inclined to the south, or isthmus that joined Carthage to the continent, as is observed by Appian. The word Byrsa is only a Greek corruption of the true Punic or Phoenician name Burfa, Borfa, or Bottra, (for it may be pronounced all these ways) i.e. a fortress or citadel, as has been demonstrated by Scaliger, Bochart, and others, verified in the oriental languages, and may be inferred from Strabo, Virgil, and Appian, the fable of the ox’s hide having long since been exploded by the learned. This was justly looked upon as the interior part of Carthage, surrounded by the Megara, or Magaria, i.e. the houses, or town, (for that the word imports in the Phoenician tongue) its exterior part, according to Servius; so that together they formed a kind of double town. Strabo calls the small island in the middle of the second harbour, Cothon; tho’ Appian applies this name likewise to that port or harbour itself, which, if this writer is to be credited, was environed by a strong wall, and had one of its parts round, but the other quadrangular. The word Cothon is of oriental extraction, and signifies a port not formed by nature, but the effect of labour and art; so that this seems to have been not a proper, but a common, name among the Carthaginians, who undoubtedly pronounced it Kathum or Kathon; but the Greeks, adopting it into their own language, gave it a Greek termination, and expressing the Phoenician A by their great O, (which may easily be conceived) thence came the name Cothon. The Carthaginians were so extremely active and indefatigable, that when Scipio had blocked up the old port, or Cothon, they, in a very short time, built a new one, the traces of which, scarce an hundred yards square, are still to be seen. This Cothon was perhaps perhaps the same that was called the Mandracium in the time of Procopius.

The number of inhabitants this city contained, at the beginning of the third Punic war, was seven hundred thousand; a prodigious number, considering the many terrible blows the Carthaginians had received from the Romans during the course of the first and second Punic wars, as well as from their own mercenaries in the interval betwixt these wars, and the destructive broils they had been engaged in with Masinissa. The forces they could bring into the field, as well as their power by sea, when they had a mind to exert themselves in an extraordinary manner, were very formidable, as appears from the army commanded by Hamilcar in his expedition against Gelon the tyrant of Syracuse, which consisted of three hundred thousand men; and the fleet, forwarding the operations of the land forces, which was composed of more than two thousand ships of war, and above three thousand transports. Their riches were likewise immense, as may be collected from what Scipio carried off at the final destruction of the town, after it had been thoroughly plundered, and, as was imagined, entirely exhausted and consumed, viz. near a million and an half sterling. All which may serve to give us some faint idea of what Carthage was, when in the height of its grandeur and magnificence.

As to the extent of the city, Livy informs us, that it was twenty-three miles round; and if what is related of it above be true, this is not improbable. Pliny intimates, that Carthage, when in the hands of the Phoenicians, was much larger than when it was a Roman colony; and Suidas affirms, that it was the greatest and most powerful city in the world. The dominion of the sea, which it enjoyed for six hundred years, almost without interruption, together with the genius of its citizens for commerce, aggrandized it in a most prodigious manner; to which if we add its excellent form of government, which will be explained more fully hereafter, its extensive trade, the mines of Spain, &c. those inexhaustible sources of wealth; it can be no matter of wonder, that the Carthaginians should have arrived at such an exalted pitch of power. One particular edifice, hitherto omitted in our description of Carthage, it may not be improper to take notice of, viz. the temple of Apollo, standing near the Co-

Thon, wherein was a statue of that deity of massive gold, and whose inside was all covered with plates of the same metal, weighing a thousand talents. But this was involved in the common destruction of the city, being pillaged and destroyed by a party of Scipio's men, when the Cothon and adjacent part of the city were taken by that general.

It has been observed by a curious and learned modern traveller, who was himself upon the spot, that the greatest part of Carthage was built upon three hills, somewhat inferior in elevation to those upon which Rome was erected. All the remains of this once famous city are, according to this traveller, the area of a spacious room upon one of those hills, over-looking the south-east shore, with several smaller ones hard by it; the common sewers, which time hath not in the least injured or impaired; and the cisterns, which have very little submitted to the general ruins of the city. The harbour is now stopped up, and, by the north-east winds with the (H) Mejerda, made almost as far distant from the sea as Utica, tho' it is still called El-Mersa, or the port, lying to the north and north-west of the city, and formeth, with the lake of Tunis, the peninsula on which Carthage stood.

Strabo observes, that the Carthaginians possessed three hundred cities in Africa before the beginning of the third Punic war; which may easily be believed, if we consider, that the dominions of this state in Africa before that war, extended from the western confines of Cyrenaica, to the pillars of Hercules, or streights of Gibraltar (I), a tract of land near fifteen

The particulars of this computation may be seen in the following table:

When it was arrived at its last period of perfection, the best part of Spain, even as far as the Pyrenees, of Sicily, and all the islands in the Mediterranean to the west of this latter, were subject to it. How it came to make such large acquisitions, and by what steps it grew so formidable, as to dispute the empire of the world with Rome itself, will appear in the sequel of this history.

SECT. II.

A description of Africa Propria, or the territory of Carthage.

HAVING given our readers the best account of the origin and foundation of Carthage that can be drawn from antiquity, as likewise a small sketch of its power, wealth, magnitude, &c. which we shall expati ate more largely upon hereafter; before we proceed directly to the history of the Carthaginians, or describe the religion, government, government, genius, commerce, manners, arts, sciences, &c. of that people, it will be proper to give a description of the country wherein they were seated, and which was looked upon as the natural territory of their city; for with regard to the other dominions they, at certain intervals, possessed, or got a footing in, they were sometimes of a larger, and sometimes of a narrower, extent; sometimes in their own hands, and sometimes in those of other states, according as success or misfortune attended them in the management of their affairs.

Mela a and Ptolemy will have Africa Propria to have contained all the countries situate between the river Ampsaga and the borders of Cyrenaica, which, Pliny b tells us, were inhabited by twenty-six different nations; but this gives it too great an extent, as making it to include Numidia and the Regio Syrtrica, which are countries distant from the proper territory of Carthage. Its true limits seem c to have been the river Tufca on the west, or side of Numidia; the Mediterranean or African sea on the north; the frontiers of the Garamantes and deserts of Libya Interior on the south; and the Mediterranean, with the Leffer Syrtis, on the east. It d was divided into two provinces, the Regio Zeugitana, and Byzacium, with which the kingdom of Tunis e, under its division into the summer and winter circuits, at present nearly corresponds. According to Dio f, this region was likewise called the old province, and Numidia the new one. Byzacium g, or at least the sea coast of that province, seems to be the Emporia of Livy and Polybius.

Ptolemy h has placed Carthage, and all the neighbouring cities, four degrees too southerly, which is not to be wondered at, considering the inaccuracy of that geographer in ascertaining the latitudes of places. If we admit the position of Africa Propria to have been nearly the same with that of the kingdom of Tunis, as there is great reason to believe i, it must have taken up almost four degrees of north latitude.

viz. from 33° 30′ N. to 37° 12′ N. and of longitude above three degrees, since Sbekkah, the most advanced city of the kingdom of Tunis to the westward, is in 82′, and Clybea, the farthest to the east, in 11° 20′ E. longitude from London.
The spot of ground on which Carthage stood is, according to the latest observations, about 10° 40′ east of London, and in north latitude 36° 40′.

Zeugitana, or the Regio Zeugitana, was separated from Numidia by the river Tusca, and extended as far as Aodrumetum, which Pliny makes to be the first city of Byzacium. The summer circuit of the kingdom of Tunis, including the fruitful country about Kef and Bai-jah, and several other districts, answers at present to this province, which was the Regio Carthaginum of Strabo, and the Africa Propria of Pliny and Solinus. We shall not pretend here to give a minute and particular description of all the cities it contained, as being incongruous with our present design; but only touch upon some of the principal of them, which have been taken the most notice of by those writers who have treated of the Roman and Carthaginian affairs.

The first place in Zeugitana worthy our notice, since Carthage has been already described, is Utica. In rank and dignity this city was next to Carthage itself, and even superior to it in point of antiquity. Aristoțle says it was built, according to the Phœnician historians, two hundred and eighty-seven years before Carthage. Vellius, as has been above related, makes the Tyrians to have founded it a little more than eighty years after the destruction of Troy. Justin intimates, that the Tyrians were settled there a considerable time before Dido came into Africa; nay, that this settlement commenced upon their first arrival in that country: and with these two last authors Mela and Stephanus agree. From this great antiquity, Bochart thinks the Phœnicians gave it the name Utica, the antient, i. e. city, rather, in our opinion, Etuca or Ituca, i. e. the city of long standing, or the great city, the strong city, &c. which appellation it might have gone by amongst the Tyrians, even in Dido’s time; and this notion receives a good degree of probability from Scylax and Polybius, the most antient authors mentioning it, who who call it Ituæ, or Ityce, to whom the other Greek authors, speaking of it, except Dio, who uses the Latin name, may be added. The gulph, on which both this city and Carthage stood, was formed by two promontories, viz. the promontory of Mercurius and that of Apollo, under the left of which Utica was seated. Appian says it was sixty stadia, or seven miles and an half to the westward of Carthage; but, according to the itinerary, these two cities were twenty-seven Roman miles distant from each other x. Utica had a large and commodious harbour, and was famous on many accounts in the Roman history, but on none more than the death of the younger Cato, who was from thence called Cato Uticensis, or Cato of Utica. After Carthage was razed by the Romans, it had a grant made it of all the country lying between Carthage and Hippo, and was for a considerable time the metropolis of Africa. An ingenious modern traveller supposes this place to have stood where Boo-shatter does at present; the traces of buildings of great extent and magnificence still visible there, and the distance from Carthage perfectly agreeing with that of the itinerary, besides other circumstances, giving good grounds for such a supposition.

The next town in the neighbourhood of Carthage, but in a contrary direction to the former, is Tunes, or Tunet, the Tunis of the moderns. This town is undoubtedly of great antiquity, being taken particular notice of by Polybius, Diodorus, Livy, and others; nay, that it was of Phoenician original, the name itself sufficiently implies: for we find in that part of the Lower Egypt, almost contiguous to the borders of Arabia Petraea and Phœnicia, a town called Tanes, from whence the Tanitic name and Tanitic mouth of the Nile took their name. And'tis well known, that this part of Egypt was over-run by the Phœnicians, either in the time of Joshua, or much earlier; and that these same Phœnicians afterwards settled in Africa Propria, Numidia, and Mauritania. In confirmation of which sentiment, we find find a river in Numidia, not far from the Ampsaga, called Tanas; from whence we may infer, since nothing is more common in the oriental languages, than a permutation of vowels, that Tunes is a Phœnician name, and that the city itself is of Phœnician extraction. That it was a town of some note in very early ages, is evident from Livy, Diodorus, and Strabo, who tell us, that there was a hot bath, and a famous quarry, not far from it; that it was fortified both by nature and art, and surrounded with a wall. It was seated on or near the mouth of the river Catada, fifteen Roman miles east of Carthage. The city is more famous now, than it was even amongst the ancients, being the capital of a powerful kingdom. The greatest part of it is situate upon a rising ground, along the western banks of the lake, which goes by the same name, and in a full prospect (as the ancients have described it) of the Gulella, Carthage, and the island Zowa-moor. Tunis some time since was noted for its corsairs, but of late the inhabitants have applied themselves wholly to trade, and are now become the most civilized and polite people in Barbary (A).

Maxula, or, according to Ptolemy, Mazula, is an antient town of the state of Carthage, and, if Pliny may be credited, pretty near the city, in a direction contrary to the promontory of Apollo and Utica. We find on the western banks of the Tigris a city in Arabic, named Mosul, or Mozul; which word is not remote from the Mazula of Ptolemy. 'Tis likewise evident from the authority of Scylax, who mentions it, that Mazula was of some repute in his time, and therefore of great antiquity; from which considerations we may conclude it not improbable, as there is a very great affinity between the Arabic and Phœnician languages.

(A) Somewhere near this place Adis or Adda is to be looked for, where Regulus gave the Carthaginians a memorable defeat, and forced their camp. It appears from Polybius (1), that this was a town of some importance; but the ancients being silent as to any farther particulars relating to it, have only that it was situated amongst rocks and hills, we shall think it sufficient just to have mentioned it.

languages, that this town was built by the Phœnicians. It stood on the eastern side of the Catada, now the Miliana; and, if the conjecture of the ingenious gentleman above-mentioned be true, viz. that Mo-raifah, two leagues to the north-east of Solyman, be the Maxula, or Mazula, of the antients, this town was about eight leagues, or twenty-four English miles, south-east of Tunes (B).

Carpis.

Carpis, a city of this district, placed by Ptolemy \textsuperscript{k} one third of a degree more northerly than Carthage. Pliny calls it Carpi. Our learned traveller \textsuperscript{1} supposes the spot which this town occupied, to be that which Gurbos, or Hammam-Gurbos, at present stands upon; and that the hot bath near it is the Aqae Calidæ of Livy. Though the position Ptolemy assigns his Carpis does not agree with that of the modern Gurbos, this last lying above a league more southerly than Carthage, yet we doubt not but the gentleman is in the right, this geographer being very inaccurate in his determination of the latitudes of places.

Misua \textsuperscript{m}, or Nifua, a town taken notice of by Pliny and Ptolemy, between Carpis and Clypea. The ruins \textsuperscript{n} of this place are still to be seen at the sanctuary of Seedy Doud, in the kingdom of Tunis, five leagues to the E. N. E. of the promontory of Hercules.

Aquilaria.

The next place that occurs is the Aquilaria of Cæsar, where Curio landed his troops from Sicily. Cæsar tells us, it was a very convenient station in the summer season, and in the neighbourhood of two promontories. Of these, in all probability, that of Mercury (called by the Moors the Rafadder adder, and by the Franks cape Bon) was one; since this is about a league to the northward of Lowah-reah, supposed to be the antient Aquilaria. Many fragments\(^p\) of antiquities are still extant here, but among them nothing remarkable.

(B) We find the Mufulani, a people seated in the western part of Numidia, not far from the Amphaga, taken notice of by Tacitus (\textsuperscript{2}); and a town and promontory of Ethiopia, famous for the cimamon they produced, near the confines of Nubia and Libya interior, named Moiyon or Mouitum, remembered by Pliny (\textsuperscript{3}). Now as a Phœnician colony came very early into Numidia, and the Nubians and Ethiopians were the descendants of the Egyptians and Arabians, as will hereafter be proved, possibly some light may from thence be thrown upon what we have advanced concerning the origin of this town.

Clypea, a city built upon the small promontory Ta-phitis, five leagues south-east of the promontory of Mercury, which being in the figure of a shield or hemisphere, gave occasion to the name. It is called by Livy, Mela, and Pliny, Clypea; by Polybius, Appian, and Agathemerus, Aspis; but by Solinus and the itinerary, Clypea. A mile\(^y\) distant from the ground where the old city stood, is a collection of huts or cottages, called by the inhabitants Clypea. Ptolemy is guilty of a great mistake, when he makes Aspis and Clypea two different cities.

CURUBIS, Curubis, and Curabis, a town, according to the itinerary, thirty-two Roman miles distant from the former; but, according to the more accurate observations of the moderns\(^z\), seven leagues, or twenty-one miles, south-west and by west of it. It is styled by Pliny the free city Curubis, and seems to have been a considerable place in former times; though the ruins of a large aqueduct, and of the cisterns which received the water, are the only antiquities it can boast of at present, if the modern Gumba answers to it, as both the name and situation sufficiently intimate.

CANTHELE, a Phœnician city, not far from Curubis, according to Hecateus\(^u\). This town seems to have received its appellation from the pagan deity Saturn; since, according to Sanchoniatho\(^w\) and Damascius, the word el in the Phœnician tongue had a particular relation to that deity. In confirmation of which 'tis observed by Ponticus, in his life of St. Cyprian, that there was a town in that place called by the Romans, vicus Saturni, the street or town of Saturn. 'This was not a place of figure, at least so low as the classic times, so that we take notice of it here purely on account of its antiquity.

the north-east of Curubis. Thucydides * says, that the place from hence to Sicily was very short, as being performed in two days and a night. Scylax places it not far from the lesser Syrtis, and about a day and a half's journey from the promontory of Mercury. Nabal, a thriving and industrious modern town, is a furlong to the westward of the ancient Neapolis, which appears to have been a large city. Pliny styles this place, as well as Curubis, a free city. Here is a great number of inscriptions upon stones of six foot in length, and three in breadth; but they are either so unfortunately defaced, or filled with rubbish and mortar, that it is a difficult thing to copy them. Strabo and Hirtius agree with Scylax in fixing it pretty near the promontory of Mercury. Nabal stands upon the gulph of Hamonet in N. lat. 36° 8' two leagues from a little opulent town of the same name.

To these may be added Nepheris, a fortress lying a little to the eastward of Carthage. It was a place of good consideration, being built upon a rock, and strongly fenced by nature on all sides. Adruba, with his whole army, was cut off near it by Scipio, who, after a siege of two and twenty days, reduced the town; and this greatly contributed to the conquest of Carthage. Strabo, Appian, and the epitomizer of Livy, take particular notice of it.

The only city remaining in this province that merits any attention is Hippo, towards the north-west borders of it, a fort of frontier town on the side of Numidia. From the navigable lake Hippostitis, on which it was built, and which served it as a natural fortification, it was denominatied Hippo Diarrhytus, and Hippo Zarytus; tho', from the promontory near it the ancients sometimes gave it the denomination of Acra, Hippuacra, and Hippagretta. Scylax calls it simply Hippo, notwithstanding it generally went by the names above-mentioned in the time of Polybius, Diodorus, Pliny, and Appian; and this in order to distinguish it from Hippo Regius in Numidia. Appian * tells us, that it was a great city, had a port, a citadel, and repositories for naval stores. The modern name is Bizerta, which is a corruption of the Hippo Zarytus of the ancients. It is pleasantly situated upon a canal †, eight miles to the south and by west of Cape Blanco, betwixt an extensive lake and the sea. It is at present about a mile in circuit, defended by several castles and batteries, the principal of which are towards the sea.

gin of it was Phoenician, as has been fully proved by Bo-chart, who derives the name of Hippo from the Syriac or Phœnician Ubbo, or Uppo, a gulph, which perfectly well answers to the situation of the place. To which by way of corroboration it may be observed, that the gulph, on which it was seated, seems, in contradistinction to the city Hippo or Hippon, to be called Hippos by Ptolemy, when he takes notice of the promontory of Hippos, or of the gulph close by it; and if so, this was only the Syriac or Phœnician Ubbo (gulph) with a Greek termination superadded. This gulph is formed by the Promontorium Candidum and Promontorium Apolliniis of the antients, the Ras el abeadh and Ras Zibeeb of the present Tuniscens.

As for the inland towns of Zeugitana, Ulizibirra, Mediccara, Tucma, Cerbica, Safura, Clma, Vepillium, Vina, Valli, Cigia, Mufli, Membrella, Cilio, and others equally obscure, enumerated by Ptolemy, the itinerary, and Peutinger's table; they were for the most part, if not entirely, modern in comparison of the Carthaginian times, and never considerable in any other. We shall therefore conclude what we have to say of this province with observing, that there seem to be some traces of Zegis or Zeugitana in the present name of the city of Zowan or Zagwan, a small flourishing town built upon the north-east extremity of a conspicuous mountain of the same name, in the summer circuit of the kingdom of Tunis. This will appear extremely probable from what has been advanced by Solinus, compared with the observations of the learned traveller so often cited. The Zygantes of Herodotus seem likewise to have been placed in the neighbourhood of Zagwan, which is an additional argument in support of this notion.

Byzacium, according to Pliny, was inhabited by the Byzacium.
Libyphœnicians, that is, by a mixture of Aborigines, or native Africans, and Carthaginians. The same author tells us, it was about two hundred and fifty Roman miles in circumference, and of so great fertility, that the earth made a return of an hundred fold. The limits of this province seem impossible to be precisely defined, because the antients have passed over the interior part of it bordering upon Libya in a very slight manner, and greatly mistaken the course, magnitude and source of the river Triton; only in general it may be proper to remark, that it is supposed not to have differed much in extent and situation from the present winter circuit of the Tuniseens. We have neither room nor opportunity to be very particular in our account of the towns it formerly contained, and therefore hope that a brief description of some of the principal of them will suffice.

Adrumetum, or Hadrumetum, the capital of Byzacium, was a city of great antiquity, and of great note in the antient world. It had a variety of names, being called by Strabo and Stephanus, Adryme or Adrumetum, as also Adrumetum; by Plutarch and Ptolemy, Adrumetus or Adrumettus; by Appian, Adrymettus; and by Caeser, Hirtius, and Pliny, Adrumetum; by Mela, Hadrumetum, or according to Vitius, Hadrumetum; and lastly, in Peutinger’s table, we find it named Hadrito. The city was large and spacious, built upon an hemispherical promontory, like Clypea, at the distance of two leagues to the south-east of the moras, the boundary, as hath been supposed, betwixt the Zeugitana and this province. According to the itinerary, it was eighteen Roman miles from Leptis Minor, though Peutinger’s table makes the distance greater. Adjacent to this city was a certain, being either a port or little island, in imitation of that of Carthage so called. The city, according to the judgment that can be formed from the present situation, was something more than a mile in circuit; and from the remaining ruins, seems rather to have been a place of importance than extent. That it was founded by the Phoenicians, is evident from Salus and others; as likewise from the name itself, which Bochart, with a great appearance of truth, derives from two Syriac or Phoenician words, importing, the land or country returning an hundred fold, i.e. of corn or grain. The extraordinary fertility, not only of the province in general, but of Adrumetum, the metropolis of it, in particular, is confirmed by an inscription in Smetius, which gives a sanction to Bochart’s authority, and sufficiently convinces us of the truth of what we find related concerning it by the Latin authors; though at this day it is but a barren and uncultivated tract, being partly of a dry sandy nature, and partly incommode with morasses and thikbahs (C) dispersed over it, especially in the winter season.

\[\text{C}\] The word thikbah signifies in the Arabic language a saltish plat of ground; and denotes a spot generally overflowed in the winter.
Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians:

If the Herkla of the Tuniseens, the Heraclea of the lower empire, be Adrumetum, as we see no reason to doubt, it must have been in N. lat. 35° 50', though Ptolemy places it in N. lat. 32° 40'.

Ruspina, a town of Byzacium, betwixt Adrumetum and Leptis Minor, where Cæsar encamped in his wars with Scipio §. The village of Sahaleel, a little above six leagues from Herkla, and a full mile from the sea, has the fairest pretensions to Ruspina; since we are assured by Hirtius k, that the port of Ruspina was not at much greater distance from the town.

Leptis Minor, one of Pliny's free cities, eighteen Roman miles from Adrumetum, of Phœnician extraction. It had the epithet Minor commonly annexed to it, in order to distinguish it from Leptis Major, a city of the Regio Syrtica, which was built either by the Sidonians, as Sallust seems to intimate', or by the Tyrians, according to Pliny k. Bochart deduces the name Leptis from the Phœnician labr or lapt, denoting a port or station for vessels. Strabo and Stephanus say, that Leptethis, a city of Cyprus, was famous for its commodious station, and the same is said of Leptis Minor by Lucan m. The city paid every day a talent to the Carthaginians by way of tribute; and all authors agree, that the circumjacent country was exceeding fruitful, which has induced Bochart to drive Emporia (its name in Livy and Polybius) from two Oriental words, importing "the fruitful "mother." The place is at present called Lempta; but there is nothing left besides a small part of the castle, with a ter, but dry all the summer (4). There are great numbers of these in the kingdom of Tunis and Algiers, which appear like so many extensive lakes, and produce a considerable quantity of salt. In the summer they may be taken for bowling greens prepared for the turf. Some of them have a hard and solid bottom, without the least mixture of gritty mould, retaining the salt that lieth crystallized upon them after rain; but others are of a more oozy aborbent nature, seldom preserving any saline incrustations upon the surface. The earth of them all is very pungent to the tongue, and, by a proper solution, would yield, no doubt, a copious portion of salt.

low shelf of rocks, that probably made the northern mound of the Cothon.

Agar. AGAR, a town taken notice of by Hirtius, a few miles to the westward of Leptis. The situation of this place is very rocky, and here is a great quantity of stones and ruins. The village, at present taking up the spot of ground on which Agar stood, is called by the Arabs, Boo-Hadjar, i.e. "the father of a stone," which agrees in signification pretty well with the old name, and answers to the circumstances above-mentioned.

Thapsus, a maritime town of this province, seated, according to Dio, upon a fort of isthmus, betwixt the sea and a lake. Peutinger's table makes it eight miles distant from Leptis to the south. The inhabitants of Thapsus were famous for their fidelity to Scipio, in his wars with Caesar; but notwithstanding the strength of the place, they were obliged to submit to the latter, after he had defeated the former. Demas, the antient Thapsus, is situated upon a low neck of land, three miles to the E. by S. of To-bulba, within half a league of which is the lake taken notice of by Hirtius. Here is still remaining, in defiance of time and the sea, a great part of the Cothon, built in frames; the composition whereof is made up of small pebbles and mortar, which are so well cemented and knit together, that a solid rock could not be more hard and durable. The walls of Tlemian very much resemble the remaining part of this cothon.

Acholla. ACHOLLA or Acilla, another free city, called by Appian, Cholla. If the site Ptolemy assigns this city be allowed, Elalia, six miles to the northward of She-ah, the antient Ruspe, upon the borders of a fertile plain, undoubtedly answers to it.

Turris Hannibalis, the tower of Hannibal, was a fort, tower, or country seat, belonging to Hannibal, betwixt Thapsus and Acilla, according to Livy. To this place Hannibal fled from Carthage, for fear of the Romans; and immediately, upon his arrival, embarking in a vessel that waited for him, passed over to the island Cercina. Either El-Medea, five miles to the south of Demas, or Saleco, five miles to the S. by W. of El-Medea, in all probability, occupies cupies the space on which this fort, tower, or country seat, was erected.

Thena or Thenæ, a town on the coast of the lesser Syrtis mentioned by Strabo, known at this time among the Tuniseens by the name Thaïnee. It was built upon a low and rocky piece of ground, near two miles in circuit. The adjacent country is dry and barren, without either fountain or rivulet to refresh it.

Betwixt Thaïne and the mouth of the Triton, or the Macodama, place where it discharges itself into the sea, Ptolemy places his Macodama, with which perhaps Maha-refs, four leagues to the west of Thaïnee, corresponds. 'Tis a village famous for nothing, but several cisterns, with large areas to receive the rain-water.

Uzita, a town of some note near Tifdrus and Leptis Uzita Minor, mentioned by Hirtius, Ptolemy, and Dio. Bochart derives the name from saith or zait, an olive, or place where olives are produced; and, according to Hirtius, the neighbourhood of this city was famous for its production of olives, since Caesar exacted yearly from the inhabitants of Leptis a vast quantity of oil by way of mulct or tribute. This gives great weight to Bochart's opinion, and proves the city to be Phœnician.

Thala, a city of great extent, taken notice of by Sal-luuf, situated, like Capfa, in the midst of mountains and deserts, though there were some fountains without the city. All which particulars agree with the situation of the modern Ferre-anah, in the south-west part of this province.

Twelve leagues to the S. E. by E. of this place is Gaffa, the Capfa of the antients, and one of the strong castles of Jugurtha. It is built upon a rising ground, inclosed, almost in every direction, with mountains; and hath the like melancholy situation with Ferre-anah, only with this difference, that the landscape here is somewhat more gay and verdant by the prospect we have from it of the palm, olive, pitaehio, and other fruit-trees. In the eastern languages the word signifies stroightly environed, and so the place is on every side by solitudes and deserts; which is a good proof that it was originally Phœnician. There seem to have been been two more cities of this name, the one in Numidia, the other in Libya Interior.

Suffetula, Turzo, Sarsura, Tisdra, or Tisdrus, Caraga, Orbita, and other obscure towns of Byzacium, of which we know nothing but the bare names, either entirely depend upon the faith of Ptolemy, were always inconsiderable in themselves, or built below the classic period of time; and therefore, as they cannot have the least tendency to illustrate any part of the Carthaginian history, or supply us with the least hint or circumstance relative thereto, we shall pass them over in silence, and conclude our geographical remarks upon this country with a concise description of the most celebrated lakes, rivers, and other principal curiosities of it, and a brief enumeration of the African nations, who in the remotest times possessed it.

The chief lakes of this region taken notice of by the antients (besides the lake Hipponitis above-mentioned, and the Palus Sifara joined to it, of no great repute) were the Palus Tritonis or Tritonitis, the Palus Pallas, and the Palus Libya; all which, according to Ptolemy, had a communication with one another, by means of the river Triton, which ran thro' them into the sea. But herein that geographer was greatly deceived. The source of the Triton is nearer the sea than these lakes, which are now known to be different parts or branches of the same lake, whose modern name is, the Shibkah El Lowdeah, or lake of marks, so called from a number of trunks of palm-trees, that are placed at proper distances, to direct the caravans in their marches over it. This lake extends itself near twenty leagues from east to west, and is interspersed with several dry spots, which appear like islands in it. To the eastward especially, in the same meridian with Telemeen, there is one, which, though uninhabited, is very large, and well stocked with date trees. This seems to be the Cheroneus of Diodorus, and the Phla of Herodotus; and the date trees in it, according to a tradition of the Arabs, sprung originally from the stones of those dates which the Egyptians brought with them for provisions, many ages since, when they invaded this part of Africa, and halted here. The Punic name perhaps was Tarit, Terit, or Trit, i. e. paffurage. pasturage, or pasture-ground; for, if we may believe Scylax and Herodotus, it served as a boundary to the Libyan Nomades, who abounded with flocks and herds, and whose country must of consequence have been of such a nature as the word tarit imports the ground bordering upon the lake and river Triton to have been. Scylax makes the lake to have been in his time about a thousand stadia in circumference, which agrees tolerably well with the best modern description we find given of it. Feftus tells us, that the goddess Minerva first appeared in the neighbourhood of this place.

The most famous river of Africa Propria was the Bagrada, Bagadras, or Bragada, for it went by all those names. On the banks of which, Regulus, in the first Punic war, by the help of his battering engines, killed a serpent of a monstrous size, being an hundred and twenty foot in length, whose skin and jaw-bones were preferred at Rome till the Numantine war. Ptolemy derives this river from mount Mampfurus where he fixes its source, making it bend its course almost directly from north to south; and herein he is followed by the late geographers: but this is a mistake, its stream flowing in a direction almost from west to east. At this day it is called the Me-jerdah, whose first and most affluent branches are the small rivers Hameese and Myfske-anah, in the district of the Hen-neifha; which, with the concurrent streams of the Wed el Boule, Sciliiana, and some other rivulets of the Frig-cah, render it as large as the Isis and Cherwell united. By running through a rich and fertile country, it becomes so well watered with soil, that it is of the fame complexion with the Nile, and appears to have no lefs the property of making encroachments upon the sea. Utica stood upon the western bank of the Bagrada, and Carthage on the other side, but at some distance from it. Bochart will have the Phcenicians to have pronounced the name Bragda or Brattha, i.e. a pond, and produces several authorities, which give a great air of probability to his opinion.

The Catada of Ptolemy, now the Miliana, is famous for nothing but having Tunis seated upon the mouth of it; nor the Triton, now the Gabbs, but on account of the lake of

of the same name already described. However, it may not be improper to observe, that it has its source only about three or four leagues to the S. S. W. of Gabbs, and becomes at once a considerable stream, near as big as the Cherwell.

Among the principal curiosities of this country are to be ranked the Hammam Leef (D), a noted hot bath, very much resorted to by the citizens of Tunis; the hot bath, with some ruins, at the creek of Gurbos, the Aque Calidæ of Livy; the salt lake near To-bulba, the Stagnum Salinarum of Hirtius; the Jibbel Had-defla, an entire mountain of salt, situated near the eastern extremity of the lake of marks, whose salt is as hard and solid as stone, and of a reddish or purple colour; the lead oars at Jibbel Rif-safa, near Hammam Leef, which are very rich. To which many others might be added, did we not chuse to reserve them for a more proper place (E).

(D) These hammams, or baths, are so called from the Hebrew or Chaldee verb בֵּית, hamam incaluit, their waters being hot, though not all in the same degree; perhaps the words hammams, which we have adopted into our language, of the same import, is to be deduced from the same original.

(E) We shall beg leave in this note just to mention the principal islands on the coast of Africa Propria, taken notice of by the antients, which are the following:

1. Cosyria or Coyrius, a small island in the African sea, which some authors refer to Sicily; but Strabo makes it part of the proper territory of Carthage. According to Ptolemy, it had a city of the same name, which, by reason of its vicinity to Carthage, was doubtless a place of some repute. Scylax tells us it was a day's sail only from the promontory Lilybæum in Sicily; and Strabo places it in the middle of the African sea, at an equal distance from Lilybæum and Clypea, a city of Africa Propria. From some antique coins, exhibited by Paruta and Lucas Holtenius, it appears, that Cosyrius was the name most frequently used. According to Strabo, this island was an hundred and fifty stadia in circumference (5).

2. The Tarichæ of Strabo were certain minute islands very near the coast of Africa Propria, almost opposite to Lebris Minor.

Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

The most antient inhabitants of this country were, according to Herodotus, the Auecs, situated to the west of the river Triton, whose capital city was doubtlesse Auza or Auzate, said by Menander Ephesius to be built by Eth-baal or Ithobal, king of Tyre; the Maxyes, a Libyan nation; the Machlyes, another Libyan nation near the lake Tritonis; the Zaueces; and the Zygantes, who took a particular delight in bees, and making of honey. These were, in all likelihood, a mixture of old Libyans or Africans and Phoenicians, a more distinct account of whom may be expected from us when we come to treat of the different nations of Libya.

nor. They are at present called the Jowries, and lie over-against Lempta and To-bulba. Caesar seems to have looked upon them as posts of some importance, which is all that we have at present to lay of them (6).

3 Lopadusa, opposite to Thapsus above mentioned, and six miles long, if we will believe Pliny. The same author affirms it to have been fifty miles distant from Cercina and Cercinitas, two small islands belonging to the Regio Syrta (7).

4. Æthufa or Ægula, another little island mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy, lying a little to the westward of the former (8).

5. The Larunefia, two small islands, according to the Palatine MS. of Ptolemy, that lay above Rufpina (9).

6. The Infula Dracontia of Ptolemy, to the north of Hippo Diarrhytus. Two little flat contiguous islands called the Cani, not far from cape Blanco, seem at this day to bid fair for the same situation that Ptolemy assigns his Infula Dracontia (10).

7. Galata, a little island above Tabraca, three hundred fathoms from the continent of Africa (11).

8. Ægimurus, a small island in the gulph of Carthage, about thirty miles from that capital. Pliny affords us, that there were two rocks near this island called the Ares Ægimuri or Ægimori, which, according to Servius, were the remains of an island, some ages before his time aborpt by the sea. This author likewise informs us, that they were called Ares, because on them the Romans and Carthaginians concluded a treaty, and made them the limits of their respective dominions. The modern Zowa moor, between cape Zibeeb and cape Bon or Rafaddar, the Zimbra of our sea charts is undoubtedly the Ægimurus of the antients (12).

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III

As for the climate, modern state, and natural history of Africa Propria, both with regard to its animal, vegetable, and subterraneous productions, we shall defer what we have to say on each of those heads, till, according to the method already proposed to ourselves, we come to write the history of the states of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli.

S E C T. III.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, customs, arts, learning, and trade, of the Carthaginians.

The Carthaginians being originally Phoenicians, were the descendants of the old Canaanites, and therefore could trace up their antiquity as high as Canaan, the son of Ham, the acknowledged progenitor of that people. All the Greek and Roman writers, that make any mention of their affairs, are clear in this point, without the least variation. And that they themselves were of the same opinion, is evident from a tradition prevailing amongst their posterity to late as St. Austin's days; from the authority of Servius and Procopius; and from the strong attachment they always shewed to the customs and manners of that nation, from which these authors deduce them. One of the Punic names of Carthage, according to Plautus, was Chaedreanech, or Chadre-Anak, which Bochart with great reason imagines to allude to their Canaanith extraction; for Anak and his family, upon account of their extraordinary size of body, and distinguished valour, being esteemed both by sacred and profane writers as the most famous of the Canaanites or Phoenicians, from him the whole nation, or at least that part of it bordering upon the sea-coast near the place of his residence, might probably receive a new denomination (A). This is to be understood of the most early Phoenician

(A) To what has been already observed (1) of the Anakims may

Phoenician colonies settled in Africa, and many of their descendents; for it is to be naturally supposed, that some of these may be added, that profane authors themselves, as well as scripture, seem to have had some knowledge of them. Pausanias (2) tells us, that in the island Aetolia near Miletus, the body of the hero Aetolus, from whom the island received its name, was buried; that he was the son of Anax, or Anak, who was the son of the Earth; that his body was ten cubits long; and that the whole territory of the Milesians was antiently called Anaetoria, from his father Anax, or Anak. Euthathius (3) and the epitomizer of Stephanus agree with Pausanias, in relation to the antient name of Miletus, with its districts; and add, that this Anax was the son of Heaven and Earth. We are assured by scripture (4), that the Anakims, when driven out of their own country by Joshua, fled to Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod, and there settled themselves, and it is likewise probable (5) from the Phoenician history, that Gath, the metropolis of these Anakims, was subject to the kings or judges of Tyre, as early as the days of Pygmalon; since it had revolted from the Tyrians some time before the reign of Hezekiah king of Judah. From whence we may conclude, that some of this family might even attend Dido into Africa, though it is at the same time very likely, that many of them, after their chiefs had been cut off by David (6), might likewise retire to their countrymen, who had fixed their abode in Africa ever since the days of Joshua (7). We must not omit, that the Dioscuri (8), who were Phoenician gods, i.e. deified Phoenicians of great distinction, were called Anakes, or Anakims, by the Greeks, on account, no doubt, of their superior stature and majesty. The word anax or anak (9) was a term of great honour amongst the most antient Greeks, being applied only to their kings and heroes. It has been imagined by some, that this is a common name, answering to the Latin Torquatus (10), and that the great men in the east were in the earliest times so called, on account of the rich collar or chain that they usually wore about their necks. Benjamin of Tudela (11) affirms, that he saw a human rib hanging up in a palace at Damascus, which was nine Spanish palms long, and two broad; and that from an inscription upon the tomb-stone, it appeared, that one of the Anakims was buried there, whose name was Abchamaz, and who was said to have reigned over the whole world, i.e. over a good part of the east, these mixed with the Aborigines, or native Africans, whom they found there upon their arrival, and with them, or a least a considerable body of them, formed one people. And for this reason it is, that the inhabitants of Byzacium, especially of the maritime parts of it, were sometimes called by the Greeks and Romans, Libyphoenicians, as consisting of both nations (B). But a fuller account of the name, as well as a more particular description, of the people with whom the Phoenicians were incorporated, will be found in a proper place.

Dr. Hyde, in his notes upon Peritfol ¹, is of another opinion; but, in order to support it, he has recourse to hypotheses only, and those such as have but a slender foundation.

On east, or all the countries in that neighbourhood. But whether this inscription ought to be looked upon as genuine, or of a late date in comparison of the age of the Anakims, and founded only upon some Oriental tradition, is what we shall not take upon us to determine

(B) The Byzacium of Pliny (12) seems to be the Byzacia of Polybius, if we will give credit to Salmasius's emendation of a passage in Stephanus where he quotes the twelfth book of that historian. A strong presumption in favour of this is, that both Pliny and Polybius's provinces have the same extent, the same situation, and their names are pretty much alike (13). Byzacium, according to the Greek and Roman authors, consisted of two parts, the maritime or exterior, and the mediterranean or interior (14), both which were inhabited by the Libyphoenicians. Bochart derives the name from the oriental word biza (15), a text, and thinks it was so denominated from its surprising fertility, of which that was a symbol amongst most nations. So Virgil, Terra antiqua potens armis, atq; ubere glebæ. Aen. i.

Et fertilis ubere campus. Georg. i. ii,

Which, according to the scholiast, signifies a most fertile and beautiful part of the country. 'The Mamma of Procopius (16) in this province, a word of the same import with Biza, greatly strengthens this derivation.

On the contrary, Bochart \(^k\) proves what he advances by unquestionable authorities, the only solid arguments in points of this nature, of which he produces such a train, as will not easily be overborn.

Some \(^1\) authors have imagined, that the Libyphoenicians, or, as Strabo and most of the other Greek writers call them, the Libophoenicians, were a nation distinct both from the Africans, or Libyans, and Carthaginians, and inhabited a different tract. It is certain the true or Asiatic Phoenicians and Syrians, bordering upon their respective frontiers, were called Syrophoenicians, upon account of their intermixing one with another, and by way of contradistinction from the people inhabiting the opposite parts of those two regions, who were known by their proper names, Syrians and Phoenicians. In conformity to our notion of the people we are here discussing of, Livy \(^m\) styles them mifsum Punicum Afris genus; and Diodorus \(^a\) speaks of them to the same effect.

The first government settled at Carthage \(^o\) was probably monarchical; but this seems to have been but of short continuance, as expiring with Dido herself, or rather in her lifetime, when it was changed into a republic. As to the particular form of this republic, authors differ. Aristotle tells us, that it was partly aristocratical \(^p\), and partly (as he terms it) political, i. e. democratical (C). According to Polybius \(^q\), monarchy,

(C) Πολιτικα (polity or policy) taken in a general sense (17), signified, according to Aristotle, any form of government, where the laws had their due force and efficacy. In a more confined sense it was among the ancient Greeks before Aristotle’s time, frequently synonymous to δημοκρατια (18), (democracy) as may be proved from AEschines, and others. But when Aristotle comes to distinguish more subtilly (19), he tells us, that there were two mixed forms of government, each of which was a composition of oligarchy and democracy. That which participated most of oligarchy, was called aristocracy; but that which inclined most to democracy, went by the name of polity or policy. Both of these, in some respects (20), prevailed in the state of Carthage, as we shall monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, all centered in it. And lastly, Isocrates makes the civil government to have been oligarchical, and the military monarchical. In the forming of it, the Carthaginians undoubtedly borrowed many things from their ancestors the Tyrians, who, for several ages, made a great figure in the world, and were in high esteem on account of their wisdom, riches, and power. Aristotle intimates, that the Cretan, Lacedaemonian, and Carthaginian republics were the most perfect and best modelled of any in the world; and that these in many particulars agreed; tho' in several respects, he gives the preference to the Carthaginian. The consummate wisdom of those maxims and institutions, upon which this last was formed, appeared to him from hence, that notwithstanding the great sway the people bore in Carthage, there had been no instance, from the foundation of the city to his time, of any popular commotions capable of disturbing the public tranquillity, nor of any tyrant, who had been able, at the expense of liberty, to introduce oppression. This was a plain proof, that the three principal powers, of which the constitution of Carthage was composed, were of such a nature, as to counterpoise one another, and, by their mutual harmony, to preserve and promote the public felicity (D). These were the suffetes, the senate, and the people, who, whilst they kept within their proper bounds, where a check upon one another, and jointly concurred to render their republic of all others the most flourishing; but when, as Polybius observes, but an unaccountable fluctuation of power, the people got the ascendant over the senate, prudence was banished their councils, nothing but cabals and factions took place; and, in consequence of this, shall see hereafter, when we come to consider the defects of it; for which reason Aristotle tells us, it was composed of both. In short, polity or policy regarded men as rich and poor (21), aristocracy as rich, poor, and virtuous; both which considerations had their influence in the Carthaginian commonwealth.

(D) The legislator of the Carthaginians was undoubtedly a person of great political wisdom; yet Aristotle himself finds some defects in his institutions (22), and notwithstanding the beautiful draught he has exhibited of this republic, intimates, that the uninterrupted tranquillity it enjoyed, was, in some measure owing to chance (23).

this, such precipitate steps were taken, as first rendered this formidable state weak and contemptible, and soon after completed its destruction.

In order to give our readers some idea of the Carthaginian government, though the antients afford us little light on this head, we shall give a brief account of the three principal powers above-mentioned.

The suffetes " were two in number, of equal power and dignity, and the chief magistrates of Carthage *. They answered to the two kings of Lacedæmon, as well as to the Roman consuls; for which reason we find them tryed in different authors both kings and consuls w. However, these did not in all things correspond; for the Spartan kings were perpetual, had an hereditary right of succession y, and the state was supplied with them from two families only z; whereas the Carthaginian suffetes were annually elected out of all the noblest families, and were always such persons as most attracted the public regard by their virtue and great talents, as well as their wealth, which enabled them to support their high station with a becoming grandeur and dignity; for which reason Aristotle prefers the supreme magistrates of Carthage to those of Lacedæmon (E). As for the Roman consuls, they had not only a chief hand in the administration of civil, but likewise in the conducting of military, affairs; whereas it is very probable, that the suffetes were, generally speaking, confined to the former (F). Their province was to

(E) He prefers the suffetes to the Lacedæmonian kings, not because the Carthaginians had some regard to wealth in their election of them (for this he absolutely condemns, as will be elsewhere observed; but because they chose them out of all the best families in Carthage, and esteemed great abilities in them as an essential qualification; which was contrary to the practice of the Lacedæmonians (24).

(F) This appears not only from Livy, Polybius, and other ancient authors, but likewise from the judicious observations of Ubbo Emmius (25). However, it must be allowed, that we have to assemble the senate, in which they presided \(a\), to propose subjects for deliberation there, to tell the voices, and to preside likewise in all emergent and decisive debates. It does not appear by whose suffrages the suffetes were elected, but most likely \(b\) either by those of the centumvirate, or the people. According to some authors, they had the power of life and death \(c\), and of punishing all crimes whatsoever. Their concurrence in \(d\) all points with the senate was necessary, in order to prevent any debate from coming before the people. It is remarkable, that most, if not all, the cities of note in the Carthaginian dominions \(e\), had their suffetes or chief magistrates, as well as the metropolis.

The senate was a most august assembly, composed of persons venerable for their age and experience, as well as illustrious \(f\) on account of their birth, their riches, and, above all, their merit. They arrived at this honour by election, as we are informed by Aristotle \(g\), when he makes a comparison between the Spartan and Carthaginian senates; but who were their electors, is not known. Their number likewise we are ignorant of, tho’ from Justin \(h\) we may infer, that it greatly exceeded that of either the Spartan or Roman senators; for, according to this author, an hundred were selected from it, and appointed as judges to enquire into the conduct of their generals; and if this number was thought requisite to inspect into this single article, how many must have been deemed necessary to superintend, and, in concert with the suffetes, manage every branch of the administration? Besides, it is natural to suppose, that there was a great affinity between the customs and manners of the Sicilians and those of the Carthaginians, since these last may be justly looked on as deriving from the former.

have several instances of the suffetes commanding Carthaginian armies. Hannibal, who commanded the auxiliaries sent to the relief of the Egyptians, or Segellans; Himilco, who was general in the second expedition against Dionysius; and Mago, under whose conduct many thousand men were transported to Sicily and Italy, set this point beyond dispute \(26\).

looked upon as some of the antient inhabitants of Sicily. Now, in the time of Agathocles, the senate of Syracuse consisted of six hundred of the principal citizens; no wonder then, if that of Carthage was equal, if not much more numerous. In this grand council, every thing relating to peace and war, to negotiations and alliances, to trade and navigation; in short, to all affairs of consequence, whether foreign or domestic, were debated, and for the most part determined; so that the whole machine of government was animated and kept in motion by it; life and spirit were from thence diffused over all the public deliberations. When the votes of the senate were unanimous, they had the force of laws, and from hence there lay no appeal; but when there was either a division or a disagreement with the suffetes, the affair in question was referred to the people, who, in such a case, had the liberty of offering their sentiments freely, and even of contradicting the other parts of the legislature; and not only so, but what was thus offered passed into a law, the people, in all emergencies of this nature, being the dernier resort of power. However, as Aristotle observes, this was a flaw in the constitution, and was at last attended with fatal effects; for during the second and third Punic wars, the populace at Carthage prevailed over the senate, whilst the senatorial authority at Rome was in its full bloom and vigor; and this, if we may give credit to Polybius, was the principal cause of the rise of the one, and fall of the other. We must not omit, that none but persons of the most distinguished merit were ever elected senators, nor that their office and dignity were perpetual (G).

What

(G.) According to Livy (27), there was a council formed of such senators, as were the most venerable and eminent for their wisdom, who were called seniores, senatorum principes, or simply, as Justin (28) intimates, princes. This council was in the highest repute at Carthage, on account of the vast influence it had over

The History of the Carthaginians.  Book III.

What sway the people had in Carthage, whilst the different parts of which the constitution was framed were duly proportioned to one another, and each of them enjoyed its natural share of power, does not appear from any antient author, tho' it can scarce be doubted, but so accurate a writer as Polybius must have taken notice of it somewhere in his writings. It is likely they had a vote at the election of magistrates, at the enacting of laws, particularly those in which they were more immediately concerned; and, in short, in every thing that bore any relation to them. In Aristotle's days, the commonwealth seems to have deviated from its original perfection, having too strong a tendency to popular government, which was censured as a defect in it by that philosopher. However, the senate still kept up a good degree of authority, and the power of the people was far from being uncontrollable; but in Hannibal's time, about an hundred years after, there was reason to apprehend a total subversion of the constitution, the senate had little regard or attention paid to it; the people arrogated to themselves almost the whole power, and of course every thing, which might have promoted the public welfare, was obstructed by a few ambitious and implacable demagogues. From this period the most famous and potent state of Carthage began to decline, and, in the course of a few years, lost not only its liberty, but its very being.

Having

over the senate (29). Recourse was therefore had to it in all cases of an extraordinary nature. It is not improbable, that this council was Aristotle's centumvirate, as being invested with great authority, and consisting of a pretty large number of members. Livy tells us (30) that thirty of these were deputed to wait upon Scipio, and due him in the most submissive terms for a peace with Rome. Polybius likewise makes a distinction between these and the other senators; for he says, that among the prisoners taken at New Carthage by Scipio, there were two [ις τις γερελαίος] belonging to the assembly of old men and fifteen [ις τις αλάκτα] of the senate (31). In other authors, the senate, or at least this most venerable part of it, went by appellations equivalent to the optimates and patres conscripti of the Romans (32).

CHAP. 37. THE HISTORY OF THE CARthagINIANS.

HAVING thus laid down a general sketch or plan of the Carthaginian government, we shall mention some of their principal establishments, civil officers, &c. as taken notice of by the ancients, who, it must be owned, have been extremely deficient in all their memoirs relating to this republic; for which reason the loss of those excellent pieces of Polybius, that, through the injuries of time, have not reached us, is the more to be regretted.

The centumvirate or tribunal of the hundred, consisted of an hundred and four persons, not simply of an hundred, as the name seems to imply, receiving its denomination from the greater number w. According to Aristotle, who is the only author that has given us any description of it x, the power it enjoyed was very extensive, tho' confined chiefly to things of a judicial nature y. Out of this tribunal were selected five judges, whose jurisdiction was superior to that of the rest, to whom we may, with propriety enough, give the name of quinquevirs, or the quinquevirate. They had the power not only of filling up all vacancies in their own body, but likewise of chusing those persons who composed the tribunal of the hundred z; were, under the suffetes, at the head of this tribunal; and had, in a great measure, the lives, fortunes, reputations, &c. of all the citizens depending upon them. Aristotle a informs us, that the Carthaginian centumvirate, answered in several respects to the ephori at Sparta; but, with submission to this philosopher, we think the quinquevirate should be substituted in its room, as having a better title to the comparison: for b with regard to the ephori, first, they were the most despotic magistrates in Sparta, their authority being, in a manner, boundless, and the lives, fortunes, &c. of all the Lacedæmonians almost entirely depending upon their will and pleasure; which may be c said of the quinquevirate in Carthage, with more reason than of the centumvirate. Secondly, the centumvirate was perpetual d; but whether the quinquevirate was so or not, is uncertain. Now, the ephori were elected annually e. Thirdly, the ephori were five in number f, and so were the quinquevirs. Fourthly, an universal administration of justice, with regard to

to individuals, was the province of the quinquevirate at Carthage, as it was of the ephori at Lacedæmon; whereas the institution of the centumvirate was intended only at first as a curb to the authority of their generals; by calling them to an account for their conduct on their return from the campaign, thò afterwards it extended to many branches of civil affairs. From which considerations it is probable that the council of five in Carthage, rather than the tribunal of the hundred, resembled the Lacedæmonian ephori. The great authority annexed to the quinquevirate, gave the Carthaginian state the appearance of an oligarchy, tho' as the members of this council discharged the duties of their function without any salary or reward, and were elected freely by suffrages, not by lot (H), it had likewise the semblance of an aristocracy. Ubbο Emmius thinks, that the suffetes presided in this council, and the centumvirate, as well as in the senate, being the chief magistrates concerned in the administration of justice. If so, their office was, in all probability, perpetual, till the time of Hannibal, by whose influence a law passed, whereby it was enacted, that all the judges should be chosen annually; with a clause, that none should continue in office beyond that term. This last observation will point out to us the reason why the supreme magistrates at Carthage were called suffetes, and enable us to trace up that institution to its first source (I).
Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

The principal, if not only, civil officers established at Carthage (besides the suffetes) that have been remembered by the verb תַּפָּה tzaphah, "he looked from on high, or, he overlooked others;" and so makes it agree in signification with the Greek ἰδων, ἰδωτις, ἰδωκοτις, &c. (35). But this, notwithstanding it has some appearance of truth, is not so easy and grammatical as Bochart's etymon. That learned man, after the great Selden, will have suffetes to be the same word with מַפָּה fophetim, or ofetim, judges, magistrates, &c. which notion is absolutely confirmed, not only by what we have advanced, but likewise by Paulus, Calidius, and Fehtus (36). If this be allowed, it cannot well be denied, that the Carthaginian suffetes reembled very much the old judges of the Israelites, who governed that nation from the death of Joshua to the election of Saul, the first king of Israel. We say this cannot well be denied; for these old judges were called in Hebrew fophetim, or ofetim, for which reason the Hebrews always flyled the book of judges fophetim; and this very government flourished in the neighbourhood of Tyre, the mother of Carthage. We may therefore reasonably presume, that the Carthaginians borrowed their suffetes either from Tyre, or immediately from the Israelites themselves, by whom some of their ancestors the Canaanites were at first expelled their country in the time of Joshua, and others in the time of David, after they had, for a considerable period, been contiguous to them. If the Carthaginians derived this institution from the Tyrians, these last probably received it from the Israelites their neighbours. However this may be, it is certain such magistrates as these were in Tyre after the destruction of the old city by Nebuchadnezzar; for Josephus, in his treatise against Apion, has given us a series of them (37). It ought to be observed, that but one person was invested with the supreme authority amongst the Hebrews during the government of the fophetim, which was likewise the custom at Tyre; and therefore it is natural to suppose, that it was so originally at Carthage also (38). The Romans had very inadequate ideas of the Carthaginian government in general, and of their magistrates in particular; and therefore we cannot absolutely depend upon their accounts of them. Yet even from some of these it seems not improbable, that one of the suffetes, even towards the decline of Carthage, had a greater share of power than the other; which is a sort of proof, that at first the power of the suffetes was lodged in a single hand. Justin calls Hanno the prince, or principal per-

Son of Carthage. Cornelius Nepos gives Hannibal the name of prætor; Livy and Gellius of dictator. 'Tis plain Hannibal was by far the greatest man in the city, because he over-ruled all the other magistrates, when he limited the power of the whole bench of judges. Feustus lays the sufetes (or, according to the Carthaginian pronunciation, sufet, as appears from the genitive café sufetis) was the supreme magistrate of Carthage. And lastly, from some inscriptions in Gruter, it is clear, that several cities in Africa had each of them a sufete (39). The old Archontic government, that took place at Athens after the death of Codrus, seems likewise to have been of this form. We find some little variation in the Carthaginian word sufetes from the Hebrew sopherim, which is owing partly to the Latin termination, and partly to the affinity betwixt the Punic language and the Syriac. That ES is a Latin plural termination, needs no proof; and that the Punic language was near akin to the Syriac, though it borrowed most of its words from the Hebrew, is evident, not only from the nature of the thing, but likewise from the authority of St. Jerom, St. Augustin, (40), and Priscian. What therefore the Hebrews wrote sopherim, the Carthaginians in all probability, wrote sufetes, or emphatically sufetēs (םפריט) or E being the emphatical masculine plural termination in Syriac, as igenous was the absolute one. The Hebrew vaucholem, or O, answered to the Syriac and Punic V (41); and though the MSS of Livy and Nepos have sufetes with a double F, yet, from the authority of Feustus, Calidius, and the above-mentioned inscriptions, they ought to be corrected, the true reading being undoubtedly sufetes with a single F. We have been a little more prolix than usual in this note, because we take the subject of it to be of a very curious nature, and such a one as may lead us to farther discoveries both in sacred and profane history.

red upon him in the fifth year after the conclusion of the second Punic war; from whence it is evident, that this must have been one of the first employments in the state. The person invested with this high dignity had a vast influence, not only in passing, but likewise in repealing of laws, as may be inferred from Hannibal’s impeaching the whole bench of judges, and carrying his point against them, during his continuance in this office. He moreover received the tribute paid by the different nations under the Carthaginian power; collected the yearly taxes and subsidies levied upon the citizens, and had the care of every thing relating to the public revenues. It is remarkable, that a transition from the office of suffetes (after it became annual) to the praetorship, was not uncommon in Carthage; of which Hannibal and Mago, not to mention other instances that might be produced, supply us with abundant proof. Whether there were more praetors than one in this republic, or whether any branches of business, besides those above-mentioned, pertaining to the office, are points that, for want of sufficient light from antiquity, cannot be determined.

The quaestor was an officer belonging to the bench of judges, who, tho’ subordinate to them, had a very considerable degree of power. He likewise collected and managed the public money, under the praetor; which induced Livy to give him the name of quaestor. This officer, in his double capacity, seems to have answered to the old Roman quaestors, who were introduced under the regal government, as well as those who were appointed in the time of the commonwealth. He was sometimes at least, if not of course, admitted into the bench of judges, at the expiration of his office. This, and the other particulars, we learn from Livy and Polybius; but as to any thing further, either concerning him or his function, we are entirely in the dark.

We find another civil officer established at Carthage, whose business it was to inspect into the manners of the citizens; on which account he is styled by Cornelius Nepos, the prefect of manners, or the censor. Hamilcar, the father of Hannibal, tho’ the first man in the republic, could not escape this inspection; for the censor took from from him a beautiful youth, named Afdrubal, on a report that he was more familiar with this youth than was consistent with modesty; from whence we may conclude, that the power of this magistrate extended to every subject of the state, even those of the greatest figure and distinction.

As for the Carthaginian laws, our readers must not expect any regular system of them. The utmost we can pretend to is, to give them a few fragments, or rather traces of an inconsiderable part of these laws. They have all long since been buried in oblivion; nor have even the titles of any of them, but what we here produce, escaped the general wreck of time.

1. There was a law of very long standing amongst the Carthaginians, by which they were enjoined to sacrifice to Saturn only children nobly born. This, not being complied with for a certain period, grew into difuse, the children of slaves and foreigners being substituted in the room of the others. But when Agathocles reduced Carthage almost to the last extremity, it was revived, the inhabitants imputing all their misfortunes to the anger of Saturn, who, as they imagined, was offended at the non-obseriance of this law. However, to atone for this crime, two hundred children of the best families in the city were offered up to that deity.

2. By another law, Ceres and Proserpina were admitted into the number of Carthaginian deities. Magnificent statues were erected in their honour; priests were selected from amongst the most distinguished families of the city for their service; and sacrifices, after the Greek manner, were offered up to them. This happened during the consternation the people of Carthage were thrown into by the African invasion, and the ill success that attended them in their war with Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse. It was done in order to appease the anger of those goddesses, whose farther resentment they feared, because Himilco, the Carthaginian general in Sicily, had plundered their temples in the suburb of Acradina.

3. About this time likewise a law was enacted at Carthage, by which all the inhabitants were prohibited learning either to write or speak the Greek language. It was hoped hoped by this means to prevent for the future all treasonable correspondence with the enemy. The law was occasioned by a Carthaginian traitor, who, writing in Greek to Dionysius, had given him intelligence of the motions of the army, and particularly of its departure from the city (K). But this law was afterwards either repealed, or totally neglected; for we find, that the great Hannibal himself understood this language so well, that he composed in it an history of the actions of Manlius Vulso during the time of his proconsulship in Afia, having been taught it by Sofilus the Lacedaemonian (L).

4. It has been lately hinted, that a council was formed at Carthage, consisting of an hundred persons taken out of the senate, whose province it was to enquire into the conduct of their generals at the end of the campaign. Now, it cannot be supposed, that this could any otherwise have been effected, than by a law passed for that purpose. The ends proposed by this law were, to reduce the exorbitant power of Mago's family within proper bounds, which, by ingrossing all the best employments, was become too overgrown for the state; and to secure the republic against the great

(K) This traitor's name was Sunitor, Sunites, or Sunitatur, a professed enemy to Hanno the Carthaginian general, and who, in order to hurt him, did not scruple an attempt to sacrifice his country. He was a citizen of the first rank, and wrote to Dionysius in Greek, giving him advice of the military preparations making against him, as well as the incapacity of Hanno for the post he was in; but his letter being intercepted, he received the punishment due to his crime (42).

(L) This Sofilus, with Philenius or Silenus, another Lacedaemonian, attended Hannibal in all his expeditions. That general spoke Greek with a tolerable fluency, and is said to have written other books in this language, besides the work here mentioned. Sofilus and Silenus undertook to write the history of their hero; but whether or no they executed that design, is not known. If they did, we are never the better for it; since not a fragment of either of their pieces has come to us (43).

great authority of its generals in all succeeding ages, who, whilst in the field, were quite despotic. It is generally believed, that this council was the same with the centumvirate, or a tribunal of the hundred, which has been already described.

5. A sort of sumptuary law was made by the Carthaginian senate, to restrain all kinds of excheques at marriages. This was occasioned by a design of Hanno, the principal person in the city, to make himself master of the commonwealth upon the day of his daughter’s marriage. In order to this, his intention was to keep open house for the populace that day, and to regale the senate in a most magnificent manner. All the members of this last were to have been taken off by poison at this entertainment, which would have enabled him to seize upon the government without opposition. Hanno, upon account of his great wealth and power, had such an influence in the city, that the senate, upon the discovery of this plot, did not think proper to punish him for it; but contented themselves with passing the law here mentioned.

Before we conclude our account of the political state of Carthage, it may not be amiss to take notice of a few defects in that constitution, as Aristotle himself has pointed them out to us (M).

(M) Since we follow Aristotle here in reciting the defects of this state, it will be but just, by way of contrast, to touch upon two things, which may be considered as excellencies in it.

1. The Carthaginians had public meals or entertainments, which seem to have been appointed at first in imitation of the Lacedaemonian phidia, and in order to serve the same ends. The phidia were one of the most useful institutions of Lycurgus, which, as is imagined, he received from Crete, because they went at first by the Cretan name Andria. They were intended to repress all kinds of luxury; to form the minds of the Lacedaemonian youth, by inspiring them with virtuous sentiments; and to excite a noble emulation amongst them. At these meals young people were instructed by their seniors in the art of conversation, heard the most useful topics frequently discussed, and had always before them shining examples of wisdom and virtue. But it is sufficient just to have hinted this here, since an ample account of the institution itself has been given in its proper place.

Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

First, The philosopher looked upon it as an imperfection in this commonwealth, that when the members of the senate were not unanimous in their voices, the power of deciding thereby devolved on the people; for this he intimates to be contrary to the maxims of all well regulated states, as tending too much to popular government.

Secondly, He will have it, that the quinquevirate, or, as he terms it, the pentarchy, enjoyed a degree of power inconsistent with the nature of a true aristocracy, which either originally was, or at least was intended to have been, a principal ingredient in the Carthaginian constitution.

Thirdly, He reckons it an evil, that merit and a conspicuous birth, without riches, were not sufficient qualifications for a man to fill the first posts; for this in his opinion, does not only oftentimes exclude persons of the most exalted merit from having any share in the government, but likewise opens a door to avarice, and all kinds of corruption, which, in the end, must ruin any state. The experience of after-ages shewed this reflection of his not to have been ill-grounded; for the Barcan faction, by the omnipotence of money, carried their point on all occasions for a considerable time; others after them did the like, which at last proved the republic's destruction.

Fourthly, He will by no means allow, that the same person should assume to himself several employments; than which no practice was more common at Carthage. The reasons he assigns for this are, that a man possessed of but one office, is much more capable of acquiring himself well in the execution of it; that public affairs are managed with more spirit and expedition, when the different branches of business are lodged in different hands; that different employments frequently clash with one another;

1 Aristot. ubi supra.

2. The Carthaginians had a laudable custom amongst them, of sending colonies from time to time into different parts of their dominions (46). This procured a decent settlement for several citizens, for whom there was no room in the state; provided for the necessities of the poor, and carried off great numbers of people, who were always prepared for innovations. All which salutary precautions must not a little contribute to the preservation of the public tranquility.

(46) Aristot. ubi supra c. 11. sub. fin. another; and lastly, that the welfare of every state is highly promoted by an equal distribution of its places amongst its members. All which reasons are indisputably just, especially the last; since nothing more strongly excites an emulation amongst men of merit, than an impartial disposal of the pre-ferments in a state amongst them, nor more effectually prevents all those inconveniences which must be the necessary consequence of one man's monopolizing the whole administration.

FIFTHLY, He blames the Carthaginian constitution in general, for not having a sufficient provision made in it against all popular commotions, or acts of violence, that at any time might happen. Should a majority of the citizens at any time have taken it into their heads to revolt, or be angry with their governors, the laws (N), according to him, could not have afforded a sufficient relief on such an occasion. This constitution, indeed, as we have already observed from him, was at first excellently calculated to prevent or avoid all intedisorders; but it was not so well contrived, at least in his time, to allay any heats that might break out in it. He therefore seems justly to conclude, that the tranquillity and repose of the subjects of Carthage were not then settled upon a solid foundation.

(N) In this respect it seems to have been the same form of government as that introduced by Phaleas Chalcedonius, which has induced a learned man to believe, that he was the legislator of the Carthaginians (47). When he lived, Aristotle (48), who mentions both him and his republic, informs us not; but he must have been much later than the first formation of the Carthaginian republic, for Chalcedon itself was built near three hundred years after Carthage. However, there seems to be some foundation for the above-mentioned conjecture, as will appear from comparing Hendreich with Aristotle (49). It is therefore probable, that the first commonwealth settled at Carthage, which took place immediately after the abolition of monarchy, was of a diff erent form from that which existed in Aristotle's time. This, in all likelihood, nearly resembled (if it was not exactly upon the fame model) the ancient Tyrian or Hebrew republic, wherein one supreme magistrate presided. What we have advanced in a former note (50) will strengthen this supposition, and likewise it-selves receive additional force from it.

Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

The Carthaginians being descended from the Tyrians, their religious worship must of course have agreed in all points at first with that of the Phœnicians, which has been already in some measure described. In process of time, by their intercourse with the Greeks, especially those of Sicily, they came to take a liking to the superflition of that nation, adopted several new deities before to them unknown, and intermixed some of the Greek religious ceremonies with the Tyrian. But in this they copied after their ancestors the Phœnicians, who gradually imbibed many superflitious notions prevailing among the greatest states, by reason of their vicinity to, and correspondence with, them; and afterwards, upon their subjection to those states, had great alterations made in the whole system of their religion. The Carthaginians likewise, by reason of their extended commerce, must have been in some sort acquainted with the different kinds of superflition established in most nations, with which doubtless they tinctured their own; so that from hence, as well as from other considerations, it may appear, that the religion of Carthage, was a very gross and multifarious idolatry.

The knowledge we have of the Carthaginian manner of worship, as well as the objects of that worship, is derived from the Greek and Roman writers, who have affixed the names of their own gods to those of the Carthaginians. This has rendered their accounts and observations on this head more imperfect and less valuable; for though we are well assured, that the Egyptian, Phœnician, Greek, Roman, and Carthaginian deities did in the main agree, yet we are as well assured, that each of those nations had not only some particular modes of worship, but likewise some particular deities peculiar to itself. 'Tis impossible therefore to come to an exact knowledge of the Carthaginian gods from what is delivered of them by the Greek and Roman authors. All that we can do is, to consider their different attributes, and the circumstances attending that adoration their votaries paid them, as given us by the aforesaid authors. By comparing these with what we find related in holy writ of the idols of the Canaanites and neighbouring nations, as well as the religious customs and manners of those nations, we may, perhaps, give our readers a tolerable account of the religion of the Carthaginians.

Diodorus

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the Carthaginians, in a particular manner, adored Chronus; who, according to Quintus Curtius, and an infinity of other authors, was the Saturn of the Latins. The sacrifices offered up to him were children of the most distinguished families, as has been above observed. Upon the signal defeat of the Carthaginian army by Agathocles, three hundred citizens voluntarily sacrificed themselves, in order to render him more propitious to their country. Diodorus farther says, that they had a brazen statue or colossus of him, the hands of which were extended in an to receive, and bent downwards in such a manner, as that the child laid thereon immediately dropped into a hollow, where was a fiery furnace.

The same author adds, that this inhuman practice seemed to him to confirm a tradition handed down to the Greeks from very early antiquity, viz. that Chronus devoured his own children. But in this we cannot agree with him; for it can scarce be doubted, but that the fable itself owes its origin to this most execrable superstition, especially as the knowledge of it could not be hid from the antient Greeks, who received both their religion and theology from the Egyptians and Phoenicians (O).

But though the Carthaginian god, to whom human victims were so agreeable, had the name of Chronus given him by Diodorus, yet we cannot certainly infer from hence, that he was the same deity; because his Punic name is unknown, and

(O) Bishop Cumberland proves from several authors, that human sacrifices were offered to Cabiri, and Sanchoniathon afferts, that Chronus or Saturn sacrificed his son to the manes of his father, whom he had before inhumanly murdered. From which source the learned bishop derives the unnatural practice here mentioned, which prevailed for many ages over a great part both of the eastern and western world. But the fragment of Sanchoniathon, preferred by Philo Byblius and Eusebius, notwithstanding all the learned bishop's endeavours, as well as those of M. Fourmont, to render it intelligible, is so dark and intricate especially in this particular, that we cannot entirely depend upon it.

and therefore 'tis impossible to determine whether it was of the same import with Chronus, or no. However, we shall endeavour to supply this defect, by offering some reasons, which if they will not absolutely evince the point in view, will yet render it highly probable.

1. In the first place, the Carthaginian custom of giving up their offspring as an expiatory sacrifice to this god, bears a great analogy to the Greek tradition concerning Chronus, viz. that he devoured his own children. This seems to have been a great inducement to Diodorus himself to conclude, that he and Chronus were the same.

2. Both the oblations offered to this Carthaginian deity, and the manner of offering them, as likewise the brazen statue mentioned by Diodorus, plainly enough shew, that he was Moloch u or Milchom, the famous idol of the Ammonites, Canaanites, and neighbouring nations. The description already given of this false divinity, in conjunction with scripture, will remove all doubts as to this point. Now that Moloch or Milchom was the Chronus of Diodorus, seems clear from the following considerations (P).

CHRONUS

(P) Nothing can be more evident, than that Moloch, Milcom, Baal, Bel, Chronus, &c. are all words of the same signification. They denote a king or prince. Chronus, in particular, does so. The word керн or kren properly imports a horn, which was an emblem of power and dominion amongst the eastern nations. From thence undoubtedly our English word crown is to be deduced, or at least the Latin corona, if it should be thought more proper to derive the English word from this. It might likewise, for aught we know to the contrary, antiently have signified a crown, since all the eastern princes were, from the earliest antiquity, adorned with that ensign of royalty; and Tertullian (53) tells us, that Chronus was the first who wore it. Eupolemus, as preferred to us by Alexander Polyhistor in Eusebius, Theophilus Antiochenus, and Damascius, compared with scripture, render it incontrovertibly clear, that Chronus, Moloch, and Baal, were the same person (54). We shall beg leave here to consider a difficult

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

Chronus had, for a considerable period, even amongst the old inhabitants of Latium, human victims offered up to him, as Moloch had in Palestine.

A difficult passage of scripture, which is not at all foreign to our present subject (55). In the original it is: "εἰς τὴν θυσίαν τὸν Παλαιστίνην, which being rendered exactly according to the letter, is; but ye have borne the tabernacle of your (god) Moloch, and (ye have likewise borne) Chium your likenesses, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves (56). St. Luke's (or rather the Septuagint) version of this into Greek, is: Καὶ ἀνεβαίνει σεκπανή τὸ Μολὼχ, καὶ τὸ ἀστέρι τὰ Θεία τίμων Ρεμφάν, τοὺς τυφλοὺς ἐποίησατε σπορακεὶν αὐτοῖς. Which ought to be thus rendered; Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch and Remphan the star of your god, (i. e. Moloch) figures which ye made, to worship them. Our readers will observe, that this is different from the common English translation, which has it; Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made, to worship them. Now surely no one can hesitate a moment in determining which of these is the most eligible. The first, in agreement with the original Hebrew, makes St. Luke to declare, that Remphan is the name of the star, not of the god. The second in contradiction to the Hebrew, will have him to assert, that Remphan or Chium is the name of the god, not of the star; which is itself a sufficient reason for our rejection of it. Besides, the common translation inculcates, that Moloch and Remphan, or Chium, were different deities; whereas, according to ours, they were the same; since it makes Chium and Remphan the names of that star, which the Egyptians and Arabians appropriated to the false deity, called by the Ammonites, Canaanites, &c. by way of eminence, Moloch. And how consonant this is to the general voice of antiquity, may be seen from the plan we are now upon. The sun, moon, and stars were the first objects of false worship; afterwards the deification of dead men took place (57). The Egyptians and Arabians adhered to the

the former species of false worship longer than the Canaanites and Phœnicians. However, all those nations agreed in this, that, from very early antiquity, they formed a mixed kind of idolatry, made up of the worship of the stars and dead men. In consequence of which they assigned a planet to each of the chief of their deified worthies, thinking this the greatest honour they could do them. The highest and most remote of the planets is known to be Saturn, whom the old Egyptians called either Remphan, Raphan, Ramphan, Rephan, Rompha or Repha; but the Arabs, Civan or Civan, (from whence the Hebrew Chinn) as the Turks, Arabs, and Persians do at this day. The Ammonites, Idumæans, and Canaanites, though they had a knowledge of this planet, and considered him as conjoined with a deified prince, yet they adored this prince under a bodily representation; whereas the Arabians and Egyptians paid divine honours to the star, with which they imagined him conjoined. Hence it came to pass, that the former addressed themselves to an image or statue, and the latter to a star, tho' they all of them intentionally pointed at the same object. Now the Israelites had learned the Egyptian idolatry during their abode in Egypt, and that of the Arabians whilst they were in Arabia Petrea, or at least its neighbourhood, where they worshipped the false god at present under consideration; and as at the same time they were upon the borders of the Canaanites, with whom doubtless they had some kind of intercourse, 'tis natural to suppose, that they were likewise initiated in their form of superstition. This will account for their having with them the Canaanitish image of Moloch, in a small portable temple, or tabernacle, carried either on men's shoulders, or by oxen; and a star painted on the inside of this tabernacle, or upon the idol itself, in compliance with the Egyptian and Arabian custom. Kircher tells us, that the name of Saturn amongst the modern Coptes is Rephan; from whence Bochart infers, that the Septuagint rendered Chinn by Kephan, because they made their version in Egypt, where this word denoted the same planet that Chinn did in Arabia and Phœnica (58). The same author likewise informs us, that Moloch signified in the old Egyptian language Mars (59). But as Moloch was a Phœnician, not an Egyptian, word; as he proves his attention only from a modern Copto-Arabic vocabulary MS. purchased at Alexandria by Sig. Pietro

Moloch was the principal god of the country in which his worship prevailed, as appears from his name, which implies

Pietro della Valle in the year 1615, and by affirming, that the Egyptian Mars, Osiris, Typhon, the Perian Mithras, &c. were the same deity, which is a palpable absurdity, we think little regard in this last point is to be paid to him. Some will have the god of the Syrians, called by the Septuagint and the Maforn, Rimmon, according to the Syriac form, Remvan, to have been the Remphan of St. Luke, as well as the Replian of the Septuagint (60). Now Saturn is the highest of the planets, as the name seems to import, and therefore might be Rimmon or Remvan. This god was moreover, without dispute, the Moloch and Baal of the Ammonites, Canaanites, &c. the Bel of the Babylonians, the Chronus of the Greeks, &c. and a deity very well known in the countries where both the Septuagint and St. Luke wrote. Bishop Cumberland imagines Saturn to have been called Replian or Replian, because he was of an healthful constitution, long life, large stature, and great strength, all which the Hebrew word includes in the idea it conveys to us (61). He farther observes, that all his descendants, who resembled him herein, were denominated Replaim; which the Septuagint in some measure confirms, by rendering Replaim, γυναικείς, giants, alluding to the superiority of strength and constitution they enjoyed. We must not omit remarking, that, in conformity to our translation of the Greek passage in the Septuagint and St. Stephen's speech, the Syriac version in Amos, v. 26 makes Moloch and Chiuin to be the same; nor that Jonathan's targum expressly calls Chiuin a star. Some critics have derived Chiuin and Replian or Remvan from two Oriental roots implying the same thing, i.e. the great principle of life and existence; which is not very different from the notion of Saturn to be found in the verses of Orpheus. Others have believed, that before the time of the Mafornites was read Chivan, and that the foot of the initial letter chapi being defaced, it appeared to the LXX. elders like reh, who therefore pronounced it Replian (62). But this is too bold a criticism, especially as St. Luke has so closely followed the aforesaid elders, and as Diodorus Siculus mentions a most opulent king of Egypt named Remphes, who flourished in very early times (63). This last is a full proof, that Remphes or Rempha was an Egyptian proper name of very high antiquity; if not, that this king was plies sovereignty in it, from his having such particular notice taken of him in scripture, and from the intimation given in holy writ, that he was the great god of the Ammonites. Now Chronus was the chief object of adoration in Italy, Crete, Cyprus, Rhodes, and all other countries where divine honours were paid him (Q.).

Lastly,

the Egyptian Saturn, or at least was worshipped under the form of the planet so called. It likewise proves, that St. Luke's Rempha or Remphan is preferable to the Repha or Rephan of the LXX. as also, that the modern Copts have borrowed their Rephan from the latter, since they have not the true Egyptian name, but one that is a corruption of it, taken from some corrupted copy, which can be no other than one of the LXX. whose original reading, we doubt not, was Rempha or Remphan. Neither is it at all improbable, that the same people have taken the name Moloch (a Phœnician or Hebrew word) from the same passage of this version, and, through ignorance, applied it to the planet Mars. What gives great weight to this conjecture is, that the notion itself is entirely repugnant to the whole dream of antiquity; and that Vettius Valens Antiochenus and Julius Firmicus positively declare, that the Egyptian or Coptic names of the planet Mars were Artes and Pyrois (64).

(Q.) A strong argument in favour of what is here advanced may likewise be drawn from the general homage paid to Saturn, as the principal of the gods in most countries. He seems to have been known to the Gauls, Scythians, Celtes, Africans, and even the most barbarous nations. Human sacrifices were offered up to him wherever his worship took place, tho' this did not continue long amongst the Greeks and Romans, whose natural sentiments of humanity and compassion soon became too strong to permit them to tolerate so infernal a practice. The solemnities observed at the offering up of human victims to the Carthaginian god (whose name we may reasonably suppose was either Baal or Moloch, or both) answered pretty nearly to those observed by the Canaanites on the like dire occasion, as we learn from Plutarch.* This is a further presumption, that the Phœnician Moloch and this deity were the same. 'Tis an ingenious conjecture of Banier (65), that the Ammonites worshipped the seven planets in the idol of Moloch jointly, as well as Saturn, his proper star, and the sun singly.

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

Lastly, to omit many other arguments that might be produced, both Moloch and Chronus were indubitably the great Baal, Bel a or Belus of the Sidonians, Babylonians, and Affyrians, and consequently the same individual deity.

3. Baal b, Belus, Bal or Bel, (for he was known by all these names) was the great god of the Carthaginians. As it is therefore apparent from scripture c, that he was delighted with human sacrifices, and as he was the Chronus d of the Greeks, 'tis evident from hence, that the Carthaginian divinity Diodorus had in view must have been really Chronus.

4. From several traces to be found in the proper names of Carthage, we may discover, that the deity under consideration was known there by the two appellations Baal and Moloch, as in the caft. Hanni-bal, Asdru-bal, Maher-bal, &c. point out Baal or Bal; as Hi-milce, Hi-milco, Ha-milcar, Melicu s e, Malchus f, &c. do Moloch or Milcom. These therefore being different names of the same deity, who was the Chronus of the Greeks, it must be allowed, that Chronus or Saturn was not only worshipped, but likewise looked upon as the principal god, at Carthage (R).

(R) It is believed by some, that Saturn or Baal was the sun, Baal is or Astarte the moon, and that these were the only deities of the eastern nations. But this we cannot allow; for notwithstanding the sun and moon were two of the most noted objects of false worship, and possibly the first, yet we think it undeniable, that the Orientals had other false gods, in very ancient times. From scripture we learn, that the nations bordering upon God's people worshipped the sun, moon, and other planets, in very early ages (66). Philip's treaty with the Carthaginians, a copy of which is preferred to us by Polybius (67), renders it indisputable that this people had other deities besides the two luminaries above mentioned, some of which were planets distinct from them. But we shall endeavour to trace up this planetary worship to its first first source, or as near it as possible. God created the world, or this system, in six days, and rested the seventh (68). This was the foundation of the Antediluvian as well as the Hebrew week; and seems to be the reason that the number seven was so remarkable both amongst the Antediluvians and the Hebrews. Vengeance seven-fold was denounced against any person that should slay Cain (69); Noah was commanded to take unto him the clean beasts by sevens (70); the fowls of the air also by sevens (71); God foretold to him the beginning of the deluge (72) seven days before it happened; the same patriarch sent a dove out of the ark a second time to explore seven days after the first (73), and a third time seven days after this; Abimelech received seven ewe-lambs of Abraham, as a testimony that a well belonged to him (74); Jacob served Laban for Rachael seven years (75); Pharaoh in his dream saw seven fat and seven lean kine come out of the river, portending (76) so many years of plenty and famine; Elijah sent his servant seven times towards the sea, to discover the cloud that was forming itself for rain (77); his successor Eliahu ordered Naaman the Syrian to wash himself seven times in the river Jordan, in order to be cured of his leprosy (78), &c. Now ’tis observable, that there is a surprizing analogy between the days of the original week, and the system then created. The six primary planets, for the moon is the satellite of the earth, move round the sun, which is fixed, or at rest, and together they are in number seven, this answers exactly to the six days of work or motion, and one of rest, in all seven, of which the original week did consist. Thus the Mosaic account of the creation is a symbolical description of the world or system created; and such descriptions as these were perfectly agreeable to the genius of the Orientals, especially the Egyptians, in the first ages, and particularly in that wherein Moses lived, as might be proved by an induction of particulars, were it in any manner necessary. Hence we have the greatest reason to imagine, that the Antediluvian as well as the Postdiluvian patriarchs, the first Egyptians, Chaldeans, &c, famed for their knowledge in astronomy and astrology, knew the number of the planets, and had names for them. Moses likewise, being learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,

Egyptians, had undoubtedly a great share of knowledge in the celestial sciences (79). That the Egyptians had magicians and wise men, or astrologers, amongst them a considerable, if not a long, time before Joseph's arrival in Egypt, appears from scripture, since it was a common practice in that country then to consult such persons (80) upon any extraordinary occasion; and the number seven seems likewise to have been symbolical; from whence we may infer, that none of the planets were unknown to them, even from the first formation of their monarchy. The Chaldees or Chaldeans, Syrians, &c. agreed with the family of Abraham or Heber in the most early ages, in their computation of time by weeks, or periods of seven days (81), as well as in sweating regard to the number seven; they were likewise famed for their early application to the study of the celestial sciences, which is a good proof that they must have been acquainted with the seven planets, even from the beginning. According to Iamblichus and Syncellus, Pythagoras was taken prisoner by Cambyses in Egypt, in the first year of the sixty-fourth olympiad, i.e. about five hundred and twenty-four years before the birth of Christ.
Now the learned are universally agreed, that this philosopher brought with him home from Egypt that antient syltem of the world which bears his name (82), and is generally believed to be the true one, and that he received this from the pillars of the antient Hermes, who was antient as antient as the beginning of the Egyptian monarchy, and a molt celebrated adept in the knowledge of the heavenly bodies. We must therefore allow it probable, that these bodies, and the true syltem of the world, were known even from the first origin of things. In order to support further what is here advanced, it may not be improper to observe, that from the most early antiquity the planets were imagined to bear a near relation to the days of the week, since the custom of calling the latter by the names of the former is so antient, that the beginning of it cannot be discovered. 'Tis undoubtedly as antient as the division of the day into twenty-four hours, since the great regard paid to the planets, from a notion of their influence over all terrestrial bodies, was the cause of that division, as that division was of the order in which they succeeded one another in their government of the days of the week (83), which does

Belis; Sanchoniatho 1, in Philo Byblius, Dione and Baaltis; Hesychius 2, Belthes. According to this last author, the

does not agree with their situation in our system. The case therefore seems to have been thus: There was a great analogy between the days of the first, or original, week, and the seven principal parts of the system then created; the former seem to have been a symbolical description of the latter. This occasioned the number seven, common to both of them, to be taken great notice of by all the first inhabitants of the world. The knowledge of the planets, which was coeval with Adam, at first afforded many pleasing speculations to mankind; but afterwards became a snare to them, and insensibly led them on to the worship of those heavenly bodies. After this took place, the same, if not a greater, regard was paid to the number seven, out of the high veneration the planets were held in amongst them. They allotted every particular hour, every particular day of the week, to the government of some one of them; and, in consequence of this, gave the name of the planet governing to the day governed. This we take to be the origin of the custom of denominating the days of the week after the planets, and consequently believe, that it was coeval, or nearly so, with the first origin of idolatry. Alexander Aphrodisiensis affirms, that the number seven is perfect in its own nature, because God governs the earth by the seven planets (84); Pythagoras, according to Apuleius, revered it in an extraordinary manner (85), looking upon it as a number sacred to religion, and pointing (86) out particularly to the seven planets; Apuleius judged it necessary, before he addressed himself to the most powerful god, to beimmered seven times in salt water (87), in conformity, no doubt, to the Pythagorean, i.e. the most ancient Chaldean, Egyptian, &c. superstition; Aristotle innumates, that seven is the number (88) of which the world, i.e. this system, is composed; Photius, Macrobius (89), and others, likewise declare, that seven is a religious number. From which testimonies, as well as an infinite number more that might be produced, the word was applied both to Juno and Venus; and indeed in the Phœnecian theology, we scarce find any distinction betwixt these two deities. St. Augustin says, that Carthage was the place where Venus had established her reign; and Virgil informs us, that Juno preferred that spot to all others, even to Samos itself. As therefore both the Greeks and Romans had, generally speaking, one single chief divinity to preside over every particular city, country, and district, this double one must have been owing to the Phœnecian or Punic word above-mentioned, which included both of the afore-said goddesses. Afatereth and Aftarte were synonymous to Urania and Baalitis, and denoted the moon as well as Venus and Juno, who was invoked in great calamities, particularly in droughts to obtain rain. The antient Greeks frequently confound produced, it is abundantly evident, that the esteem the antient pagan world shewed for the number seven was owing originally to the planets, and that these were adored from very remote antiquity.

As infinite power cannot be confined in its productions to any particular part of duration, and as the manner of every one of the divine operations must be calculated to serve some wise end, we may presume, that there was some final cause why the world, or this system, was created in precisely six days, which, in conjunction with a seventh, formed the first period of time. Now it will not be easy to assign a more rational one than we have hinted above, viz. that this was done with a design to point out to the first inhabitants of the earth the principal parts of which the system then created did consist; as likewise to remind them in a particular manner every seventh day, that these seven heavenly bodies were created by God, entirely dependent upon him, and therefore ought not to be esteemed as objects of adoration. The great propensity of mankind in after-ages, particularly the Hebrews, God’s own people, to this species of falso worship, adds no small weight to our hypotheses. That the primitive week, long before the law was in being, consisted of seven days, is clear from scripture (90); as likewise, that every one of those days, in the symbolical language of the most early ages stood for a year (91). We could pursue this point much farther, would the subject we are upon permit; but as it will not, we hope to be able to give our readers a full discussion of it in some future part of this work; and in the mean time shall content ourselves with having suggested a few remarkable hints in this place.

confound Juno, Venus, and Diana, or the moon; which is to be attributed to the Egyptians and Phoenicians, from whom they received their system of religion, who seem in the most antient times to have had but one name for them all. In such a perplexed point as this, we shall expatiate no farther, since it would be both fruitless and unnecessary; besides, it would carry us from our subject. Our readers will find as distinct and particular an account of the goddeses here mentioned, as they can with reason expect, in the second volume of this history. To that part therefore, we refer them (S).

Besides the first Belus already taken notice of, there were several others of a later date in great repute amongst the Phoenicians, particularly those of Tyre, and of course amongst the Carthaginians. Jupiter, Mars, Bacchus, Apollo, or the sun, &c. were all of them so styled, according to the most celebrated authors who have treated of this subject. That Jupiter was worshipped by this people under the denomination of Belus or Baal, is notorious from Polybius, Menander Ephesius, and Dius. To him they addressed their oaths, and placed him, as there is reason to believe, for the most part, at the head of their treaties. For which reason some have not scrupled to affirm, that he was the Baal Berith of Phœnecia; but we are rather inclined to suppose, with bishop Cumberland, that this deity was Chronus. Mars, according to the chronicon Alexandrinum, compared with Homer and Heftiaus, an antient author cited by Eusebius, was dignified with the title of Belus by the Persians, Assyrians, and doubtless by the Carthaginians also, since he was a favourite divinity in their state, especially amongst their generals. Bacchus was called Belus by the Poet Nonnus, and

and no wonder, since he is often taken to be the same with Jupiter (T). The nation we are discoursing of had, in all probability, some knowledge of him *. Apollo, or the sun, went Carthaginian Juno, according to Virgil(93), had armour and a chariot, though of what form he tells us not. Servius says (94) she had a buckler as well as a chariot, and was invoked by the name of Juno Curulis. Plutarch seems to give her a spear, since he calls her Juno Curitis, curis in the Sabine language signifying that weapon. Some are of opinion, that her chariot was a small portable tabernacle, in which her image was carried either from place to place, or in procession. 'Tis certain such tabernacles as these were in use amongst the Carthaginians. As for the eunom of Ashtaroth, Ashtoreth, or Ashtarte, we must refer our readers to the Phoenician history (95). According to Scaliger (96), Juno was represented at Carthage sitting upon a lion, with thunder in her right hand, and a scepter in her left. No wonder she should have been so much revered by the Carthaginians, since she was in a particular manner the goddess of the Sidonians, their ancestors (97).

(T) In a former part of this work we observed, that Pezron derived Jupiter from the Celtic Jou, young, because the deity so called was supposed to have been the youngest son of Saturn (98). But the regard we bear to truth obliges us now to declare, that we differ from that learned man in this particular, as well as in all the points depending upon it. We are fully satisfied, that this name is formed of the word pater, father, in conjunction with the Tetragrammaton or Jehovah, as will most evidently appear from the following observations.

1. There can scarce be found in all antiquity of any prince's receiving his true and proper name from so slight a circumstance as that mentioned by Pezron. That Jupiter therefore, who was so potent a prince, or rather so celebrated a deity; that he who was so frequently styled by the most ancient writers writers the father of gods and men, should be so called; because he was his father's youngest son, is utterly improbable (99). We may therefore, after the best writers, venture to assert, that the ancient Latins either took Jupiter to be a term equivalent to Baal, Deus, &c. i.e. God, Lord, &c. as Neptune was the sea Jupiter, Pluto the infernal Jupiter, &c. or by it understand the great governor of the universe himself, as the wisest of them most certainly did (100). In either of which cases it can satisfactorily be derived from no other source than the Tetragrammaton.

2. Diodorus Siculus, a very good author, where he does not too closely copy after Ctesias, as he cannot in the point before us, calls the God of Moses, the legislator of the Jews, Iao (1). This is a clear proof, that the God of Moses, or Jehovah, was known to the Greeks by the name Iao, which was its pronunciation, though a corrupt one, of the Tetragrammaton. Add to this pater or father, a word which both the Greeks and Latins affixed to Zeus and Jovis (2), and it becomes Iao-pater, which is evidently the Jupiter of the Latins. As therefore the Iao of Diodorus cannot be derived from the Celtic word Jov, so neither can Iao-pater, Iao-piter or Jupiter as Pezron thinks; being made up of pater and Iao, that is, of pater and the Tetragrammaton.

3. We are told by Macrobius (3), that the oracle of Apollo at Clarus affirmed Iao to be the greatest of the gods, or rather the supreme God. Now this oracle was of a very high antiquity, as we learn from Strabo (4), who makes Mopsus, a famous footstayer in the time of the Trojan war, to have lived within the verge of it. Nay, it may be collected from Macrobius (5), that it was superior in point of antiquity to Orpheus himself, which will carry us a vast way back into the mythic period of time. Aeschylus also intimates, that there was a Zeus (6), or Jupiter Clarus, which must undoubtedly have been the great God Iao above-mentioned. Since therefore Zeus and Iao are terms synonymous, as we have before proved Iao and Jupiter to be; this is a further argument, that these all must have had the same original, and consequently that Jupiter is not of Celtic extraction.

4. In

sometimes the people of Carthage reposed great confidence in him, yet we find their ancestors, the Tyrians, in a case of

4. In a fragment of Philo Byblius taken from Sanchoniatho, and handed down to us by Eusebius (7), mention is made of the God Io, and of his priest Jerombalus, which can have no manner of relation to the Celtic Io, because Sanchoniatho was a Phœnician. Irenæus, Clemens of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Epiphanius, also evince, that the Tetragrammaton of Jehovah was written in Greek Iao or Iau (8). Drufix moreover remarks from Porphyry, that Io, of Sanchoniatho was Iao or Jehovah (9). From all which authors it appears, that the Greeks, in all probability, received this great name from the Phœnicians. As therefore the Phœnician Io, the Greek Zeus, the Latin Jupiter, were at the same time Iao, that is, the Tetragrammaton, it can by no means be admitted, that the name Jupiter is to be deduced from the Celtic.

But it is urged in defence of this notion, that Thursday, or the Day of Jove, is called in the remains of the Celtic language Diz-Jov. (10). Be it so; yet this will not come up to the point. For Diz-Jov is so very near the Latin Dies Jovis, that every one will be apt to believe the former to have been taken from the latter, and not the latter from the former. And why may not this be the case? If the Romans made it a maxim to propagate their language wherever they came, and even incurred with it the languages of most countries they obliged to submit to their arms, why should it appear incredible, that several, nay many, Roman terms should have been transplanted into the old British and Armoricans tongues, since the Romans were masters of the countries where they were used for several centuries; and some of their emperors were either born, reared, or died in these parts of their dominion? This is by no means improbable; especially as the word Jov in Diz-Jov bears not the least resemblance to the name of that day in the Hibernian dialect of the Celtic (11), which was unknown to the Romans. The argument therefore would have been but of little force, even supposing the opposite opinion had been supported by no reasons at all; but as the reverse is true, as moreover we find not the least intimation of any divinity going by the name Jov in any of those authors who have treated of the Druidical religion, which prevailed amongst the Celts, it scarce deserves to be mentioned. But to proceed:

5. According

5. According to Plato, the Greek name Zeus imported properly the same thing that Jehovah did, i.e. the Being of Beings, the principal of life and existence (12). This is a farther proof, not a most strong presumption, that these two names were originally applied to the same being.

6. Gellius affirms, that the antient Latin name of Jupiter was Jovis (13), which, supposing it to be a Latin termination, as it really is, comes very near the Tetragrammaton. This will appear to be exactly true from what follows.

7. The old Etruscans (14), who were the descendents of the most antient Pelasgi, Phenicians, and Lydians (15), called Jupiter Juve or Jove. All the earliest literary monuments of this nation now remaining have their letters drawn from the right-hand to the left, after the Oriental manner (16), which is a convincing evidence of their high antiquity. Every thing considered, we look upon this as a decisive argument in favour of our opinion; and not only so, but are fully persuaded, that the true pronunciation of the Tetragrammaton is hereby discovered. The Maioretical pronunciation indeed differs something from it; but undoubtedly the Etruscan Juve or Jove is many centuries older than the very being of the Maiorettes. Besides, as the Phenician U answered to the Hebrew O, and the Maioretical scheva is a vowel of a most rapid pronunciation, we may take for granted, that Juve or Jove, and Jehovah, are the same.

8. Seneca affirms us, that the Etruscan Juve or Jove was the cause of causes, the great governor and director of the world, the principle of life and motion, and, in short, the Deity himself (17); and that the Etruscans themselves considered him in all their views. After this, what can be offered further in support of what we advance? or indeed, what can be required of us further to offer?

But notwithstanding Jupiter was the same with the Etruscan Juve or Jehovah, and even at first, as the word (18) itself implies, the name of the supreme God in most nations; yet we pretend pretend not to deny that there was a king of Crete, who being, by reason of his heroic actions, deified after his death, received this name as a title the most illustrious of any that could be conferred upon him. This notion and what we have advanced are by no means incompatible. But still we must insist, that it ought to be considered as a title only, and not as his proper name, of which we are entirely ignorant. 'Tis evident to all persons who have made any researches into antiquity, that the neighbouring idolatrous nations did not only imitate the Hebrews in these rites which were originally of divine institution, but likewise gave several appellations to their fictitious deities, which the Hebrews, and even they themselves, whilst they remained in the true religion, appropriated to the true God. Of this El, Baal, Adonai, and even Jehovah itself, are pregnant instances. One of their false gods the Greeks called Zeus, and the Latins Jupiter, whose worship was established at Carthage by Dido herself, as Justin relates (19); for which end she carried one of his priests with her from Cyprus to Africa. Under what form the Carthaginians exhibited Saturn and Jupiter to public adoration, is no-where said; but the manner in which Baal was represented in the east, has been already touched upon (20).

Mars, called by the Sabines Mammers, was the god of war, and, according to Vossius (21), of Oriental extraction. Sir Isaac Newton says mavors (22) or ma-fors was a Phrygian word, signifying valiant. It appears from Silius, that the Carthaginians (23) addressed their oaths to Mars as well as to Jupiter. Hannibal sacrificed to this god with great solemnity, before he set out upon the Italian expedition (24); from whence we may infer, that he was greatly revered by the Carthaginian generals.

Bacchus was undoubtedly in Africa, and, without question, known in Carthage; but as he was more famous in Libya, we shall defer what we have to say of him, till we come to the history of that country.

Bochart seems to think, that Apollo was originally an African deity (25). He takes him to have been the Phut of Mofes, known among the Greeks by the name Pythus. The Carthaginians, when they took the city of Gela in Sicily, found a statue of Apollo of an extraordinary size (26), which they sent to their mother city Tyre;

Neptune was likewise one of the Dii majorum gentium, or gods of the first class, of the Carthaginians. It cannot well

Tyre; and this was the statue which the Tyrians fastened with golden chains to the altar of Hercules, when they were under an apprehension, that he was going over to Alexander, then besieging their city. Besides this, there was another at Carthage of an immense value, taken by Scipio at the conclusion of the last siege, and, as Plutarch (27) intimates, sent to Rome. The temple of Apollo, as described by Appian, was the richest and most superb edifice at Carthage, of which we have given an account above. It was placed in the forum. Valerius Maximus relates, that the hand of one who came to strip him of his golden garments was found among the pieces of gold cut off from him, which he mentions as an instance of his resenting sacrilege in a high manner (28). If we consider him as the sun, he was the Osiris of the Egyptians, and the Mithras of the Persians (29), and consequently the great god of all the east. The Apollo Libycus (30) will be fully considered in a proper place.

Neptune some take to have been Japhet, the king of the Isles (31), as they think appears not only from the office antiquity assigned him, but likewise from his name. He presided over earthquakes, plagues, and inundations (32), and, in order to render him propitious, the Carthaginians threw victims into the sea as offerings to him. Of this we have a remarkable instance during Hannibal's siege of Agrigentum (33), when a number of priests were in this manner offered. The ancients attributed to him every thing that related to the management of horses, and from the rock out of which the first horse is supposed to have sprung, he had the denomination of Scyphus given him (34) scyph in Punic signifying a rock or stone. Bochart makes his name Poseidon to be a Punic term, importing broad or expanded (35). His name Neptune shall be accounted for, when we come to visit Libya; for, according to Herodotus, he was originally a Libyan (36).

Our readers will not be surprised, that we have paied over in silence the Carthaginian images or representations of these four last deities, since we are entirely in the dark as to the manner in which they were figured at Carthage. Possibly in the main the Carthaginians, well be doubted, but that he was the Baal of Sidon, called Thalaffus, or the Sea Baal, taken notice of in a former part of this history *.

THE word Baal, in itself an appellative, at first served to denote the true God, amongst those who adhered to the true religion; though afterwards, when it became common amongst the idolatrous nations, and they, as well as his own people, applied it to their respective idols, he rejected it b. The false god to whom they first appropriated it, was Chronus or Saturn, as intimated above. In process of time it became a title, or mark of distinction, prefixed to the names of many others. Hence the Baal-Peor, Baal-Zebub, Baal-Molech, &c. of the Syrians and Phcenicians c. The term imported god or lord amongst the Orientals, as zeus did amongst the Greeks d. The plural Baalim in scripture signifies gods, lords, masters, sovereigns, &c. correspondent to the semle of Bel in the Chaldee tongue. According to Servius e, who is followed by Vossius herein, Bal in the Punic language had two significations; it either specified Saturn, or was equivalent to the Latin deus, or god. Xenophon f intimates, that, in the earliest times, every head of one of the most illustrious families in all countries was called Chronus or Saturn; every first-born son or daughter of such families Jupiter or Juno; and the most valiant of their offspring Hercules. Theodoret seems to apply this to the Phoenicians in particular g; adding, that such noble personages were deified, on account of some signal service they did to their country. As we have made Baal, and Zeus or Jupiter, words of the same import in different languages, we may say of the former what Varro in Tertullian says of the latter, viz. that the number of those so styled amounted to three hundred. Notwithstanding which, some will have it, that there were originally but two gods of the Phoenicians, and consequent upon the Carthaginians, or, what is the same thing, that all the other other deities were resolvable into those two, viz. Baal and Astarte, or Belus and Astarte.

BAAL SAMEN, or, as the Hebrews would have written it, The fun Baal-Themaim, i.e. the lord of heaven, seems to have been worshipped the sun, as Belisama, or the queen of heaven, above-mentioned, the moon. According to St. Auffin, he had religious honours paid him by the Carthaginians. It is probable they had no representation of him at all, because they could not forbear beholding him daily in all his glory. Damascus calls him El, Bolathes, &c. and makes him to have been the same with Saturn.

The Carthaginians introduced Ceres and Proserpina as Greek deities, when ill success attended their arms in the war with Dionysius of Syracuse. This Diodorus tells us. But Virgil affirms, that Dido herself sacrificed to Ceres. The poet here, we think, ought to give way to the historian; for it is much more probable, that the Carthaginians should receive a Greek or Roman deity from the Greeks or Romans, than from the Phoenicians. The statues of these two goddesses stood in the temple of Dido, who was likewise deified by those idolaters, together with her sister Anna. We find on the reverses of several Carthaginian coins an ear or ears of corn, either in allusion to the goddess Ceres, or as a symbol of the fruitfulness of the country.

As the Carthaginians were a people who supported themselves chiefly by commerce, it cannot be supposed that they neglected the worship of the god of genius, industry, and traffic. Mercury the antients allotted this province to; and accordingly we find the Carthaginians paid divine honours to him under the name of Assumes or Assumes (U).

(U) Mercury was the minister of the gods, and presided over the roads or highway; as well as traffic and commerce. The old Etruscans named him Caminus, Camillus, or Cadmus, i.e. a servant or minister of the gods; and the Carthaginians, Assumes or Assumes, which imports a servant.
The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

Nothing is more celebrated in ancient history than the Tyrian Hercules, whose worship was brought to Carthage by Dido, and diffused itself afterwards over all the coasts of Africa, and as far as Gades or Cadiz, where he had a magnificent temple. The reason of his name Melcarthus has been already assigned. The Tyrians and Carthaginians supposed him to preside over gold, silver, and all sorts of treasures; on which account he was held in high veneration in the island of Thasus, where a Phoenician colony being planted discovered some gold mines. The Thasians adored him with the same solemnity as the people of Tyre, and had a brazen statue of him ten cubits high, with a club in the right hand, and a bow in the left; in which manner they undoubtedly represented him both at Tyre and Carthage. The Pelasги, originally Phoenicians, vowed him the tenth of every thing they had, on account of a great scarcity of grain they once laboured under. The Carthaginians for a considerable time never failed sending to Tyre the first fruits of their revenues, nor the tithe of the spoils taken from their enemies; as offerings to Hercules, the protector of Tyre and Carthage. Public diversions were instituted in honour of him at Tyre, which they celebrated every four years. At Carthage, no doubt, the same custom prevailed, as likewise of offering annually annually human victims up to him. Varro mentions forty-five heroes who bore this appellation; but the oldest of them seems to have been the Tyrian or Carthaginian Hercules (W).

(40) Bochart thinks he was Canaan, because that word properly denotes a merchant, and in some respect answers to the name Mercury (41); which conjecture he farther confirms by observing, that, in conformity to Mercury’s office, Noah predicted, that Canaan should serve his brethren (42). His pilicus and caducus being winged, seem to allude to the sails of ships, and remotely to the long voyages the Phoenicians made, and the farthest parts of the world they were acquainted with, as doth likewise his government of the highways above-mentioned. Bochart and Volusius set this in a very clear light (43).

Iolaus comes next to Hercules, as being either related to him, or one that introduced some of his relations into the island.

(W) We cannot help being of opinion, that the Phoenician or Tyrian Hercules was the same with the Egyptian. It appears from Philostratus (44), that the Egyptian Hercules, as well as the Theban, i.e. the Phoenician, were worshipped in the same temple at Gadira or Gades; that there were no statues erected to either of them there; that the temple was adorned with the twelve labours of Hercules finely wrought; which must naturally have pointed at both of them; that the golden olive of Pygmalion king of Tyre (a Phoenician) bearing imaragdine fruit, of wondrous workmanship, was kept in this temple. Bishop Cumberland proves (45), that the Phoenician Hercules was a Phoenician king in Egypt; that he found out the purple dye, which is of Phoenician extraction; and that he built the temple on the island near the Straights, to which he gave the Phoenician name Gadira. Lastly, Sir Isaac Newton makes it evident (49), that the Hercules called Melcarth, who was king of Carteia, had the temple of Gades consecrated to him, as Philostratus intimates the Egyptian Hercules had (47); and that this Hercules was a Phoenician. From whence it may rationally be supposed, that the Phoenician Hercules and that of Egypt were the same.

The word itself is to be sought for from the salt; undoubtedly yercal or ercol, figifying swift and finewy, or strong, was the original. This Hercules was likewise upon the coast of Africa, and, according to Orosius, built Capsa there (48). Bishop Cumberland imagines him to have been called Affis or Aziz, i.e. the strong, as well as Ercol or Hercules (49). Africanus and Eusebius give him the name of Acheles (50). It is probable he was elected king or general of the Phoenicians, on account of the great glory he had acquired (51). Some believe, that he, in a manner, traversed the then known world; but the relations given us of his achievements are so interlarded with fable, that we know not well what to make of them.

island of Sardinia. The natives of that island, at his arrival, were Tyrrenians or Etruscans. Tho' people inhabiting the mountainous parts of Sardinia, received from him the appellation of Iolaeneces; and even the most fruitful provinces had the name of campi Iolei, the Iolean or Iolaen fields. Hercules and Iolaus, according to Vossius, had jointly divine honours paid them here, either because he was Hercules’s near relation, or asisted him in destroying the Hydra, which he did by drying up the gore with a red hot iron, when any of the heads was cut off, to prevent others from sprouting out in its room. Ovid pretends, that, at the intercession of Hercules, Hebe restored him to his youth, when he was grown extremely decrepit. As the Carthaginians had this island in possession a considerable time, it is supposed they borrowed him from the Sardi; for that he was one of their principal deities, we are given to understand by Polybius. The rites and ceremonies observed at his public worship are fully described by Vossius out of Paufantas.

Hendreich intimates, that the Dea Syria, or Syrian goddess, was a deity of the Carthaginians; but who she was, authors are not agreed. By the description of her temple already given, and the statue in it, the most either have been Juno, or a group of all the goddesses; which last opinion seems most probable. The curious may find further satisfaction on this head, by consulting Tertullian and Lippius, as well as the first volume of this history.

The people of Carthage likewise addressed themselves to Asculapius, whom Servius calls Pænigena, because he supposed his mother to have been a Carthaginian. The place more particularly sacred to him was Byrsa, or rather the top of that fortress, famous for his spacious temple there situated. We have already observed, that Asdrubal’s wife, at the final destruction of Carthage, burnt this edifice, together with her self, her family, and nine hundred Roman deserters. Considerable quantities of vervain, an herb sacred to him, were preferred in this place. The best authors take him to have been originally a Maclenian, or an Egyptian; yet, according to Vossius, the Carthaginians received him immediately from the the Tyrians, to whom either the Syro-Macedonians or Egyptians * communicated him. Alexander took Tyre in the first year of the hundred and twelfth Olympiad; and Carthage was finally destroyed by Scipio in the third year of the hundred and fifty-eighth; in the interval betwixt which two periods the worship of Æsculapius passed from the Syro-Macedonians or Egyptians to the Tyrians, and from them to the Carthaginians. Toforthus, or Seforethus, a king of Memphis, and the second of the third dynasty of Manetho, for his great skill in the art of phylisc, is generally allowed to have been the first Æsculapius. He preceded many ages the Melfenian §.

Herebus, another Carthaginian deity mentioned by Silius and Polybius, seems to have been Pluto, or Dis. We know nothing farther of him, than that he was invoked as the god of hell, and represented under an human shape, with long loofe hair. Vossius and Hendrich both take notice of him m.

Triton, the sea god, had a place amongst the deities of Carthage, as we learn from the treaty concluded betwixt Philip the son of Demetrius king of Macedon, and the Carthaginians n. Some authors have told us, that he was so called from Τритος, a Greek word, signifying a wave o. It appears from Virgil, that the province of Triton and Cymothoë was to release or heave off vessels run aground, and to clear them from the rocks. The antient mythologists make the nymph Cymothoë to have been the daughter of Nereus and Doris; but Triton the son of Neptune and Amphitrite p.

Mopsus, a famous augur or soothsayer, after his death, became a sort of oracle q at Carthage. The memory of this deified sage has been transmitted down to posterity by Lucatius Placidus and Apuleius r. Strabo takes notice of one Mopsus the son of Manto the daughter s of Tiresias. But, according to Vossius, this was the son of Ampycus an Argonaut, mentioned by Apollonius and Valerius Flaccus t. All that can be added concerning him is, that temples were erected to him by this nation, from whence responses were given, as from so many oracles.

Rivers, meads, waters, &c. or rather the supposed germs of all these inanimate parts of the creation, were esteemed as objects of adoration. This humour likewise prevailed amongst the Greeks, Romans, and most other nations, from very antient times. No one has handled this subject better than Voëlius, whose writings our learned readers will peruse with great pleasure. Some maintain, that the worship of the elements was prior to all others in the pagan world; but we must beg leave to dissent from their opinion.

Scaliger, the elder acquaints us, that the old Africans paid a religious homage to fire, which was perhaps likewise the custum at Carthage. This sentiment he seems to have taken from Leo Africanus, an author whom we shall have occasion to consult hereafter.

With this the air and winds also shared divine honours, which was probably derived from the Assyrrians. The air to this nation appeared to be superior to the other elements, and to have them, as it were, under its government and direction; for which reason it was honoured with adoration. We read in Sanchoniatho, that Usus consecrated two rude stones or pillars to fire and wind; to which we may add, that the worship of the air and winds was not unknown to the Greeks and Persians.

The Carthaginians sometimes swore by the Manes of Dido, as Silius relates. Anna her sister passed for a goddess, under the name of Anna Perenna, according to some. It is imagined, tho' with no great appearance of truth, that the lived with Aeneas, and was drowned by Lavinia in the river Numicus; from whence she was called Nymphia Numicia. It is certain the Romans, as well as the Carthaginians, paid her divine honours. Ceres and Proserpina were ranked with Dido, as being all in the same temple. Ceres was either aeclefts, i. e. the moon, or subeclefts, i. e. the fruitful earth. She answered to the Egyptian Isis. These two last are amply treated of by various authors.

Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

The honour that Dido herself received from the people of Carthage after her death, she, according to Ovid, had in her life-time conferred upon her husband Sichæus.

Tellus, or the Earth, was worshipped by the Carthaginians, as appears from the treaty of peace with Philip, mentioned by Polybius. For a further account of this deity, our readers may have recourse to Vossius.

"Hamilcar," says Herodotus, by his father's side a Carthaginian, but by his mother's a Syracusan, was, by reason of his virtue and superior abilities, elected king of the Carthaginians. The same day that the battle of Salamis was fought, being defeated by Gelon and (his father-in-law) Theron near Himera, he vanished, and could never after be found, tho' Gelon caused the strictest search to be made for him. The Carthaginians, who have his image in high veneration, say, that during the engagement between the barbarians and the Greeks, which continued from morning till evening without intermission, Hamilcar laid in the camp sacrificing, and throwing entire victims upon a flaming pile; but that seeing his troops put to the rout, he himself rushed into the fire, and, being consumed, was never more seen. Whether he disappeared in the manner as related by the Phœnicians, or as the Carthaginians affirm, it is certain, that they offer sacrifices to him, and have erected monuments to his memory in all the cities they have founded, tho' the most memorable are in Carthage." So far Herodotus. It is not unlikely that the Carthaginians adopted other favourite generals into the number of their gods; nay, we are assured by Silius, that, notwithstanding the infamous treatment he met with from his countrymen at laft, Hannibal was adored in his lifetime.

These deities seem to have been of the same kind with the dii indigetes of the Latins.

The Carthaginians also ranked among the gods the two Philæni. These brothers, having been sent by their countrymen to accommodate some differences with the Cyreæans, and, in conjunction with the commissaries appointed by that people, to settle the limits of their respective dominions, by fraud extended their own frontiers, to the prejudice of the others. The Cyreæans, incensed at this, would not cede the tract demanded, unless the Philæni would suffer themselves to be buried alive in the place which they had pitched upon.

upon for their boundary. To this they instantly agreed, and had afterwards two altars erected there to their memory; which served as a land-mark or limit to the Carthaginian territories on the site of Cyrenaica for many succeeding ages. Sallust, Mela, and Valerius Maximus, give all the particulars of this story.

St. Austin tells us, that some of the Carthaginian divinities had the name of Abaddires, and their priests that of Eucaddires. The class in all probability, was derived from the stone which Jacob anointed with oil, after it had served him for a pillow the night he had his vision; for in the morning he called the name of the place where he lay Bethel. Now, it is no wonder this should have been esteemed as sacred, since God himself says he was "the God of Bethel, "the place where Jacob anointed the pillar." From Bethel came the Baetylus of Damascius, which we find called Abaddir by Priscian. This Abaddir is the Phœnician Aban- Dir, i.e. the spherical stone, exactly answering to the description of the Baetylus given us by Damascius, and others. The case seems to have been this: The Canaanites of the neighbourhood first worshipped the individual stone itself, upon which Jacob had poured oil; afterwards they consecrated others of that form, and worshipped them; which false worship was perpetuated even to the time of St. Austin. Abaddir may likewise be understood to mean Ab-Addir, i.e. the magnificent father, a title given to the true God himself; but afterwards applied to those, who by nature were no gods. That Addir was an epithet joined to the names of false gods in the east, may in some measure, appear from Addir-Dag, the magnificent fifth, i.e. Adergatis, Atergatis, &c. Abaddires therefore was an appellation belonging to some Punic deities, as Eucaddires, i.e. Eucaddires, persons initiated in the sacred mysteries of the Abdires or Abaddires, was a term appropriated to their priests (X).

We must not omit, that the Carthaginians carried about with them some small images representing certain gods, in covered chariots. Eustathius calls these κατὰς θεοὺς ἐπιστήμων ἱλαρόν, portable temples, or temples carried by oxen. They were a sort of oracles, and their responses were understood by the motions impressed upon the vehicle. This was likewise an Egyptian and Libyan custom. The ancient Germans also had something like it, as we learn from Tacitus. Philo Byblius relates, that Agrotes, or, at least his image, was carried about in procession in this manner. The tabernacle of Melchior above mentioned, we take to have been a machine of this kind.

It is remarkable, that, in the treaty of Philip so often The Genius cited, mention is made of the Daemon or Genius of Carthage. Who

(X) The Eathyli were stones that were believed to be animated, and were consulted by some fanatics as oracles. These stones were round, and of such a size, that some of them might be carried about by their votaries, either by hanging at the neck, or in some other way (52).

Ifidorus tells us, they were of different sorts; and that some of them were consecrated to Saturn, others to Jupiter, others to the Sun, &c. (53)

Their origin was very ancient, if any credit may be given to Sanchoniatho, who makes Ouranus the inventor of them. Bochart proves, that Philo Byblius has wrongly translated Sanchoniatho's words animated stones; and that it ought to have been anointed stones (54).

The ancient Greeks and Latins, who have taken any notice of the Eathyli, hardly afford any other notion of them, but as the stone which Saturn swallowed in the place of Jupiter (55). The scholium upon Hesiod relates, upon the authority of Agathocles, a Babylonian author, that Rhea had taken that stone from the island of Proconia; and Stephanus adds, that Saturn swallowed it upon mount Thaumastus. M. Falconet has published a dissertation upon this subject, which, together with what M. Fourmont has offered, will, according to the abbe Banier, abundantly satisfy the curious (56).

Who this might be, we shall not take upon us to determine; but only in general observe, that the pagan world looked upon these Demons as intelligences of a middle nature betwixt the gods and men, as beings who had, in a great measure, the administration of the world committed to them. Hence it is no wonder they should have received religious honours; for when once mankind were poffessed with the opinion, that they were the ministers of the gods, and trusted with the dispensation of their favours, as well as the infliction of their punishment, it is natural to suppose, that they would be defirous of making their addresses to them. We hope to give our readers a full and particular account of these inferior deities, when we come to the Arabic history.

So full an account has already been given of the Cabiri, that there is neither room nor occasion to be prolix here. To what has been already said we shall, however, add, that the Pelasgi introduced the worship of these gods into Samothrace, Greece, and all other countries where they seated themselves; that men and all animals, without distinction, nay, even all kinds of inanimate sacrifices, were offered up to them; that they had at first no proper names, but were worshipped under the general denomination of gods; that the word Cabiri either signified certain anonymous divinities, or their priests, known by the name Corybantes; that from an antient inscription mentioned by Aftorius, it is manifest the Cabiri were likewise called Diofcuri; that the Phenicians first paid them divine honours, afterwards the Egyptians, who built them a magnificent temple at Memphis in the earliest ages, which continued to the time of Achilles Tatius; that the Syrians, Egyptians, Greeks, Cypriots, Phrygians, Etruscans, Latins, Carthaginians, and almost all the antient pagans, had the most profound reverence for the Cabiric or Samothracian mysteries; that the vulgar believed all initiated into these mysteries could not fail of being happy, both here and hereafter; that, according to Sanchoniathe, the Dilii Cabiri were eight in number, being the sons of Sydik; that the inhabitants of Samothrace, sacrificed dogs to Hecate in the cave Zerinthus, sacred to the Cabiri; that the Pelasgi, Samothracians, &c. celebrated the Cabiric mysteries in the night-time, with great indecency; and that this was the principal motive with the antients not to transmit them down in writing to posterity. Bishop Cumberland, the abbe Banier, and Aftorius, have, in a manner, exhausted this subject. A catalogue of the authors who have supplied them them with materials, our readers will find here inferred, to whom they may have recourse at their leisure (Y).

The Anaces, Anaëtes, or Diodurci, are by some thought to have been the same with the Cabiri, by others different from

(Y) Reland, who has favoured the learned world with a dissertation upon the Cabiri, concludes, that they were the gods of the dead; that Ceres was the earth which received them; Pluto and Proserpina the infernal regions where they came to dwell; and Camillus or Mercury the god who conducted them thither (57).

The mysterious names Axieres, Axiokeria, Axiokeros, and Catinilos, Bochart has happily interpreted, and proved, that, in the Phænecian language, they denote Ceres, Proserpina, Pluto, and Mercury. Princes, and persons of the first distinction, were ambitious of being initiated into the awful mysteries of these great gods, upon account of the high reputation they were in. Voluit thinks, that we are to understand by the name Cabiri only the ministers of the gods, as the Curetes and Dactyli of Crete, and the Corybantes of Phrygia; but this, as running counter to all antiquity, can by no means be admitted (58).

Arnobius affirms, that, in the celebration of those mysteries, they flew one of the initiated, and is followed therein by Firmicus; but this seems rather to refer to an accident that once happened, than to prove, that such a practice was authorized by custom (59).

The priests of the Cabiri, according to Hefychius were called Coes, a word manifestly derived from the Hebrew cohen, i.e. a priest; a further proof this, that the old obsolete language used by the priests in their ceremonies, was the Hebrew or Phænician (60).

from them. However this may be, they were undoubtedly descended from the Anakims of Moses. It can scarce be questioned but Inachus himself was of this race, as his name plainly imports. Some believe, that the word Anaetes was a title given to those princes of Inachus's line, who had distinguished themselves by their heroic actions; which evidently alludes to the name of that family, so eminent in scripture for its gigantic stature; and we own ourselves inclinable to fall in with this sentiment. Paufanias, Pliny, Philostratus, and Julius Pollux, not to mention many other authors that occur, render it probable, that in ancient times were not wanting instances of persons of a monstrous size of body. However, many of these relations, particularly those of Phlegon, Abydenus, Solinus and others, must be allowed to be fabulous (Z).

(Z) Vossius is of opinion, that the name of the gods Anaetes was originally from Phœnec; but he thinks it had been brought into the west by Cadmus, or by the Canaanites, whom Joshua, by his conquests, had obliged to quit Phœnic, and who had retired into Greece. He farther thinks, that the Spartans, who called themselves allies of Israel, as we learn from Josephus, were a colony of the Canaanites, who were most likely descended from Abraham by Hagar and Keturah; and this is the reason why the most famous of the Greek Anaetes were Cafer and Polux, natives of Sparta, the Lacedæmonians having given them that name to honour the memory of Anek's descendants, of whom they had heard so many wonderful stories. We shall only add, that it was a common thing with the Greeks to call those persons the sons of the Earth, who were so ancient, that they had but a very imperfect account of their original; for this reason they called Anax or Anak the son of the Earth, as we have observed above from Paufanias.

Paufanias intimates, that the Dioscuri were to be distinguished from the Cabiri; but that the Anaetes, were the same with them (61). His words are to this effect: "With regard to the Anaetes, men are divided in their sentiments about them; some will have them to be the same with the Dioscuri; others with the Curetes; but the most intelligent persons take them to be the Cabiri." Suidas intimates, that the word was applied

To what has been observed of the Pataici, or Pataeci, in the second volume of this history, we shall only subjoin, that the statues of these gods, of the Cabiri, and of the Egyptian Vulcan, had a great resemblance to one another; that therefore, since Vulcan was esteemed the most antient of the gods, the Pataeci must have been of great antiquity; that in after-ages, the Penates had the same respect paid them by the Romans, as these received from their votaries the Phoenicians and Carthaginians; and lastly, that the word, according to Scaliger, is to be deduced from the Hebrew patach, he engraved, or, as Bochart will have it, from batach, he confided in; either of which etymologies very well quadrates with the use the Phoenicians, and after them the Greeks, made of the gods Pataeci k.

As the Palici were Sicilian deities l, of eastern extraction, it is reasonable to suppose, that they owed their origin in Sicily to the Carthaginians, who got a footing in that island in very antient times, and therefore may justly be looked upon as some of its most antient inhabitants. This we say, is probable; but as there is not the express testimony of any good author to support it, we shall drop all further particulars concerning them; and conclude here what we have to say of the gods of the Carthaginians.

The barbarous custom of offering up human sacrifices did not expire with the city of Carthage, but continued amongst the Africans, even till the time of Tiberius. That prince, tho' none of the most humane and compassionate, was so shocked at the unnatural practice of offering up children to Saturn, that in his proconsulship, according to Tertullian m, he ordered the priests concerned in that horrid impiety applied both to kings and gods (62). Pindar, Cicero, and Tzetzes all take particular notice of them (63).

The account published by Sir Hans Sloane in the philosophical transactions, of the fœtid teeth and the bones of elephants, which falls in with this subject, is very well worth the perusal of our curious readers (64).

piety to be hanged, and committed the care of the execution to the African militia. This practice had been retained, with little or no intermission, from the foundation of the city; for notwithstanding the Carthaginians, to avoid drawing upon themselves the indignation of Darius Hyflaspi, might, for a few years, suspend it, or at least pretend so to do, yet it is certain, that, in his successor Xerxes's time, they had resumed it. This appears from history; for Gelon, after he had vanquished them in the reign of that prince, concluded a treaty of peace with them, of which this was one article, that no more human sacrifices should be offered to Saturn; nay, to such a pitch of frenzy, or rather savage barbarity, were they come, that mothers, who are naturally the most susceptible of tender impressions, made it a merit to view their own offspring thrown into the devouring flames, without so much as a groan. They even, by kisses and embraces, hushed the cries of their children, before they were cast into the flaming statue of Saturn above-mentioned, imagining the efficacy of the sacrifice would have been entirely lost, if any thing that might have been interpreted as a mark of the least reluctance or regret had been shewn. They used a drum or a tabret, among other instruments, to drown the shrieks and outcries of the unhappy victims. Some authors believe, that the Phoenicians, from whom the Carthaginians derived this detestable custom, contented them-theselves with making their children pass through the fire, without burning them; but Selden and others evince this to be a mistake. Plutarch tells us, that the mothers were, in some measure, obliged to stand by as unconcerned speciators; since a groan or tear falling from them would have been punished by a fine, and still the child must have been sacrificed. In times of pestilence, or other public calamities, the Carthaginians endeavoured to appease their offended gods by vast numbers of such oblations; of which we have given an instance or two above (A).

From

Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

From many authors it appears, that the Carthaginians were extremely addicted to superstitition. They had, however, in general, some good notions: they addressed themselves to the gods, before they attempted to put in execution any enterprise by them formed; and after any advantage gained, they were not slack in making proper returns to the powers above for it. Temples very magnificent they abounded with at Carthage, and took care to have no deficiency of them in any part of the Carthaginian dominions. One famous temple, sacred to Baal or Balis, in a city of that name on the borders of Cyrenaica, we find taken notice of by Stephanus, who intimates, that the city received its appellation from that deity. There is great reason to believe, that El, II, Bel, Bal, Baal, Belus, Balis, Helius, &c. were different names of the same pagan divinity.

We have already described the manner in which the Babylonian women prostituted themselves to strangers at the temple of Mylitta, as likewise the same custom prevailing amongst the Phoenicians, whose women, for this end, repaired to the great temple of Astarte at Byblus. We have now to add, that the same thing, in all respects, was practised at Carthage; excepting that the money got by this infamous commerce amongst the Babylonians and Phoenicians was presented to Mylitta or Astarte, i.e. Venus, whereas the Carthaginian women applied the wages of their prostitution to their own use. This indeed favoured something more

The Canaanites and Phoenicians (65), in whose country that patriarch attempted to offer up his son Isaac, in obedience to the divine command, imitated the Jews in many particulars, and derived many of their institutions from those of that nation, which were of divine origin, as has been before observed. It is probable therefore, that they might reason with themselves after this manner: "If God was so highly pleased with Abraham's bare intention of offering up his son Isaac, that he showered down blessings upon his posterity in a most extraordinary manner, what marks of the divine favour may not those persons expect" more of the common harlot than the other; but all these nations were arrived at such an height of infatuation and impiety, on account of their gross idolatry, and variety of pollutions attending it, that it is hard to say which of them was the worst (B).

A very learned author of our own nation imagines, that some traces of the Succoth Benoth b, mentioned in scripture, may be found in Sicca Venera, the name of a city in Numidia, not far from the borders of Africa Propria. The name itself bears a near allusion to the obscene custom above taken notice of, and seems to have been transported from Phoenice. This cannot well be disputed, when we consider, that in this very city there was a temple, where c women were obliged to purchase their marriage-money by the prostitution of their bodies. The author of the itinerary sometimes

"expect, who actually do sacrifice their children?" Thus the highest instance of obedience upon record might, through the depraved imaginations, and blind understandings, of a great part of mankind, together with the suggestions of their grand enemy, become the accidental cause of one of the most enormous and unnatural kinds of wickedness that could be committed.

(B) Canaan's poorness were a most profligate and abandoned race of men, addicted to all, even the most unnatural, kinds of lust, as the scripture gives us good reason to apprehend. Now, it is worthy admiration, that Noah cursed Canaan only of Ham's sons (66), on account of Ham's breach of modesty in exposing his father's nakedness, which was both unholy and unnatural. This is a strong intimation, that Canaan only was an accomplice of his father Ham in this wickedness, which was an evident token of a most dissolute and vicious turn of mind. This vile disposition exerted itself in his poorness, and vauntly contributed towards drawing down those heavy divine judgments, which, in process of time, fell upon them. Hence it appears, that in conformity to the patriarch's prediction, Canaan's descendents were subject to the poorness of Shem, i.e. the Jews; and that this very judgment was, in a great measure, occasioned by the effects of that vile disposition inherent in them, which so eminently displayed itself in Ham, and, as is probable, in Canaan also, and which immediately drew upon them all the curse of their great ancestor Noah. So true is that observation of the psalmist, Righteous art thou, O Lord, and upright are thy judgments (67).

times calls it simply Sicca, and Solinus Venerea. Sicca signifies a tabernacle, as well as Succa; and therefore probably this was what it imported in the Punic tongue. Procopius, Victor Uticensis, and others, in conjunction with our author, render this opinion almost incontestable.

If any points of consequence relating to the worship of the people at present under consideration should have hitherto escaped us, they will be occasionally touched upon hereafter, as they offer themselves in the course of this history.

The Hebrew and Phœnician languages were in a manner the same, as has been observed in several places of this history, and is apparent, not only from the nature of the thing, but from the concurrent testimony of learned men, who, generally speaking, agree in this particular. The Phœni or Carthaginians therefore having been originally Phœnicians, 'tis undeniable, that their language must at first have been the Phœnician. However Scaliger believes, that the Punic, (he must mean that of after-ages) in some respects, deviated from the Hebrew and Phœnician, which, considering how distant the Carthaginians were from their mother-country, Phœnice, and the people they were incorporated with, is not to be wondered at. 'Tis much more wonderful, that they should have retained so much, nay, in a manner the whole, of their original tongue; for that they did so, after what has been advanced by Scaliger, Petit, Bochart, and others, will scarce admit of a dispute.

Our great Selden, next to Scaliger, seems to have been the first who endeavoured in earnest to settle this point; which, from the authority of St. Jerom, St. Austin, and many other writers, he likewise seems to have done effectually. He has moreover given us a specimen of an interpretation of the remains of the Punic language to be found in Plautus. Petit and Bochart have been much more copious on this head; but what they have advanced has not met with universal applause, which the least of these seems to have been beforehand apprehensive of; in short, there is room enough left for any learned man to exercise his wit and talents on this subject.

Bochart has produced a vast collection of Punic words from different authors, and traced them all up to the Hebrew or Phoenician; all which will serve as so many proofs, that the Carthaginian language agreed in the main with these; that, notwithstanding the small variations from them discernible in it, it ever continued to be the same in substance with them.

From what has been offered in the first section of the history we are now upon, it appears, that the word Carthago or Cartaco itself was of Hebrew or Phoenician extraction. As therefore an affinity of proper names implies an affinity of the languages to which they belong, the following short catalogue of Hebrew or Phoenician and Punic proper names, by demonstrating the harmony betwixt these languages, will not a little contribute to confirm the sentiment which we, in common with so many others, have espoused.

We have chosen to compare the Punic proper names in this place with the Hebrew or Phoenician, to which they undoubtedly answer, rather than produce their etymons, as Bochart does; since in our opinion this more clearly exhibits the very great agreement betwixt them, and renders the near relation they bore to one another obvious to all capacities.

The Punic tongue had likewise a tincture of the Chaldee and Syriac, as we learn from Priscian and St. Austin. But as this is chiefly to be understood of it in the latter ages, when it was in its decline, particularly those that immediately preceded St. Austin, or even that in which he lived; and as the Chaldee and Syriac languages themselves were, in all probability, nearly allied to the Hebrew, nay, almost the same with it, in early times, we shall infer nothing from this observation, but leave it to our readers to make what use of it they please.

The History of the Carthaginians.  Book III.

According to Salmius † there have been some persons who have believed, that the Punic language and the old Egyptian were the same; but as neither arguments nor sufficient authorities are produced to support this hypothesis, we shall make no scruple to reject it.

M. Maius, professor of the Greek and Oriental languages in the Ludovician university of Gießen, ‡ published a small piece in the year 1718, wherein he proves, that the present language of the Maltese contains a great deal of the old Punic in it. The materials of which this tract consists, he was supplied with by one father James Stanislaus John Baptift Ribier de Gattis, a missionary Jesuit, and native of Malta, who very well understood the language (C) of the Maltese, having resided many years amongst them. This piece is very curious, containing proofs that this island was, for a considerable period of time, subject to the Carthaginians; and that the Punic tongue was planted and continued in it, as likewise a large collection of Maltese words more remote from the Arabic than from the Phoenician, Chaldee, or Syrian. We cannot pretend to transfer the whole treatise, though it is but a short one; but as the Maltese names of the cardinal numbers differ pretty much from those of other living languages, except the Arabic; as they come nearer the terms expressing those numbers in the Phoenician or Chaldee, than any other tongue; and consequently furnish us with a strong argument, that the Maltese tongue has much of the old Punic in it; and at the same time improve our idea of this idle; we think we cannot do our curious readers a greater pleasure than by inferring them.

Maltese

(C) One of the authors of this history was very well acquainted with this Father Ribier, or, as he called himself, Riviere, at Oxford, where he died in the year 1736. He confirmed this person by word of mouth every particular he had communicated to M. Maius, and added some others; viz. that he had carefully examined most of the Oriental words in the Maltese tongue, and found they approached much nearer the Hebrew and Chaldee than the Arabic; that the natives had a sort of tradition, that they were descended from the Carthaginians, &c. He was a very good Orientalist, and had his education, as he related, in the Jesuits' college at Ingoldstät in Bavaria. Some small MSS. pieces he left in the hands of the person above-mentioned.
1. Our readers will at first sight discover, that the Maltese words in general here are almost the same with the Chaldee; which seems to be a confirmation of what Priscian and St. Austin assert, viz. that about their time the Punic language, notwithstanding it agreed in the main with the Hebrew, was tinged with the Chaldee.

2. It ought to be observed, that, tnei, two, borrows נ tau from the Chaldee, and י from the Hebrew; that huehet, one, and elf, a thousand, are the Hebrew י and מלח; that the numerals from ten to twenty end in as, like the Greek μεν δεκα τρια ρετεις and that the rest are Punic or Phoenician (D).

3. From the numerals ending in "in" from twenty to an hundred, and those ending in "a" from two to eleven, it is evident, that the language of Malta even till follows the Chaldean and Syriac form; and that the Punic did so in St. Austin's time, and much higher, is plain from several Punic words that might be produced, though 'tis probable, that in very early times it nearly resembled the Hebrew or Phoenician.

4. In support of what has been advanced by Maius, it may be further considered, that Joannes Quintiniius Hadus, an author who lived in Malta about the middle of the sixteenth century, was of the same opinion, affirming that the island of Malta was formerly subject to the Carthaginians; that the African, i.e. Punic, tongue was spoken there in his time; that there were then extant some pillars in the island, that had Punic inscriptions upon them; and that the Punic words to be found in Plautus, Avicenna, &c. were perfectly understood by the Maltese; which he urges as an argument, that the old Punic tongue was not even then much corrupted. All which is confirmed by Fazellus in his curious history of Sicily; and this gives a great sanction to the other's authority.

5. According to Father Ribier de Gattis, the Maltese have the following proverb amongst them at this day: Il fist isfittiech peft; tnel attieh, li iehdeo inkella, i.e. "The " plagew wants a piece of money; give it two, if it will " withdraw itself from you." Now this very proverb was a Punic one in St. Austin's days, as he himself affires us. This greatly contributes to evidence what M. Maius had in view.

From the whole we may conclude, that Poetellus, Schiader, and Druisius, have not that foundation for maintaining the Arabic and Punic tongues to have been the same, as Selden, Scaliger, Bochart, Reineuilius, and others, have for supposing

(D) And so are those that end in as, which is evidently the first syllable of the Hebrew numerals; if so, the numbers from ten to twenty are nearer to the Hebrew than the Chaldee. Perhaps the Greek words here mentioned ending in as, derive that termination from the same original. supposing that the Hebrew, Chaldee, Phœnician, and Punic, were always most nearly related, and even originally the same (E). The Punic letters, as well as language, at first must certainly have been the Phœnician, for the reason above assigned; and though they were considerably altered by length of time, yet 'tis certain they always retained a great similitude to their originals, as will appear from a nice inspection into the characters upon the most elegant Phœnician and Punic coins. The character, however, upon the Punic coins is various, many of those found in Spain, as well as Sicily, having letters entirely rude and barbarous, whilst the better fort

(E) In Arnobius's time the Punic language (4) was still spoken in that part of the country bordering upon the Garamantes; but more northerly the Latin tongue was used; besides these, in the Mediterranean parts, no less than twenty-languages, or rather dialects, prevailed. Bochart thinks (5), that the first Latin verses of the unknown language in Plautus were Libyan, because they were entirely different from the other. 'Tis certain the Carthaginians spoke both Punic and Libyan; for which reason they were called Mgidilybes, Bilingues, and Bisulcilingues (6).

Laftanofa (7), a curious Spanish author, affirms many of those coins, that Aldrete and others took to be Carthaginian, to have been old Spanish medals. He affirms further, that the character on these coins is different from the Carthaginian. This he in some measure proves by observing, that the characters on the pieces dug up about Cadiz and in Andalusia, with which parts the Carthaginians had a more immediate communication, were very different from those found on others discovered in places not so well known to that people. 'Tis certain one of the Spanish medals given us by Aldret (8), as well as the greatest part of those collected by this author, has characters upon it bearing little or no resemblance to the Punic. This author's work was printed at Huesca in 1645, and contains a handiome collection of Spanish medals, which we may possibly have occasion to consider more fully when we come to the history of Spain. Aldrete and others believe many Punic pieces had Libyan letters upon them; which may possibly be true; but that it really is so, we must not presume to affert.

fort exhibit a character resembling the Phænician, and even the Assyrian or Hebrew letters. Two questions here arise, which we shall beg leave to consider.

First, whether the Samaritan character, which is by many persons believed, be the same with the antient Phœnician? And Secondly, whether the Samaritan or the Assyrian, commonly called the square letters, were the antient character of the Hebrews?

As to the first, in order to determine the point couched in it, we must diligently compare the letters of the Samaritan Pentateuch with those of the legends found upon the Samaritan and Phœnician coins. This has been done with the utmost accuracy by Reland and Loescher; from whom it appears, that there is a very considerable discrepancy betwixt them; almost, if not entirely, as considerable as that betwixt the old Assyrian, or Hebrew alphabet, and the character found on these coins. This is rendered evident beyond dispute by the two learned men aforesaid, who have obliged the world with an exact and just delineation of all the principal Samaritan and Phœnician coins. From whence we cannot but infer, that the antient Phœnician character was different from the present Samaritan.

With regard to the second question, it must be owned, that the greatest part of the learned world, for above a century, have held it in the affirmative. But it must likewise be owned, that no number of great names can give a sanction to error, and that this point has not been considered thoroughly till of late. The main argument all along insistently upon in defence of this opinion has been taken from the legends found upon some coins, said to have been dug up in Judæa; wherein are discovered these words, Jerusalem the holy, and the shekel of Israel. The letters of these legends are ascertained to be the Samaritan; and since neither the Samaritans, by reason of their known aversion to the Jews, nor the ten tribes after their separation from the other two, because from that period they had nothing to do at Jerusalem, could possibly have struck these pieces, 'tis from hence inferred, that they must have belonged to the Jews before the captivity, or even to the Israelites, before the separation of the the ten tribes; and consequently, that the Samaritan letters, supposed to be the same with those on these coins, were the Hebrew character in the most early times, and that in which the sacred books of the old testament were originally written.

This is the argument which has all along been deemed sufficient to overthrow all the facts, reasonings, and authorities, that can be produced on the other side of the question; and which the learned Dr. Prideaux has not scrupled to pronounce unanswerable. But whether or no it really is so, we shall be the better able to judge, when we have maturely weighed the following considerations:

1. M. Ottius, who applied himself closely to the study of those coins, intimates, that those which are genuine, if any such there be, bear a small proportion to the number of the counterfeits; and that he found it a difficult matter to meet with any of them. How then can we be assured, that those mentioned by bishop Walton and Dr. Prideaux are genuine? 'Tis not sufficient to say, there were some of them in Rabbi Mofes Ben Nachman's days, above five hundred years ago; for how can we be assured, that any of those now extant were then in being? or if we could, what is this to the purpose, since his age is modern, in comparison of the supposed antiquity of those coins? But, (F).

2. Admitting them all to be genuine, yet the letters on them are most certainly not the same with those of the Samaritan Pentateuch. This clearly appears from Reland and Loeschcher above-mentioned, who have given us an accurate plate of all these pieces, as well as a complete alphabet of the letters they exhibit. Nay, 'tis evident from them, that these letters resemble the old Assyrian or Hebrew almost as much as they do the Samaritan.

(F) There is great reason to believe, that not one of the Samaritan coins is genuine, at least not one of them is indisputably so. Reland and Ottius as good as confess it; and from what Spanheim has declared on this head, we may find, that he was in a very great doubt about it (9).

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III

3. SUPPOSING the character on these shekels had been the Samaritan, yet nothing could have been from thence collected in favour of so remote an antiquity of this character as they are brought to prove. For 'tis now universally received amongst the learned, and the dates on the pieces themselves clearly evince it, that the oldest of these coins, with legend upon them, do not precede the settlement of the high-priesthood in the Afinonean family, which happened not much above an hundred and fifty years before the Christian era, and some of them are much later. This single observation, which is supported by the strongest proofs, seems to render all conclusions, drawn from the supposed high antiquity of these coins, perfectly chimerical.

The main difficulty being thus removed, the arguments offered in favour of the contrary opinion cannot fail of having great weight with all persons of penetration and impartiality. The principal of them are the following:

1. There cannot be conceived a greater antipathy between any two nations, than that which subsisted between the Jews and Chaldæans or Babylonians, especially after the captivity. The former had the latter, and every thing belonging to them, in the utmost abhorrence and detestation. 'Tis morally impossible therefore, that they should have forsaken their own character, after their return from Babylon, to adopt that of the others.

2. The Phœnicians received their alphabet from the Assyrians; of course, therefore, the Assyrian letters must have been prior to the Phœnician. If, therefore, the Assyrian and Phœnician alphabets were different, the square or Chaldee letters are prior to the Phœnician; if the same, as we are inclined to believe, the square or Chaldee letters are the true old Hebrew character, and the original letters of the east.

3. From a diligent comparison of the Phœnician, Samaritan, Syriac, old Arabic or Cophic, &c. with the ancient Assyrian or Hebrew letters, it will appear that all the others were derived from the Assyrian. The ducts of these letters are plain, easy, and simple, such as 'tis natural to suppose the first letters were; the letters on the Phœnician coins are the next to these in plainness, ease, and simplicity, and bear a great analogy to them; and lastly, the Samaritan letters are the others, with some additional strokes and lines intermixed, which, which, at first sight, carry with them the air of novelty in respect of the Assyrian. This has been set in so strong a light by two or three eminent hands, that it will be a great pleasure to our learned readers to consult them.

4. The Septuagint version is of higher antiquity than any of those coins, which are supposed to have the Samaritan character upon them. Now 'tis certain the authors of this version have frequently differed from the Hebrew, by their mistaking one similiar Assyrian letter for another. This is an undeniable argument, that the individual Hebrew copy they translated was written, not in the Samaritan, but the Assyrian character; and consequently, that the Hebrew text of the old testament was written in that character, before any of those shekels brought to prove the antiquity of the Samaritan letters were in being.

5. The Samaritan Pentateuch itself differs in several places from the Hebrew. Many of these differences arise from a confusion of similar letters, not Samaritan, but Assyrian; as namely, the ב with the ב, the י with the י, the ג with the ג, the פ with the פ, the נ with the נ, and. This must be owned to be the strongest proof imaginable, that the Samaritan was posterior to, and even taken from, the Pentateuch written in the Assyrian character; and of course bids fair to put an end to this famous dispute (G).

(G) The learned baron Spanheim, Dr. Allix. Conringius, and others, have entirely overthrown the common opinion of the antiquity of the Samaritan letters, from several topics not mentioned by us here. But this is the most effectually done by the famous Dr. Carpzou of Leipfick, in his defence of the Hebrew text of the old testament against Mr. Whifton. In relation to the last argument here offered, no further satisfaction can be either given or required by the most curious reader, than what may be met with from him (10).

Father

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

We cannot recollect, that any person has hitherto tried to explain the legends on any of the Punic coins, notwithstanding the letters on many of them seem to be nearly related, partly to the Hebrew, partly to the Syriac, and partly to the Phoenician.

However, in order to excite others, who have more leisure and greater abilities, to some attempts of this kind, we shall here endeavour at an explanation of those upon two Siculo-Punic medals; hoping that our readers will consider the subject as it really is, dark and intricate, and therefore make all favourable allowances for whatever mistakes may be discovered in our conjectures.

I. The first which is here exhibited is taken from Paruta, who ranks it amongst the coins belonging to the city of Panormus, now known by the name of Palermo. Upon the reverse is a horse in full speed, with these two Punic letters £, which we think ought to be read hhet or hhit, and in our opinion, stands for hhittim or hhitte, i. e. of the Carthaginians. That the two letters are hhet and tau, appears from Spanheim, Reland, Loescher, and others; and that the names of cities, or rather their inhabitants, especially Greek cities, are frequently found upon the reverses of coins belonging to them, is too obvious to need any proof. Panormus therefore being the metropolis of the Carthaginian part of Sicily, and in the neighbourhood of the Greeks, if not itself filled with them, 'tis no wonder the Carthaginians there should in this respect imitate the people with whom they lived. What may serve to confirm this is, that we find several Greek coins of the Panormitanis, done in the manner above-

Father Sonciet indeed intimates, that the Samaritan character was restored by Simon. But first, this is a direct begging of the question; for it ought to be proved, that it was antiently in use as to sacred matters amongst the Hebrews, before it should be asserted, that it was restored by Simon. And secondly, supposing this fact, which there is great reason to presume it is not, that the old testament was ordered to be written in the Samaritan character, either by Simon, or any other of the Aofimean family, is an assertion utterly destitute of the least shadow of reason or authority, either Jewish or christian, to support it (11).

above-mentioned, of as high antiquity as these; and there are even instances of Sicilian coins 1 with both the Greek and Punic characters upon them. That the Carthaginians should be called Hittin or Hhitte, i. e. Hittites, we are not to think strange; since Anak 2 and his family, from whom Carthage was called Chaedre-Anach or Chaedre-Anak, were Hittites, and consequently that people were the most eminent of the Phoenicians, from whom the Carthaginians deduced their original. As for the name being abbreviated, this is no uncommon thing. The word ΣΤΠΑ for ΣΤΠΑΚΟΞΙΩΝ is frequently found on the medals of the Syracuans 3, not to mention many other instances which might easily be produced. For a farther illustration of this point, see the following note (H).

II. The

2 Bochart. Phal. l. iv. c. 36.

(H) The Hittites (12) were the primary nation of Canaan, and seem to have been more famous than any of the others. They were not entirely reduced till the time of Solomon, being intermixed with the Israelites, and living in the neighbourhood of the Sidonians and Tyrians. Hence we may conclude, that not only great numbers of them settled in Africa after their expulsion by Joshua, but likewise, that even some of their descendants might attend Dido into the same country. They were so formidable to their neighbours, that from the word מִּיתָה hittah seems to have signified fear, and a sudden confirmation (31). That this Punic word is to be read and interpreted in the manner we propose, will farther appear from hence, that the letter מ is found upon the reverse of several other Panormitan (14) coins, which evidently allude to the state of Carthage, and must have been struck when the Carthaginians were masters of that place (15). 'Tis also worthy observation, that the Greek mark or abbreviation on the reverses of these medals, peculiar to the Panormitans, considered as Greeks, was נא, נא or נא, i. e. ΠΑΝ for (16) ΠΑΝΟΡΜΙΤΑΝ. We may therefore reasonably

II. The second coin we are supplyed with by Haym, who, following other antiquaries, supposes the hero there represented to be Hannibal. The Punic legend is ﬀﬡﬡﬡ, every one of which letters we shall endeavour to decipher.

The first ﬀ is evidently the same with the old Oriental aleph given us by Loescher, as well as the Syriac olaph. It likewise in figure approaches near the Phoenician aleph or alpha, (א) as found on coins, wanting only the transverse line at the top, which by length of time, might easily have grown into diffuse amongst the Carthaginians. We may therefore esteem it as equivalent to A ב.

The second ﬡ is apparently the Phoenician ﬕ, which letter we see upon several Phoenician coins in Spanheim. The Etruscan ﬊ likewise comes near it. We may therefore assert ﬡ ﬕ to be NN ט.

Sonably imagine, that the Carthaginians had likewise an abbreviation in their own language and character, viz. ₵ or ﬡ, i.e. hhit for hhittin, or emphatically hhitte. That these letters were an abbreviation, is so apparent, that Havercamp (17) pronounces them the mark of Panormus; though he absurdly confounds them with the Greek ﬠ, whereas they are entirely different from it, and indisputably the Phoenician lheth and tau. It must be owned indeed Havercamp will not allow these coins to be Punic (18); but the Carthaginian horie on ours, as well as the palm-tree and horie on the others, together with the authority of the learned Inveges (19), and the Punic characters on them all, not only refute what he has said, but obviate every thing else that can be offered to the contrary.

That this is a Punic abbreviation, in imitation of the Greek manner, is also probable, because every thing on this medal is either Greek workmanship, or an imitation of it. Other Panormitan coins have on their reverses II Albums (20), which greatly strengthens what has been advanced. If we suppose the horie here to be of the same organ with koph, as it sometimes is, being by some pronounced cheth, then this abbreviation may be chat or chart, i.e. of the Carthaginians. Perhaps this conjecture will please some of our readers better than the other.

The third letter is the Phœnician $\backslash$ inverted $\Lambda$. The inversion of letters is a thing that frequently happens; but at present we shall content ourselves with naming one instance only. From the Phœnician $\backslash$ is formed the Greek $\Gamma$ or $\Sigma$. The Punic $\Psi$ is therefore of the same power with I.

The last letter $\Upsilon$ is a more rude and simple kind of beth; for it differs only from the Phœnician $\mathfrak{A}$ and Hebrew $\mathfrak{B}$ beth in this, that it is destitute of the transverse line at the bottom, and has the vertical angle more acute than that of the Hebrew, and the line parallel to the transverse one at the bottom of the Phœnician beth defaced. In fine, as there is no other letter of the Phœnician alphabet, to which this approaches so near as it does to beth, we may conclude, that they were the same; and therefore we must look upon $\Upsilon$ as B.

Thus we find, that $\Upsilon \Upsilon \Upsilon \Upsilon \Upsilon$ expressed in Latin letters is ANNIB, in conformity to the sentiments of Haym, and other antiquaries. And we can assure our readers, that the Punic characters here do not differ so much from the Phœnician, with which we have compared them, as the various forms of the same Phœnician letters found on different medals do from one another.

It has been observed above, that the suffetes of Carthage were called kings by the Greeks; that one of these, at least, was possessed of a vast degree of power, that Hannibal was, some time, the supreme magistrate of Carthage; that he acted in that city, in a manner without control; and, in fine, that he was deified there in his life-time. After this, who can be surprised, that he should have had his name and effigies upon coins? For our part, we think nothing more probable, and without the additional proof of this medal, should not have scrupled to have affirmed it (I).

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

As to the progress of the liberal arts and sciences amongst the Carthaginians, and the degree of perfection they arrived at in them, we have not much to say. If Carthage could ever have boasted of any famous productions of this kind, they are all now lost; though for our parts we are inclined to believe, that this people gave themselves up so entirely to commerce, that they paid little or no regard to any branch of literature. Military skill some of their generals were most eminently famous for, though even in this they seem to have been very deficient, till put into a right method by Xanthippus the Lacedaemonian; but philosophy, we have reason to apprehend, was always at a low ebb amongst them. As they undoubtedly therefore applied themselves chiefly to trade and navigation, as also to the military art, that they might be the better enabled thereby to enjoy in security their immense wealth and possessions, their arts and learning will not be a very copious topic; and even this we must for a moment suspend, in order to give our readers a short sketch of some of their principal customs.

They suffered no private injury, offered by any person whatsoever to another, to go unpunished. This maxim of equity they received from their first ancestors, and were very strict on all occasions in the observance of it w.

No one was permitted to carry the news of any near relation's death to another, but some person convicted of a capital crime, for which he was soon to suffer. They thought the messengers of such tragical events ought soon to die, or at least never more to appear before the persons to whom they brought the melancholy advice x.

If any remarkable misfortune happened to the city, the walls were all hung with black. This was done after the destruction of their fleet by Agathocles; after the loss of their army under Himilco's conduct in Sicily by the plague, and upon other such dismal occasions, as we are informed by various authors y.

They used dog's flesh for food till the time of Darius Hystaspis; but upon that prince's conceiving some disgust at this this practice; they left it off, at least for a certain period of time a.

The soldiers were prohibited, under the severest punishment, whilst in the field, to taste wine; a laudable instance this of their temperance and sobriety a.

Every soldier, at least every officer, wore a number of rings answering to the number of campaigns he had made. This doubtless was intended to excite a noble spirit of emulation amongst them, inspire them with a thirst after military glory, and consequently lead them on to the greatest achievements b.

Their generals, tho' perfectly innocent, upon any disaster, were frequently put to death. This probably was degigned to oblige them to make use of all their skill, address, and vigilance; tho' after all, it was a most barbarous and imprudent custom. This wild maxim prevails amongst the Turks, who are justly looked upon as barbarians for it, at this day c.

The populace and the senators had distinct baths appoint-ted them. This in general we are told by Valerius Maximus; but what gave occasion to this, he says not, nor gives us any further particulars concerning it d.

It was usual with many of them to have statues or busts of their lovers or intimate friends in their bed-chambers, that they might, in some measure, see and converse with them when absent. This appears from Silius, in his account of Dido after Æneas's departure from her e.

Dignity and power in this state could not screen any great offender from condign punishment. Of which Machæus, Hanno, Bemilear, and others, that we shall meet with in the course of this history, are pregnant instances f.

Their anniversary festivals were observed with great solemnity, particularly the day on which the Tyrians, under the conduct of Dido, began to lay the foundations of Carthage. This, according to Silius, seems to have been celebrated yearly, even till the destruction of the city, with the utmost splendor and magnificence g.

There were no public ins amongst them. They entertained strangers as friends in their own private houses.

This was likewise a custom amongst other nations, particularly the Greeks and Romans. Hence it came to pass, that the same word frequently signified friendship and hospitality. The manner of receiving guests or strangers was thus: A dye or token was divided into two parts; one of these was given to the guest, and upon his producing it to the master of the house, he was received by him, and ever afterwards entertained as a friend. This token was transmitted down to posterity, and kept in the family as a mark of friendship with the person or his family to whom it related. Hence those who violated the laws of hospitality were said to fellarum hospitalem frangere. The deity profiting over these laws was invoked by the name of Jupiter Xenius, as the god of friendship was called Jupiter Philius, and that of society or good-fellowship Jupiter Hetaerius.

It was a custom with the Carthaginians to consult their augurs and dates upon all emergencies, and before any enterprise of importance was undertaken. Thus Hamilcar, at the siege of Syracuse, consulting one of his vates, was told by him, that the next night he should sup in that city; and, to wade all other instances, Pygmalion, upon his intention to pursue his sister Dido, was assured by the inspired college of vates, that he should feel the resentment of the gods, if he offered, in any manner, to obstruct the great design he was gone upon; nay, according to St. Austin, these vates were in great repute about these parts long after the destruction of Carthage, since one of them, named Albicerius, was very famous there in his time for the responses he gave.

The magistrates, during the exercise of their power, were obliged to abstain from wine, though that this institution was observed always to the expiration of the commonwealth, we cannot positively affirm.

The Phoenicians are said to have represented their gods as carrying large bags or sacks full of money; because gold amongst them was the emblem of power, and symbol of dominion. Perhaps the Carthaginians represented theirs in the same manner, which, together with the vast quantities of treasure continually rolling into their coffers, and the great variety variety of the most precious commodities brought from all parts of the world in their ships, might occasion that infatiable avarice they were so famous for.

Several other customs might here be mentioned; but as they may be more properly referred to the manners and disposition of the Carthaginians in general, we shall comprise them all in the following short character of that people.

Their minds were entirely set upon amassing wealth, being mean-spirited, groveling and for did to an incredible degree. In order to this, they stuck at no low, not to say infamous, arts. This must be understood of the Carthaginian in the later periods, and towards the decline of their state; for it is not to be questioned, but that they were of a better turn of mind in the earliest ages, and that, even to the last, they had many generous and heroic souls amongst them. The arder and public spirit the women themselves showed just before the last siege of Carthage, as well as during that siege, sufficiently prove this. In short, we find such a contrast of good and bad qualities in this people, that it is almost impossible to determine which of them were predominant. It must only be observed, that the nearer we approach the destruction of their city, the worse we find them. However, as the characters we have of the Carthaginians come handed down to us chiefly from the Romans, their implacable enemies, we must not pay too great a regard to them. The Romans took care to destroy, not only their archives, which, by the way, shews, that that nation ought to be reckoned amongst those where barbarism prevailed, but almost every thing they wrote, that had any appearance of literature or true history.

Polybius makes it his complaint, that both Phillinus and Fabius Pictor, the Carthaginian and Roman historians, were so partial in their relations, that no great credit could be given to either of them, when treating of the Carthaginian affairs. Of their perfidiousness and black ingratitude, history supplies us with abundant proof, which will hereafter be produced. According to Plutarch, they were of a morose, saturnine and savage disposition (K), utterly averse to every thing

(K) The great Hannibal was an exception to this general character of the Carthaginians given by Plutarch. Though that renowned thing that had but the least appearance of wit or raillery, not being able to bear a joke, in which they were diametrically opposite to the genius of the Athenians and Lacedaemonians. Some of them were likewise acted by an intolerable spirit of arrogance, and most vicious ambition, by which they were prompted to desire divine honours. Of this Hanno affords us a flagrant instance *, who, as we are told by Aelian, taught birds to say, Hanno is a god; though this did not answer his end, since, after their flight from him, they returned to their former notes again (L).

renowned general was, for many years, so much employed in military labours, he yet found means to cultivate the muses. Some of his repartees, that have been transmitted down to us, plainly shew, that he had a great fund of natural wit. This he improved by the most polite education that could be bestowed at that time, and in such a republic as Carthage. Tho' several smart turns, that have been attributed to him by the ancients, might be produced, yet we shall content ourselves here with one out of Macrobius (22): Antiochus, valuing himself upon the rich armour and splendid accoutrements of his troops, asked Hannibal at a review, Whether he thought they were sufficient for the Romans, meaning to cope with them? Hannibal, far from being dazzled with the pompous appearance they made, replied, That the Romans were indeed very avaricious; but that however, he thought, these were abundantly sufficient for them, i. e. that the plunder accruing to the Romans from them was enough to satisfy that rapacious people. This was a proper re-buke to Antiochus for his preposterous notion of military bravery, and at the same time a specimen of brilliant and flowing wit in Hannibal.

(L) The Carthaginians were extremely addicted to corruption, to which their constitution itself had a natural tendency, as Aristotle (23) has rightly observed. Their chiefs frequently made use of this with good success, when all other expedients failed them. The Barchine faction supported themselves a long time by the venality of their fellow citizens; and others after them pursu’d the same method of acting, which ended in the total ruin of the commonwealth. In consequence of this mean disposition, in prosperity they were elevated to a pitch inconsistent with the maxims of prudence and moderation, and in adversity as much depressed. Of this we shall meet with various examples hereafter (24).

Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

Commerce, the army, and the marine, were the principal, if not sole, objects of publick attention at Carthage. These so entirely engrossed the minds of all people there, that they had no inclination to pursue, nor indeed any great taste for, the liberal arts and sciences. However, they must have known something at least of the rudiments of astronomy, since, without this, they could not have been tolerably versed in the art of navigation. Besides, the Edomites and Phœnicians were famous for being the greatest adepts, with the Egyptians, in the celestial sciences, of all other nations. The Carthaginians therefore, their descendents could not have been void of a competent knowledge herein. That they had some notion likewise of sculpture and painting, tho' the degree of perfection they arrived at in them we cannot pretend to ascertain, is plain from the Dii Patres, they carried along with them in their voyages, as likewise from the pictures with which their ships of war, and other vessels, were adorned. As a sea-faring and mercantile people are always ingenious in contriving a variety of commodities to supply the necessities or luxury of other nations with, it is also probable, that they were very well acquainted with the

At their weddings they entertained their friends with the tunny fish; another remarkable custom that deserves mentioning.

The Carthaginians paid the greatest deference to their nobility, who held a most distinguished rank amongst them. Some persons were reputed nobles, or at least upon a level with them, on account of their riches; for Aristotle intimates, that wealth had a vast influence at Carthage, as well as nobility of birth; and that great regard was had to both in filling the high posts of the state, when vacant. Others received the title of nobles, as a mark of distinction due to them for their superior virtue and merit. And lastly, others derived their nobility from a long train of noble ancestors. These were the proper nobility; of whose families in order to render this history the more complete, we shall beg leave to present our readers with the following genealogical table, though it must be owned to be a very imperfect one:

of arms, &c. in Carthage, put this point beyond dispute (M).

After what has been said, our readers will not expect to meet with many persons of erudition amongst the Carthaginians, though, without doubt, they had more than their enemies have informed us of. The Romans, as has been just observed, made great havoc both amongst their public and private writings, and this out of a principle of envy and malice prepenfe. However, the names of some of their writers have been transmitted down to posterity, the principal of which are the following:

HANNIBAL, the most renowned general Carthage ever produced, was well versed in the Greek language. According to Cornelius Nepos and Plutarch, he wrote several pieces in it, particularly the history of Manlius Vulso’s proconsulship in Asia 9.

MAGO, another celebrated general of the Carthaginians, acquired as much glory to his country by his writings, as his military achievements. He wrote twenty-eight volumes upon husbandry, which the Roman senate had in such esteem, that, after the taking of Carthage, when they presented the African princes with the libraries founded there, they ordered these books to be translated into Latin, though Cato had before written copiously on that subject. The libraries above-mentioned are a further proof, that learning was not entirely banished Carthage 9.

PHILINUS, though a Sicilian, being born at Agrigentum, is esteemed by Polybius as a Carthaginian historian. He wrote a history of the wars betwixt the Romans and the state of Carthage; but disguised facts so palpably in favour of the latter, 9 Corn. Nep. in Hannib. Plut. in Scip. 9 Cic. l. i. de orat. n. 249. Plin. l. xviii. c. 3.

(M) So famous was Carthage for its artificers, that any singular invention or exquisite piece of workmanship seems to have been called, even by the Romans, their implacable enemies, Punic. Thus the Punic beds or couches, the Punic windows, the Punic wine-presses, the Punic lanterns, &c. were of all others esteemed the most neat and elegant for their workmanship by that people. This is an undeniable proof, that the Carthaginians had not only good mechanical heads and hands, but likewise excelled all other nations, their original ancestors excepted, in every thing of that kind (25).
latter, that, were his performance still extant, it would not be held in any great repute, especially after the stigma Polybius has fixed upon it. Fabius Pictor, though in the main a good historian, yet, in most points relating to the Carthagnians, was guilty of an as great partiality on the Roman side.
This we learn from Polybius, who, in order to arrive at truth, has steer'd the middle course betwixt them both 7.

Himilco, a sea officer, was sent by the senate of Carthage to discover the western shores and ports of Europe. This he did, and wrote a journal of his voyage, together with an account of his discoveries, which were inserted in the Punic annals. Featus Avienus 8 has entirely followed this author in his description of the western coasts of the world; and intimates, that he saw the original journal itself in the annals foretold. Nay, from Featus it appears, that the Carthagnians were acquainted with the Britannic islands, which he calls Oestrymides.

Hanno, another Carthaginian general, by order of the senate, failed with a considerable fleet 1 round Africa. He entered the ocean by the straits of Gibraltar, made many important discoveries, and had continued his navigation, if provisions had not failed him. He wrote a relation of his voyage, an extract from, or rather a fragment of a Greek version of which, is still remaining. He is said to have hung up in Juno's temple some skins of several savage women, whom he ordered to be slain. Isaia Vossius, in opposition to his father, supposes him to have been older than either Homer or Hesiod; but the great Mr. Dodwell solidly and learnedly refutes this notion. If Pliny be to be credited, Hanno and Himilco above-mentioned were contemporaries. It is certain there were two Carthaginian generals of these names in the time of Agathocles. Whilst Himilco steer'd towards the west, in order to discover new countries, Hanno took his course from Gades or Cadiz to the farthest parts of Arabia. Mr. Dodwell thinks, that the piece going now under the name of Hanno's periplus, is not his, but was written by a Sicilian Greek. However, it cannot be denied, that he penned a relation of his voyage, since this is often quoted by the antients. This most learned gentleman has, with the greatest appearance of truth, fixed his time somewhere be-

Silanus was an historian, who wrote of the Carthaginian affairs in the Greek language; from whence it should appear, that he was a Greek. Some authors take him to have been the same with Philinus above-mentioned; but of this we have no sufficient proof, and therefore we must look upon them as two distinct writers.

Clitomachus, called in the Punic language Asdrubal, was a great philosopher. He succeeded the famous Carneades, whose disciple he had been, and maintained in Athens the honour of the academic sect. Cicero says, that he was a more sensible man, and fonder of study, than the Carthaginians generally were. He composed several books, in one of which he drew a piece to console the unhappy citizens of Carthage, who, by the ruin of the city, were reduced to slavery. By this it is manifest, that he lived after the destruction of that city by Scipio.

Now we are upon the arts and learning of the Carthaginians, it will not be foreign to our subject to mention what Pliny tells us of Hanno, viz. that he was the first man who dared to touch, and could tame, a lion. The same author adds, that he was condemned, which must either imply in death or banishment, upon account of this art; since his countrymen could not be perjured, but that he who had the power of softening the fiercest of beasts, must likewise be capable of influencing the minds of his fellow-citizens in such a manner, as to become master of their freedom. This is related to us by Pliny, and it is either an argument of their extreme weakness, or his extreme credulity. Some believe this person to have been the writer Hanno above-mentioned.

AMONGST

(N): In one respect we may rank the celebrated Terence amongst the writers of this city, since, according to Donatus, he was born at Carthage (26). Being taken captive when very young, either by Scipio at the conclusion of the second Punic war, as some

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

Amongst other inventions this nation was famous for, we must not forget that of the quadriremes, or four-oared galleys.

Some will have it, or, as others say, by the Numidians, in one of their incursions into the Carthaginian territories; some time after that war, he became the property of Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator. Terentius, being much taken with the fine disposition of his slave, not only gave him an excellent education, but likewise enfranchised him; and called him after his own name, as was the prevailing custom of those times. In the consulship of T. Manlius Torquatus and Cn. Octavius Nepos, this famous dramatic poet was in his highest reputation (27). Tho’ an African born, yet his diction is most pure, elegant, and polite; in so much, that some have not scrupled to affirm, that he received considerable affinitie in the comedies ascribed to him from Scipio and his friend Lælius. It is certain, that either to please thee great men, who were not unwilling to be thought concerned with him in those performances, or because it was true, he himself countenanced this notion (28). Six of those comedies only are now extant, all of which were highly esteemed at Rome, and meet with prodigious applause when acted there: Fenestella makes him to have been older than (29) Scipio and Lælius; but Cornelius Nepos is more to be credited, who affirms them all to have been contemporaries. Suetonius says (30), that, in his return from Greece, he lost an hundred and eight comedies translated from Menander, of whom he was a great admirer, and could not survive an accident which afflicted him in a most sensible manner. However this be, he died in the consulship of Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and M. Fulvius, aged thirty-five years. He is said to have been of a middle stature, flender, and of a swarthy complection. He had a daughter who survived him, and was married to a Roman knight.

Under this note we shall likewise beg leave to observe, that it is intimated by Plutarch (31), that this Hanno made use of lions as beasts of burden; which is confirmed by Ovid and Silius (32). If we will believe Ælian (33), there were lions in the temple of Adonis of Tyre, that they fawned upon per ons at their entering in, came to the table there when called, and, after taking what was given them, modestly retired. The same author tells us, that the Indians (34) had fo tamed their lions, that with them they hunted bulls, wild asses, and all other savage animals. John II. king of Portugal is reported to have had a lion always following galleys, which the antients attributed to the Carthaginians. It is moreover probable, that they were the first who made cable-ropes for large vessels of the shrub spartum, which was a sort of broom; at least, that they were the first who communicated this invention to the Romans. But this perhaps more properly belongs to the navigation and trade of the Carthaginians, which we shall now endeavour to give our readers a succinct idea of.

With regard to trade and navigation, (for we shall consider them jointly) no nation was ever more famous for these, nor enjoyed them in a larger extent, than they did. The Mediterranean, and all the ports in it, they were perfectly acquainted with. In the eastern parts they pushed their discoveries and commerce as far as any nation whatsoever, and to the westward, in all probability, farther. Britain and the Canaries were known to them; nay, according to some, America itself; but this seems to be a conjecture without sufficient foundation. The formidable fleets they fitted out on many occasions, the vast quantity of shipping they kept in continual employ, the honour they had for a long period of time of being almost universally acknowledged as masters of the sea, to omit many others, are most glaring proofs of the flourishing of their trade and navigation. Neither is this without the best authority to support it; for, to wave many other authors of unquestionable reputation that occur, it appears from Herodotus and Thucydides, that scarce any people made so great a figure by sea as the Carthaginians, which was the natural effect not only of their genius for naval affairs, but also of the flourishing and extensive commerce they following him like a dog (35); and, according to Paulus Jovius, the king of France gave such a one as this to the cardinal de Medicis. What has been said of the Indians, Paulus Venetus likewise relates of the Tartars (36).

Silenus was an historian mentioned by Cicero, and, as is probable, by Nepos (37). The former of these affurres us, that he wrote a history in Greek, with great care and accuracy, of Hannibal’s expeditions; and that Cælius in some points followed him.

they were in possession of. The basis of this felicity was owing to the Tyrians, from whom they brought the disposition they were so eminent for into Africa. But in process of time they eclipsed the glory of even their ancestors themselves; insomuch, that Pliny derives the origin of trade, not from the Phoenicians, but the Pæni or Carthaginians. The natural fertility of its soil, the surprising skill of its artificers, together with its happy situation, rendered Carthage the center of traffic, the great mart, not only of the Mediterranean, but even of the most remote nations a.

The commodities they supplied other countries with, in great abundance, seem to have been corn and fruits of all kinds; divers sorts of provisions, and high saucées; wax, honey, oil, the skins of wild beasts, &c. all the natural produce of their own territories. Their staple manufactures were utensils, toys, cables, all kinds of naval stores, and the colour from them called Punic, the preparation of which seems to have been peculiar to them. From Egypt they fetched fine flax, paper, &c. From the coasts of the Red Sea, spices, frankincense, perfumes, gold, pearls, and precious stones. From Tyre and Phœnicia, purple, scarlet, rich stuffs, tapestry, costly furniture, &c. From the western parts of the world, in return for the commodities carried thither, they brought back iron, tin, lead, copper, &c. In fine, they purchased the superfluities of all nations at an easy price; and by knowing the necessities of them all, and the particular branch of trade adapted to each of them, they sold these at their own rates; which brought immense treasure daily to Carthage, rendered this republic terrible to all her neighbours, and even enabled her to contend so long with Rome for the empire of the world itself b.

Having thus given our readers a general idea of the extensive trade this mighty republic was mistress of, which was the great source of all her wealth and power; we must now beg leave to remark in particular, that no branch of their commerce seems to have been more beneficial to the Carthaginians, than that they carried on with the Persians, Garamantes, and Ethiopians. These remote nations, besides other rich commodities, brought with them carbuncles, of almost insubstantial value, to Carthage; to which place they yearly resort i, as is most likely, in caravans. These gems, from the plenty of them at Carthage, were called by the ancients Charchedonian or Carthaginian, as Pliny relates. From Polybius it appears probable, that the Carthaginian merchants, at the sale of their wares, had a crier and secretary, or clerk, to attend them. No profession was reckoned more honourable than that of the merchant in the dominions of this state; which is not to be wondered at, considering the vast advantage accruing from thence to all orders and degrees of men therein. After this, it will be needless to observe, that the most considerable personages of the city were not ashamed to apply themselves to it e.

We shall close this section with taking notice of a remarkable custom observed by the Carthaginians, and the Libyans bordering on the sea-coasts, in their trafficking with each other, as Herodotus himself has related it d.

"The Carthaginians, says this historian, failing beyond the freight, or pillars of Hercules, traded with the Libyans of those parts in the following manner: After they had got into some creek, they landed their goods; and leaving them exposed on some point of land, returned again on board their ships. They then caused a great smock to be raised, at the sight of which the Libyans immediately came to the place where the wares had been left; and laying down a certain quantity of gold, retired at a good distance from them. Upon this the Carthaginians went on shore a second time; and if upon viewing the gold it appeared to them sufficient, they carried it off, and failed without delay; if not, they left it, and continued quiet on board for some time. The Libyans finding this, made an addition to what they had before deposited; and if this proved insufficient, they continued improving the original "original quantity of gold till the Carthaginians were fatigued, and the bargain made. Neither of these nations offered the least injustice to the other. The Carthaginian did not so much as touch the Libyan gold till it was of equal value with their wares, nor the Libyans the Carthaginian merchandise, till the gold they offered as an equivalent was accepted and taken away."

S F C T. III.

The chronology of the Carthaginians.

The Carthaginian chronology was at first the Phœnician, already by us considered, and, in all probability, ever afterwards, as to its form and manner, agreed with it. That the Carthaginians kept records in the same manner as their ancestors the Tyrians did, cannot well be doubted; especially, if we consider, how closely they adhered to the customs and maxims of those ancestors. Sir Isaac Newton seems to imagine, that the artificial chronology of Emathines did not absolutely prevail among the Romans even in the Augustan age, but thinks that Virgil might have taken some of his historical facts from the records of Carthage, which evidently supposes, that these records might have existed. Servius seems to intimate, that they, or at least some part of them, were in being when he wrote; for he tells us, that, according to the Carthaginians themselves, Dido came from a town called Cherta. But, however this may be, "tis certain, from Solinus and others, that annals, and an epoch, at the destruction of their city, the Carthaginians must have had; otherwise the Romans could never have known how many years had elapsed from the foundation to the destruction of that metropolis, as we find they did. But this is so apparent, that we shall insist no further upon it.

The method of computing time from the building of cities was in use throughout a good part of the east in very early ages, though it was of a later date at Rome, particularly among the Lydians, Syrians, and Phœncians, as it was likewise amongst their descendants the old Etruscans and Carthaginians. This is evident beyond contradiction from Pliny, Suetonius, Censorinus, Scaliger, and a famous inscription, whose epoch is the foundation of Interamna in Umbria.

* Newton's chronol. p. 64, 93, &c. Serv. in Aen. i. & Aen. iv. Solin. c. 20.
The History of the Carthaginians.

Umbria, which Gruter and Jussus Fontaninus, in his antiquities of Horta, have given us. The ancient year of the Phoenicians, as well as that of the other eastern nations, was most certainly luni-solar, i.e. it consisted of twelve lunar months, containing thirty days each, with intercalary months to make up what the twelve lunar months wanted of the solar year. At length the Egyptians of Thebes, according to Diodorus and Strabo, introduced the solar year, i.e. they added five days annually to the twelve lunar months, in order to make them agree with the course of the sun. Now as the computation by the solar years did not take place even in Egypt till the time of Amenophis, (tho' the difference betwixt the solar and calendar years was discovered in the reign of Ammon the father of Seso) i.e. about an hundred and thirty-seven years before the era of Nabonassar; nor amongst the Chaldeans or Babylonians till the commencement of that era; and as Dido's departure from Tyre was at least coeval with, if it did not precede, the former of these events, the luni-solar year was, without dispute, observed then by the Phoenicians, and consequently afterwards by the Carthaginians.

In confirmation of which we must not omit remarking, that Simplicius, in his commentary on the first of Aristotle's physical acrostics, affirms the Damascenes and Arabians, who were either neighbours to the poerity of the old Phoenicians, or intermixed with them, to have had the luni-solar year in use amongst them so late as his time; from whence it is not a little probable, that this was always the Phoenician and Carthaginian year.

We have nothing very material to offer farther on this head, the Carthaginian annals having for a long series of ages been destroyed. As therefore we cannot pretend to give any tolerable particular account, much less a methodical system, of the Carthaginian chronology, all that can be done, in order to satisfy our readers, is, to exhibit to their view a chronological table of some few of the principal transactions in which that famous republic was concerned, including a list of several of its great men, in order of time, as they lived.

The Monarchy of Carthage.

Year of Carthage. Christ.

Dido, the daughter of Mettinus, king of Tyre, founded Carthage. How long she reigned there, history informs us not. 890 or 892

The Republic of Carthage.

After Dido's death, there is a chasm in the history of Carthage for above three hundred years. Only from Justin we learn, that this state was much agitated by intestine commotions during part of that period. The Carthaginians plant a colony in the island Eubulus or Erefus, on the coast of Spain, according to Diodorus. The Tyrrhenian and Carthaginian united fleets are, according to Herodotus, after a bloody engagement, put to flight by the Phocæans, in the sea of Sardinia. 160 739

Which action is likewise mentioned by Thucydides, who relates that the city of Massilia, at present Marseilles, built by the said Phocæans, was then in its infancy (A). 347 543

Machæus, a famous general, gains some considerable advantages over the Africans, with whom the Carthaginians are now engaged in a war. This happened.

(A) That this most ancient naval engagement happened not far from the year, in which our most learned archbishop Usher has placed it, is, in some measure, evident from a circumstance taken notice of by Thucydides in his first book, where he mentions it. That author informs us, that this event happened not long after the foundation of Massilia, or Marseilles, which was built by the Phocæans. Now 'tis asserted by Timæus Siculus, that Massilia was founded by the Phocæans an hundred and twenty years before the battle of Salamis, which falls in with the first year of the forty-fifth olympiad, and consequently the foundation of Massilia preceded the action under consideration fifty-seven years. It might then therefore very justly be said, as Thucydides relates, to have been in its infancy. That Massilia happened, as appears probable from comparing Justin with Orosius, towards the conclusion of Cyrus's reign, or that of his uncle Cyaxares II. and therefore we may place it about the year.

He reduces part of Sicily to the obedience of the Carthaginians.

A plague makes great havoc at Carthage about this time, when the Carthaginians endeavour to appease the gods by sacrificing children.

After a long and successful war in Sicily, the Carthaginian army, under the command of Machæus, thinks proper to retire from that island.

The same army afterwards invading Sardinia, is entirely defeated by the Sardi, and the greatest part of it cut off.

The remaining part, upon their return home, are banished by their countrymen, together with Machæus the general. Incensed at this barbarous treatment, they attack Carthage, carry the city, and, after putting ten senators to death, settle the republic upon its former footing.

Machæus crucifies his son about the same time.

Some time after this the same general, being accused of a design to make himself absolute, is punished with death.

was built by the Phocæans about the time mentioned by Timæus is confirmed by Aristotle, Harpocrates, Scymnus Chius, Justin, Athenæus, and other authors. Both Thucydides and Herodotus likewise seem to relate some events after this, as happening in the time of Cambyses; which may be looked upon as an additional argument in defence of our learned primeur's notion, which he has taken from Eusebius (1).

death, and succeeded by Mago in the command of the army. 367 523

An alliance formed between the Carthaginians and the Romans the year after the regnificus, in the consulship of Brutus and Valerius. 382 528

Mago, after the introduction of military discipline amongst the Carthaginians, dies, leaving their forces in an excellent condition. If Justin is to be credited, this seems to have happened some years before Darius Hythipis died; and therefore we may look upon it to fall justly enough with the year. 401 489

Soon after Mago's death, his two sons Adrubic and Hamilcar attempt the conquest of Sardinia, as likewise to free their country from the annual tribute imposed upon them by the Africans. 401 489

Darius sends embassadors to Carthage to demand a body of auxiliaries against their common enemy the Greeks, for a war with whom he was then making very great preparations. 402 488

At first Adrubic and Hamilcar seem to have had great success in Sardinia, by the number of triumphs Justin assigns Adrubic; but, towards the conclusion of this war, Adrubic is mortally wounded, and the entire command of the army thereby devolves upon his brother Hamilcar. 404 489

A treaty of peace is concluded between the Africans and Carthaginians about this period, by which the annual tribute of the latter is continued. 405 485

The Sicilians implore the assistance of Leonidas, to enable them to shake off the Carthaginian yoke. 405 485

Not long after this Hamilcar is killed in Sicily, leaving behind him three sons, Hamilco or Hamilco, Hanno, and Gisco. 410 489

After the death of Hamilcar, and the to-
The total defeat of the Carthaginian army by Gelon, a peace is made, and Gisco, the son of Hamilcar, banished.

The Carthaginians engage at once in a war with the Moors, Numidians, and other Africans; the result of which is, that they are excused the annual tribute before exacted of them.

Some time after this period the two brothers Philani sacrificed themselves for the honour, as they apprehended, of their country.

The centumvirate instituted, somewhere in this interval, to reduce the exorbitant power of Mago’s family within proper bounds, and be a curb upon their generals, according to Justin.

Hannibal, the son of Gisco, makes an expedition into Sicily, and takes and razes Selinus and Himera.

The same general, in conjunction with Imlilcar, makes another campaign in Sicily; but dies of the plague in his camp before Agrigentum, of which distemper a great part of his army likewise perishes.

Imlilcar, Hannibal’s colleague, takes Agrigentum.

He likewise reduces Gela.

He puts an end to this war by a treaty concluded with Dionysius.

Dionysius takes Motya from the Carthaginians.

Himilco retakes Motya by storm, reduces Messana, and razes it. Mago, the Carthaginian admiral, likewise defeats the Sicilian fleet under Leptines. Himilco advances with his army, drawn up in order of battle, to the very walls of Syracuse, and plunders the temples of Ceres and Proserpina in the suburb of Acerdina; but the plague carrying off a great part of his troops, he is obliged to withdraw.
The Africans, to the number of two hundred thousand, seize upon Tunis, and threaten Carthage itself. But famine and divisions oblige them at last to disperse. Himilco, not being able to survive his misfortunes, puts an end to them by a voluntary death.

Mago, the Carthaginian general, is routed by Dionysius at Abacenum.

A second peace concluded between Dionysius and the Carthaginians.

Dionysius routs the Carthaginians at Cabala in Sicily, but is beaten by them at Cronion, upon which a peace ensues.

A plague breaks out in Carthage, which sweeps away an infinite number of people. The Africans and Sardi rise up in arms, and endeavour to render themselves independent of the Carthaginian flote. A particular species of madness seizes many of the inhabitants of Carthage, and produces dismal effects there.

Dionysius advances, with an army of thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse into the Carthaginian territories. With this force he soon takes Selinus and Entella, and plunders all the adjacent country. The Carthaginians, on the other hand, enter the port of Eryx with two hundred sail, and carry off most of the best Syracusan galleys laid up in that harbour.

Dionysius II, succeeding his father, comes to an accommodation with the Carthaginians.

Paralus, the Carthaginian governor of Minoa, permits Dion to land five thousand arms there, and supplies him with carriages to convey them to Syracuse; by which means that prince is enabled to proceed in his expedition against Dionysius II.
Timoleon brings succours from Corinth to the Syracusans, and lands his forces in Sicily by a stratagem.

He defeats Ictes at Adranum, and possesses himself of Syracuse and Mel fitting, according to Diodorus.

A second treaty concluded between the Carthaginians and the Romans, in which the inhabitants of Tyre and Utica are comprehended.

Timoleon gives a total overthrow to the Carthaginian forces under Mago, upon the banks of the river Crimium.

And concludes a peace with that nation.

About this time, in all probability, Hanno forms a design at Carthage to assume the sovereignty to himself, by destroying the whole body of the senate. He receives but a slight punishment for the first attempt; but upon his having recourse afterwards to arms, and endeavouring to support himself in his rebellion by an alliance with the African princes, he is made an example of the utmost rigor and severity.

Alexander forms the siege of Tyre, upon which the Tyrians send their wives and children to Carthage, where they are kindly received.

The Carthaginians send Hamilcar, surnamed Rhodanus, as their minister to Alexander at his camp before Tyre; and put him to death on his return home.

The Cyrenians apply to the Carthaginians for succours against a body of Greek mercenaries, that invaded them, but in vain.

The Carthaginians send some troops to the assistance of Sofistratus, and the Syracusan exiles, against Agathocles.

They oblige Agathocles to restore the cattle of Mylae to the Messenians.

Hamilcar routs Agathocles at Himera, according to Diodorus Siculus.

Agathocles invades Africa, and gives a memorable defeat there to Hanno and Bomilcar, the Carthaginian generals, according to Diodorus.

581 309

Hamilcar is taken by the Syracusans, and has his head struck off, which is sent to Agathocles in Africa.

582 308

Agathocles prevails upon Ophellas, prince of the Cyrenians, to march to his assistance, and then cuts him off by treachery.

The Carthaginians besiege Syracuse, with an army of fifty thousand men and a fleet of an hundred sail.

612 278

He gives the Carthaginian army, command by Hanno, Bostar, and Hamilcar, a most memorable defeat. 634 256

Hamilcar.
Hamilcar, having received full powers from the Carthaginian Senate for that purpose, concludes a peace with the Romans. This puts a period to the first Punic war, after it had lasted four-and-twenty years.

After various turns of fortune, the African or Libyan war is brought to a happy conclusion by Hamilcar, though the Carthaginians were reduced to the last extremity through the incapacity of Hanno, and Hannibal, by his indolence, had given a great advantage to the enemy.

Hamilcar, being sent by the Carthaginians as their general into Spain, partly by persuasion, subdues nine different nations; but exposing himself too much in a battle with some of the most warlike Spaniards as yet unconquered, he is slain, and succeeded in his post by Asdrubal.

Asdrubal dies, and is succeeded by Hannibal. That general takes Althea, the capital of the Oicodes; conquers that nation, the Vaceae, Carpetani, &c. The Saguntines apprise the Romans of these proceedings.

The Romans, by their ambassadors, demand Hannibal for taking of Saguntum. That general, having settled matters in Spain, makes preparations for a war with the Romans.

This year the second Punic war commences, according to Polybius. Hannibal crosses the Alps, and defeats Scipio near the Ticinus, now called the Teline, after taking Turin, and routing the Gauls, who disputed the passage of the Rhone.

The same general overthrows Sempronius on the banks of the Ticinum.

Hanno is defeated in Spain by Scipio. who extends his conquests as far as the Iberus.

C. Flaminius is overthrown by Hannibal at the lake of Thrasymene, now the Lago di Perugia, with the slaughter of fifteen thousand men.
He likewise gives a terrible repulse to Minucius; but is checked in his progress by Fabius. Cn. Scipio defeats Hanno at the town of Cissa in Spain.

The Roman army commanded by Terentius Varro and Aemilius Paulus, is totally defeated at Cannæ upon the Auspices in Apulia. This was the greatest blow the Romans ever received. The Carthaginians in Spain under Astdubal, are overcome by the Romans.

Philip king of Macedon, by his minister Xenophanes, concludes a treaty with Hannibal.

Hannibal takes Tarentum.

Rome, and advances within five miles of that capital.

Tarentum retaken by Fabius.

Hannibal by a stratagem circumventing M. Claudius Marcellus, and T.
Quintius Crispinus, cuts off Marcellus, and other Romans of distinction.

Edeco, Indibilis, Mandonius, &c. petty kings or reguli of Spain, join Scipio.
By the accession of their forces he is enabled to vanquish Astdubal, the brother of Hannibal, at Bactula, and to drive him out of Spain.

Astdubal, coming with a powerful army into Italy to join Hannibal, is overthrown, and his army ruined.

Scipio in Spain vanquishes Astdubal the son of Gisco, Mago, and Indibilis; draws draws off Mafinifia from the Carthaginian interest; reduces all Spain; and is then recalled to Rome.

Scipio lands in Africa; besieges Utica; burns the camps of Syphax and Ad-drubal; overthrows the Carthaginian, Numidian, and Celtiberian forces; and takes Tunis. Hannibal is obliged to quit Italy, and return to Africa.

An interview between Scipio and Hannibal. The latter of these is entirely defeated at the battle of Zama; which produces a peace, and terminates the second Punic war.

Hannibal, being obliged to leave his native country, lands at Tyre, and afterwards seeks an asylum at the court of Antiochus.

Hannibal dies, according to Livy and Cornelius Nepos.

Mafinifia, depending on his friendship with Rome, makes an irruption into the province of Tysca, and invades the Carthaginian territories.

An embassy is sent from Rome, at the head of which is Cato, to dispose both parties to an accommodation, and determine all differences between them on the spot. But the Carthaginians reject the mediation of the Romans, tho' they had before admitted it; which occasions the third Punic war.

A bloody war breaks out between Carthage and Mafinifia.

The Carthaginians, after the Romans had most perfidiously and inhumanly deprived them of all means of defence, are commanded to abandon their city; which they not complying with, it is totally destroyed by Aemilianus, and levelled with the ground.
Appian tells us in round numbers, that Carthage stood seven hundred years; but Solinus, with great accuracy, determines its duration to have been seven hundred and thirty-seven years, i.e. either so many complete years precisely, or so many complete years, with part of another elapsed, which was not reckoned in the computation. Now, if, with Sir Isaac Newton and Salmantius, we suppose this term to have commenced at the encenologia of dedication of the city, which they have proved, fell upon the sixteenth year of Pygmalion’s reign at Tyre, the beginning of the foundation of Carthage must be placed nine years higher, since Dido came to Africa in the seventh year of that prince’s reign; and consequently this happened seven hundred and forty-six years before the final destruction of that city by Æmilius. Since therefore Josephus, from Menander of Ephesus, or, according to Tatian, Menander of Pergamus, as he is corrected by Petavius, intimates, that Carthage preceded Rome an hundred and forty years, which almost exactly corresponds with Sir Isaac Newton and Salmantius; and since the era of Petavius, which we have followed, does not differ from that of Solinus as stated by the two great men above-mentioned, above two years, a trifle in a point of so remote antiquity, we may look upon these eras as the same. This is a strong presumption, that both of them approach very near the truth; and therefore we may venture to assure our readers, that they cannot greatly err, chuse which of them they please. The chronological synopsis here inserted, gives our readers the whole plan of the affairs of Carthage at one view, and, by enabling them to form a general idea of all the principal events that happened to this republic at once, prepares them for the perusal of the following history with double advantage (B).

(B) We doubt not but the whole learned world will entirely concur with us in our notion of the incomparable archbishop Usher; and, to shew our regard to the memory of so profound a chronologer, we shall endeavour to clear up a point, which he has left a little confused. That most learned prelate fixes the foundation of Rome, with Fabian Pictor, towards the close of the seventh, or beginning of the eighth Olympiad; and yet he will have the year of Rome fix hundred and seven (in which Carthage was finally destroyed) to have preceded the Christian æra an hundred and forty-six years. This seems to render him a little inconsistent with himself; for an hundred forty-six years, added to fix hundred and seven, makes seven hundred and fifty-three.
The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

It may not be improper to inform readers, that the first part of this synopsis depends chiefly upon the authority of Justin and Orosius, compared with Diodorus Siculus, as the latter does upon that of Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, in conjunction with archbishop Usher. The times of the first transactions of this state it is impossible to determine to any tolerable degree of exactness, yet, we hope, our determination of them is not very remote from the truth. In ascertaining the years of those of a later date, we have paid no regard to the sentiments of those writers who differ from Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, as being in point of authority vastly inferior to them.

three years, which, he appears to intimate, was the age of Rome at the birth of Christ. But this seeming inconsistency will vanish, when we consider, that he all along follows Fabius Pictor, who places the foundation of Rome five years lower than Varro, whom Pliny, Solinus, and most of the Roman authors, follow. This observation will obviate all difficulties that might otherwise occur in some material points, from comparing archbishop Usher with the generality of the Roman chronologers, and thereby prevent confusion. The year of Rome, in which the destruction of Carthage happened, according to Fabius Pictor, must have been the six hundred and second, to which add an hundred and forty-six, and it corresponds, as well as the other, with the Christian era. This is a demonstration of the truth of archbishop Usher’s computation in this particular; and nothing further can be added to it. We think it proper to inform our readers here, that, from the commencement of the olympiads, our numbers perfectly agree with them, and consequently are not repugnant either to the Varonian or Fabian account; the with archbishop Usher, we are of opinion, that the latter points out of the true epoch of Rome. It must not be forgot, that we were mistaken in the Roman history, vol. xi. p. 290, & 291, when we made archbishop Usher to prefer Varro’s opinion to that of Fabius; and yet at the same time observed, that the archbishop places the birth of Christ seven hundred and forty-eight years distant from the foundation of Rome, in direct agreement with Fabius. What led us to that mistake, was a passage in him, wherein he seems to follow Varro; but, upon a second perusal of that passage, we are fully convinced, that he there only gives us what, he conceived, was Pliny’s opinion.

SECT. V.
The History of the Carthaginians, from the foundation of their city to the first Punic war.

ELISA, known also by the name of Dido, fled from Tyre in the seventh year of the reign of Pygmalion king of that city. Her flight is said to have been occasioned by the cruel and insatiable avarice of Pygmalion, who was her brother. This prince, in order to secure to himself the immense treasures of his uncle Sichæus, who had married his sister Dido, was the priest of Hercules, and, by virtue of that post, the second person in the kingdom, found means to destroy him. The manner in which this was effected, is differently related: Virgil will have it, that Pygmalion barbarously murdered his uncle at the altar; but Einflathius and Cedrenus intimate that he dispatched him at an hunting match, and then throwing him down a precipice, gave out, that the fall had been the occasion of his death. However, as Sichæus was well acquainted with the

the fordid and avaricious temper of his nephew, he had, by way of precaution, buried his riches under ground; which, with the prudent and artful conduct of Elifa, rendered abortive the tyrant’s design. Sichæus, appearing to his disconsolate widow in a dream, apprised her of his tragical exit, and advised her to fly immediately, in order to avoid the same fate. Upon this she determined to make her escape, and carry off those treasures, which had prompted her brother to so inhuman an action; but, in order to this, she judged it proper for some time to amuse him; which she did by dissembling her resentment, and keeping up the appearance of an affection for him, till an opportunity offered of assembling her friends, andconcerting with them the proper measures for speedily abandoning Tyre. The principal of these were her brother Barca, and several senators, who, hating Pygmalion, and apprehending themselves every moment in danger of being sacrificed by a prince, who had broken through all the ties of nature and humanity, engaged to follow her at all adventures. To execute the design she had formed the more effectually, she applied to the king for vessels to carry her, Barca, and their effects, to Chartica or Chartaca, a maritime town in his dominions, under the pretext of residing there. To this Pygmalion readily agreed, as imagining, that by such a step he should become master of what had so long been the object of his most ardent desires. Elifa, being thus supplied with men and ships, weighed anchor; and being got into the ocean at a proper distance from Tyre, commanded her men to throw into the sea some bags filled with sand, which, she told them, contained the wealth of her husband Sichæus, and, in a doleful tone, entreated his menaces to accept of those riches as an oblation, which had been the cause of his destruction. Then, addressing herself to her companions, she gave them to understand, that there was nothing terrible they might not fear from the tyrant’s resentment, for being instrumental in defeating his avaricious purposes, if ever they fell into his hands; by which means having fixed them more firmly in her interest, she pursued her voyage, and got out of her brother’s reach, before he was apprised of her resolution.

Pygmalion, finding all his hopes thus defeated by his sister's subtility, and being grieved, that those treasures should be snatched from him in a moment, which he thought him-self to be sure of, and which he had so long enjoyed in imagination, gave orders to fit out a fleet with all possibleexpedition, in order to pursue the fugitives; but he wasdiverted from this design by the entreaties of his mother, andthe menaces of the inspired college of vates, who threatenhim with the indignation of the gods, if he offered to obstruct in any manner the grand project Elisa was gone upon b.The first place our heroine touched at was some port in the isle of Cyprus, possibly Salamis, which was then first atCyprus, in its infancy; since, according to Virgil and Servius, inconjunction with the Arundelian marbles, Teucer and Mettinus, Elisa's father, seized upon Cyprus, or at least a part of it, not very long before, when the former of these built Salamis. Here she met with a priest of Jupiter, who offerered to attend her with his whole family, and partake of herfuture fortune; which the readily accepted of. Out of these the Tyrians selected a certain number, Justinsays eighty; and carrying them on board, found them very subervient to their design of planting a new colony d.A 3

From hence they steered their course for the coasts of Africa, and at last happily landed in the province called afterwards Africa Propria, not far from Utica, a Tyrian colony, and city of great antiquity; which we have already described. The inhabitants received their countrymen with all possible demonstrations of joy, and giving them a most kind reception, advised them to build a city upon that spot, to which the fates had conducted them.

It was Elisa's first care, upon her arrival, to cultivate a good understanding with the natives, to which they were by no means, for any considerable time, averse, on account of the advantages they perceived would naturally flow to them from an established commerce and harmony betwixt the two nations. She then purchased a tract of land of them, for her and her wearied Tyrians to settle upon. Justin, Appian, Virgil, Eustathius, Themistius, &c. intimate, that the Phœnicians imposed upon the Africans, when a bargain was made betwixt them, in the following manner: They desired for their intended settlement only so much ground as an ox's hide would encompas. This request the Africans at first laughed at; but were surprized, when, upon their granting it, they found Elisa cut the hide into the smallest threads, and with them surrounded a large extent of territory, on which she built a citadel, from this incident called Brysa. The learned, however, unanimously agree in exploding this fable, which seems to owe its origin either to the envy and malice of the Romans, or the vanity of the Greeks, who ridiculously affected to deduce every thing that favoured of high antiquity from their own nation or language, though never so remote from them. Appian seems to intimate, that at first Elisa met with some opposition from the natives; which may possibly be true, since it is certain an annual tribute for the ground the Tyrians possessed was, by their first agreement with the Africans, exacted from them, which they were obliged to pay for many years after.

The neighbouring people, at first invited by the prospect of lucrè, and with this view repairing to the Phœnician settlement to sell these foreigners the necessaries of life, in a short time incorporated themselves with them. These inhabitants soon growing very numerous, Elisa followed the advice of the Utican embassadors, who were sent to congratulate her upon her happy arrival in the name of their state; and built a new city, or at least much enlarged the old one, which could make no very considerable figure before. As the natives of the country, or Aborigines, were of the same sentiments with the Uticans in this particular, and, as may reasonably be presumed, gave the Tyrians all necessary assistance, both in the building of their city, and peopling it afterwards, Carthage soon became a place of great fame and demanded the respect of all its neighbours.

We are told by Juftin, that, in digging for the foundations of the city, the workmen first found an ox’s head, which was indeed a symbol of fertility of soil, but at the same time prefaged continual toil and perpetual servitude to the city. Upon this they removed to another spot, where, in digging, they discovered an horse’s head, which they interpreted as a happier omen, portending the future martial genius of the inhabitants. Eufathius adds, that the horse’s head had a palm tree, or at least a branch of palm, discovered with it; which they considered, without doubt, as an emblem of victory. This determined Elisa to fix upon that spot for the situation of her city; and in allusion to this it was, that the Carthaginians had, in after-ages, an horse’s head, or an horse and a palm-tree, so frequently upon the reverses of their coins.

The principal names of Carthage have already been given in the first section of the history we are now upon. However, it may not be improper to remark, that the Carthaginians are sometimes called Sidonians, and their city Tyre.

(C) Some of these coins, particularly of the silver and gold ones, are of exquisite workmanship, nothing at all inferior to any of the Greek or Roman. They are found in the kingdoms of Tunis and Algiers, in those parts of Spain the Carthaginians first possessed, and in Sicily. Numbers of them may be seen in Aldro, Paruta, Haym, and the cabinets of the curious.
by antient authors. Eusebius seems to affirm, that its most antient name was Origo; but as Carthage and its foundres are both mentioned in that passage; and as her name, Elisa (D) or Elissa, imports the same thing in Hebrew or Phænician as Virago in Latin, Bochart takes the word 'Origo' or Origo to be a corruption of 'Ouiaγων' or Virago; and consequentely supposes it to refer not to Carthage, but to Elisa or Dido. As Servilius afferts, though fallly, Dido in Punic to have answered to Virago in Latin, and it is very possible Eusebius might have been imposed upon by this mistake, we cannot help declaring ours-selves entirely of Bochart's opinion. It is likewise denominated by Stephanus Oenuia, or Oenuia; by Eustathius, Cadmea; and by Suidas, Aphrice. According to some, the name Tarshith in scripture sometimes denotes Carthage; in one passage particulary this word seems so plainly to point at that city, that it is rendered by the vulgate version Carthago. Theodoret and others countenance this notion.

Every thing thus conspiring with Elisa's views, and succeeding according to her desire, by the coalition of difference nations, the new city, in a short time, grew wealthy and flourishing; which agreeable situation tempted Iarbas, a neighbouring prince, to endeavour at making himself master of it without any effusion of blood. In order to which he desired

(D) According to the author of the etymologicon magnum, Elisa or Elissa was the first name of this prince, which, as Bochart shews, may either be interpreted divina virgo, or, with the Arabic article prefixed, virago, νατινυς. Phavorinus, in conjunction with the author of the etymologicon aforesaid, will have the name Dido to have been given her after her arrival in Africa, as importing the traveller, or wanderer, to which Bochart agrees. Eustathius absurdly says, Dido signifies a murderer of an husband; whereas Elisa or Elissa will admit of such an interpretation: and Servius, with as much impropriety, translates Dido virago, the undoubted signification of Elisa or Elissa. Many more conjectures about these words may be seen in Bochart and Vossius, which it is not worth while to recite (3).

defired, that an embassy of ten of the most noble Carthaginians might be sent him; which having obtained, he proposed to them a marriage with Elisa or Dido, for that, in all probability, was the name she went by after her departure from her native country, threatening them with a war, in case of refusal. The embassadors, being afraid to deliver the message, told their sovereign with Punic subtlety, that Iarbas desired some person might be sent him, who was capable of civilizing and polishing himself and his Africans; but that there was no possibility of finding any of her subjects, who would leave his relations for the conversation of barbarians, who were as savage as the wildest beasts. Here being reprimanded by the queen, she asked them, if they were not ashamed to refuse living in any manner, which might be beneficial to their country, to which they owed their very lives? They then opened to her the king's commands, adding, that, according to her own decision of the point, and to let her subjects a good example, she ought to sacrifice herself to her country's welfare. Being thus ensnared, she called upon her husband Sichæus with tears and lamentations, and at last answered, that she would go where her own fate and that of her city called her. In the mean time, she caused a pile to be erected in the farthest part of the city; and at the expiration of three months, which time she required for the execution of her design, killing many victims, as tho' she intended to sacrifice to, and appease the manes of, her husband before her second marriage, she ascended it. Then looking all around her upon the spectators, she told them, she was going to her husband, as they had ordered her: and immediately, with a dagger she had taken with her for that purpose, put a period to her days.

This is Justin's account of the death of that princess, which, we need not tell our readers, is different from Virgil's. Cedrenus and Sir Isaac Newton favour Virgil's notion, though they do not in all points agree with him. The former of these relates, that Aeneas the Phrygian, after the destruction of Troy, came to Africa, and resided sometime with Dido there; but perceiving Iarbas, king of the Numidians, the Mauritanians, the Mafllyli or the Gætulians, to take umbrage at this, he thought proper to retire, as dreading the effects of his power and resentment. This k Justin, ubi sup.

This passage of Cedrenus, whom we take to have been a very good compiler and collector of antient history, seems greatly to support Sir Isaac Newton's opinion, in relation to Æneas and Dido's being cotemporaries, and likewise to evince a most material point, viz. that Virgil and Troglus, whom Jufian epitomized, agree in their chronology. What Sir Isaac Newton advances concerning Dido's father Mettillus and Teucer's reigning upon Cyprus, about the time of the Trojan war, renders Virgil's chronology likewise more probable, than the generality of learned men are willing to allow. But this we shall just touch upon immediately ¹.

How long Dido reigned at Carthage, or when she came to the violent death above-mentioned, we cannot take upon us to determine. What seems to be the best supported by antient history is, that her brother Barca and sister Anna attended her from Tyre to Africa; and that, by their commiting every thing to her management and direction, it should seem she was a woman of an uncommon genius. This likewise appears from the artful manner in which she imposed upon her brother Pygmalion before her departure from Tyre, when under the pretence of diverting her melancholy on account of her husband's death, which she insinuated, Carthage could not fail of perpetuating, she had the address to persuade him, that her intention really was to retire to, and reside at, Chartaca. The secrecy and prudence with which her grand enterprize was conducted, as well as the cunning device by which she fixed even Pygmalion's men in her interest, above-recited, indisputably evince the same thing; that she was a lady of most attractive charms, as well as a rare pattern of chastity, is attested by the best authors ².

Macrobius tells us, that Virgil's relation of Dido's amours with Æneas, and of her laying violent hands on herself at his departure from Africa, after he had debauched her, was universally esteemed as fabulous in his age. This indeed we disbelieve, but not upon Macrobius's authority; for that author is inconsistent with himself in respect to Dido's character. In one place he celebrates her temperance and chastity, which is exactly agreeable to the faith of history; whereas in another he makes her guilty of the greatest incontinence.

Chapter 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

Perance, luxury, and profusion at her entertainments; which, in our opinion, deserves no credit at all, as being not only contrary to the general character of our princes, but likewise to the Carthaginian genius, as has been above observed. Virgil, as a Roman, we believe, in this particular did not pay the greatest regard to truth, the antipathy betwixt his nation and the Carthaginians not permitting it; but notwithstanding this, we cannot help imagining his chronology to be something nearer the truth than is generally supposed, and that for the reasons hinted above, as well as for the following one, which to us seems something cogent, and which therefore we beg leave to transcribe from the excellent Sir Isaac Newton. "The Phoenicians, after the death of Melcartus, says this incomparable author, built a temple to him in the island Gades, and adorned it with the sculptures of the labours of Hercules, and of his hydra, and the horses, to whom he threw Diomedes, king of the Bistones in Thrace, to be devoured. In this temple was the golden belt of Teucer, and the golden olive of Pygmalion, bearing smaragdine fruit; and by these consecrated gifts of Teucer and Pygmalion you may know, that it was built in their days." If these facts, and the reasoning built upon them, be admitted, it will follow, that Teucer and Pygmalion were cotemporaries, and consequently that Aeneas and Dido might be so. Now, though we cannot pretend to assert, that this argument is demonstrative, because there is no absolute necessity to suppose, that all these ornaments were brought into the temple at once, yet, considering what we have before offered from Sir Isaac Newton, Apollodorus, Servius, and the marbles, in proof of Teucer and Mettinus's being jointly concerned in the conquest of Cyprus, we cannot look upon it as void of a tolerable degree of probability.

How long monarchical government prevailed at Carthage, or what accidents befell this state in its infancy, or even what transactions it was concerned in for several ages at first, we cannot inform our readers, since there is a chain in the Carthaginian history for above three hundred years after the tragical end of Dido. In general Juvtin, and he alone, gives us to understand, that Carthage was much agitated by civil civil diffusions, and harassed with the plague during part of this period. It likewise appears from Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, that this republic had got a strong footing in Sicily and Sardinia, and made considerable acquisitions elsewhere, before the date of any of those transactions it bore a part in, the knowledge of which has reached us. Thucydides and Herodotus moreover put it beyond dispute, that it was very formidable by sea even in the time of Cyrus and Cambyses, and that it must have performed many brave exploits upon that element even before the reigns of those puissant monarchs. But this is not to be wondered at, it not being possible for any nation endowed with such a genius, and possessed of so much power as the Carthaginians must have been famous for in very early ages, to have long remained in a state of inaction, either by land or sea. A flourishing state of commerce naturally begets riches, and riches power; and, considering that ambition is a darling passion in the minds of great men, and almost inseparable from power, and that war, for the most part, is the effect of ambition, it cannot well be doubted, but that our republic made many expeditions against, and incursions into, the territories of its neighbours, long before the beginning of, what may be termed with respect to us, the Carthaginian historical period of time. Had the writings of Philistus Syracusanus, Ephorus, Timaeus Siculus, Aratus, Trogus Pompeius, the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth books of Diodorus Siculus, or any of the Punic historians, been now extant, we might have received sufficient light from them in many material points relating to the first ages of Carthage; but all these have, for a long series of generations, been no more. The Punic archives would also most certainly have set us right in all particulars of moment relating to the history we are now upon, had they been in being; but thefe the Roman virtue, generosity, greatness of soul, and love of truth, thought proper to deny poverty, left they should have given their minds a wrong bias, and been prejudicial to the cause of truth. We are therefore obliged, tho' with great regret, to pass over the transactions of the Carthaginian state during the chasm aforesaid, as buried in oblivion, and proceed to continue this work in the best manner we can from those pieces and fragments of antiquity that, through the injuries of time, have been handed down to us.

We have just hinted, that the Carthaginians were very powerful by sea in the time of Cyrus and his son Cambyses, not not to say much easier. This appears from several considerations, particularly from a naval engagement that happened between the united fleets of the Carthaginians and Etruscans and that of the Phocæans, one of the most formidable nations in the world by sea in Cyrus's reign, wherein the Phocæans got the victory, yet their whole fleet was de-eated in a sea-either sunk or disabled; insomuch, that they durst not venture a second engagement, but abandoned the island of Cynus, now Corsica, to the Carthaginians and Etruscans. The Phocæans retired to Rhegium, and soon after to OEnotria, now Ponza, a small island in the Tyrrenian or Etruscan sea, over-against Velia in Lucania, which their ancestors had first peopled; and the Carthaginians, with the Etruscans, took quiet possession of Cyurus. Herodotus and Thucydides both take notice of this sea-fight, as one of the most antient to be met with in history. The Carthaginian and Etruscan united fleets consisted of an hundred and twenty sail, the most active part of which, we may suppose, was the Carthaginian, since the Etruscans at that time did not make so great a figure by sea; and the Phocæan of sixty. Herodotus seems to sneer the Phocæans upon their victory, as being in a manner ruined by it. According to Thucydides, the Phocæans built Maffilia, now Marseilles, some time near this period.

Towards the conclusion of Cyrus's reign, or that of his uncle Cyaxares the second, as we have stated it, the Carthaginians carried on a war with the neighbouring African princes, wherein they obtained great advantages, which, according to Justin, were chiefly owing to the conduct and bravery of their general Macheus (E). Soon after the conclusion of this war, they sent a great body of forces, with a powerfull fleet, to Sicily, under the command of the fame general, who reduced a good part of that island to their obedience.
But notwithstanding the happy situation of their affairs abroad

* Herodot. l. i. Thucyd. i. sub init.

(E) This general's name, in some manuscripts of Justin, is Maleurs, in others Macheus or Macheus. Orosius calls him Mazeus; and Grævius, Maleus. Voelius likewise seems to prefer the last to the others; but offers no solid argument for this preference.
We beg leave therefore to follow Reineccius, Ubbio Emmius, and Hendreich, who chuse Macheus, notwithstanding many of our late editions of Justin have Maleus.
They reduce a good part of the island of Sicily.

In consequence of which, according to Justin's observation, their arms were attended afterwards with ill success, though they had before been so fortunate in Sicily, (which, by the way, proves their settlement in that island to have been coeval with, if not prior to, the beginning of the Persian empire) for, immediately after the conclusion of the Sicilian war, transporting their forces into the island of Sardinia, they intended nothing less than making an absolute conquest of it; but the displeasure of the gods now pursuing them, they received a notable defeat here from the Sardi, in which above half of their army was cut off. Enraged at so many disasters, instead of endeavouring to discover the true cause of them, they banished their general Machæus, with the remainder of the army under his command. That commander, covered with glory and victory before the last unhappy expedition to Sardinia, could not but highly resent such ungrateful, as well as inhuman, treatment, especially as by his conduct and bravery, he had reduced a great part of the island of Sicily to the obedience of the Carthaginians, and greatly extended their frontiers in Africa. First therefore he sends to Carthage in an amicable manner, begging the senate not to impute to him and the troops the misfortunes that had befallen them, but to permit them to return home quietly; adding withal, that, in case of refusal, they would do themselves justice by force of arms. But neither this friendly remonstrance, nor the menace annexed to it, making any impression on the senate, after waiting in vain some days for an answer, they went on board their ships, and advanced with great expedition towards the city. As soon as they had invected it, they appealed to the gods above for the purity of their intentions, and declared in the presence of gods and men, that their design was not to hurt their fellow-citizens, zens, but only to demonstrate to them what wrong sentiments they had entertained of their valour, when they attributed the loss above-mentioned to a want of bravery in the troops; whereas it ought to be ascribed to the caprice of fortune. This not availing, after they had cut off all communication betwixt the city and the continent, they besieged it in form, and soon reduced it to the last extremity for want of provisions. The Carthaginians, involved in these deplorable circumstances, began now to reflect upon their past folly and ingratitude; but how to extricate themselves out of their present difficulties, was the grand question. In the mean time, Cartalo, the general's son, arrived in the city from Tyre, and, had matters taken a right turn, might have had a conference with his father, and possibly have disposed him to an accommodation. This Cartalo had been sent by his countrymen to Tyre, with the tenths of an immense quantity of plunder taken by his father in Sicily, intended as a donation or offering to the Tyrian Hercules; and passing by the camp in his return home, was ordered by his father to come to him immediately; but this command, for the present, he refused complying with, under pretence, that he must perform the public offices of religion, before he could give an instance of filial duty. Machæus was far from being pleased with this answer; however, for the present he took care to conceal his resentment, as not daring to do anything that might look like the least violence offered to religion. Soon after this incident, having obtained leave for that purpose, he came out of the city to the camp, dressed in his pontifical robes; for he was, as it should seem, the priest of Hercules. His father, far from being struck with such a pompous appearance, taking him in private, addressed himself to him in the following terms: "Haft thou the assurance, most abandoned wretch, to appear in this rich and splendid habit before so many miserable citizens, and a camp overwhelmed with woe? What mean these ensigns of peace and felicity at this juncture, but to insult all of us? Was there no other place for thee to display thy pride and haughtiness in, but this spot of ground, which is the scene of thy father's misery and disgrace? How came you so lately to despise, with such an insolent air, the command, I will not lay of your father, but of your general? And what are these gorgeous robes but the fruit of my victories? Since therefore you have considered me not as a father, but an exile, I, in return, will behave to you not as a father, but a general."
And crucifies his son Cartalo. The city surrenders.

"general." And he was as good as his word; for immediately ordering a high crofs to be erected, he had him crucified thereon in his sacred vestments, in the sight of all the citizens. Some days after, the city surrendered; when convening the senate and people, he complained of the injury and indignity offered him, and excused the hostile manner in which he had behaved towards them, as not being the effect of choice, but necessity. He, for the present, made no alterations in the established form of government; but contented himself with putting to death ten of the senators, by whose advice the late violent resolutions against him and the army had been taken ° (F).

(F) In this note we shall endeavour to give some account of crucifixion, which was a capital punishment used among the Syrians, Egyptians, Persians, Jews, Africans, Greeks, and Romans. According to Pagius, it was not at first in use among the Jews; and indeed this appears from the law of Moses itself. The learned Cafaubon concurs with him herein, though Baronius and Lipsius maintain the contrary opinion. Signonius confounds this with hanging or suspension, as does father Calmet in many instances, particularly those of the worshipers of Baal-peor, and the king of Ai, who were hung up alive. The Talmudists refer it to stoning or lapidation. There were three different sorts of crosses erected for the execution of malefactors. The first was the crux decussata, in the form of the letter X, as St. Andrew's cross is pictured. The second the crux commissa, like the letter T. The third the crux immissa, when one piece of wood was transfixedly fastened to another in such a manner, as to cut it at right angles at some distance from the top, so †. Such, according to antient medals, and the tradition of the christian church in all ages, was our blessed Saviour's cross. Crucifixion was the punishment appointed for slaves and the &cum of the people, when guilty of the most enormous crimes; and was therefore called fervile supplicium; the freemen, or persons of distinction, in such cases, falling by the ax or sword. The criminals, before execution, were taken either from home or the praetorium amongst the Romans, and scourged in a most cruel manner. Sometimes they were tied to the cross, as we find our blessed Saviour was, and always obliged to carry it, or part of it. When they arrived at the place of execution, they were stripped naked, and nailed to the cross, either lying on the ground, or erect. Their hands and feet were first tied to it with cords, and afterwards nailed with three or four nails, as the executioner pleased, beginning with the right hand or

All things in Carthage being thus set upon the antient foot, the republic enjoyed some repose. But this was not of or foot, and proceeding from thence to the left. Upon the piece of wood rising above the arms of the cross, an inscription was posted, specifying the crime for which the malefactors suffered, though sometimes, instead of this the crier proclaimed it to the spectators attending the execution. In Judaea, the thighs of the malefactors were broken, in case they were not dead by suffocation; because the Jews, by their law, were obliged to take them from the cross at that time, which the Romans, their governors, permitted them to do. By the Roman laws, the bodies remained on the cross, till they were entirely consumed, as our notorious offenders do now upon gibbets; nevertheless the judge, or supreme magistrate, had the power of giving the bodies to friends or relations, in order to be interred. On the emperor’s birth-day, or such like festivals, they were frequently taken down from the cross, and buried without the intercession of friends. The Jews constantly buried the bodies of crucified malefactors, in conformity to their law, though the pagans left them exposed on the cross as aforesaid. According to some authors, the patibulum, or gallows, and the antient cross, were the same, though Isidorus makes them different. He calls the transverse piece of wood patibulum, and the erect one stipes and crux. Afterwards patibulum and furca, the gallows, were the same, and the punishment on them was looked upon as much milder and less ignominious, than that on the cross; for on the gallows the criminals soon expired, whereas on the cross they continued a long time in torture. Sometimes offenders suffered death on the cross with their heads downwards, as St. Peter; and sometimes with their thighs as well as arms expanded, in like manner as St. Andrew is supposed to have been crucified. The crosses were made of the hardest wood, frequently of oak, as some believe our Saviour's was. The places of execution were either near the public roads and highways, or on the top of some mountain or eminence, that the bodies might be seen by all people, and thereby a terror struck into them. If the crux and patibulum were originally the same, crucifixion prevailed at Rome in the time of the kings. The persons condemned to be crucified, or deserving it, were called by the Romans cruciarii. To be crucified was a mark of great infamy to soldiers, officers, and men of quality. This punishment was so common amongst the Romans in the times of the republic, and afterwards, that pains, afflictions, troubles, and unpromising affairs, were called crosses, and the verb cruciari frequently denoted the infliction of all sorts of chastisements, and pains of body and mind.

Friends
Friends and relations generally attended the execution, in order to beg the bodies of the supreme magistrate or commanding officer, at least in Judæa. When this did not happen, parties of soldiers were posted near them, to prevent their being carried off. Constantine abolished crucifixion, thinking enormous villains, and persons guilty of the most flagrant crimes, unworthy of suffering death in the same manner our blessed Saviour did, and introduced hanging in its stead. The Jews did not permit the relations of the persons executed to place their kinsmen in the tombs belonging to their families, till their flesh had been first consumed in the public sepulchres; then they were allowed to remove their bones into private sepulchres. It was perhaps for this reason that Joseph of Arimathæa desired leave from Pilate to lodge the body of Jesus in his own tomb, that he might not be thrown into the public burying place appointed for criminals (6).

The Carthaginians, contrary to the practice of other nations, crucified their nobility, suffetes, and even the generals of their armies themselves, however absolute they might be in the field, if their enterprises were not attended with success. The croffes of malefactors amongst them seem to have been higher or lower, in proportion to the quality of the person suffering, and the heinousness of the crime for which they suffered. If any notorious offender of distinction escaped justice in his life-time, his body after death, was exposed on a crofs, in order to deter others from committing the same crime, especially when it merited the most severe and ignominious punishment. Of this Hanno, in Just. not to mention others, is a pregnant instance (7). We must not omit observing, that the Greek word καρφων, which signifies a cross, is put often for a piece of wood only fixed in the ground, by the Latins called palus or vallum. Our readers will find a fuller account of this punishment in the authors referred to in this note.

situation, and introduce arbitrary power. But his pernicious views being happily discovered, his scheme was defeated, and he received the punishment due to so great a crime; upon which event Juvenal makes this reflection: 'He was justly rewarded for the cruelty he had been guilty of both to his son and his country.'

We are told by Herodotus, that Cambyces, in the sixth year of his reign, resolved upon an expedition against the Carthaginians; but that he was forced to drop his project, by reason the Phoenicians, without whose help he could not carry on that war, refused to assist him therein, because the Carthaginians were their descendants. This is a plain proof, Cambyces that the whole naval power of the Persian empire at that time, without the assistance of the Tyrians, was not able to cope with the Carthaginians.

In the year after the refuge, the Carthaginians sent embassadors to Rome, and concluded a treaty with the Romans. The Phoenicians refuse to assist them; and, in the meantime, while they were the first nation the Romans were acquainted with, out of Italy, and with whom they entered into an alliance. This treaty chiefly related to navigation and commerce, and was to be seen, in Polybius's time, on the base of a column, in the ancient Roman language, which, as that writer tells us, was so different from what was spoken in his time, that those who were most conversant in the Latin tongue, could not, without much study and labour, understand it. As in our eleventh volume we have inserted this treaty as transmitted to us by the Greek historian, it will be entirely unnecessary to repeat it here. However, we shall beg leave to make four or five short observations upon it.

First, This treaty was signed twenty-eight years before some obser-

Xerxes invaded Greece, and gives us to understand, that the whole island of Sardinia, and part of that of Sicily, were then subject to the Carthaginians.

Secondly, It appears, that the Carthaginians were very well acquainted with the coasts of Italy, had visited several of the petty nations seated there, and even made some attempts upon them, before this period.

Thirdly, It is evident, that this nation was tolerably versed in the art of fortification, and made it a common practice to build forts or castles upon their making a descent.

9 Juft. ubi. supra. 9 Herodot. 1. iii. 1 Polyb. l. iii. p. 245, 246, 247. edit. Gronov.
The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

Scent in any country; since they are prohibited by one article of this treaty to erect any forts whatsoever in the country of Latium, even in case they at any time invaded it in an hostile manner.

Fourthly, This treaty makes it manifest, that the Carthaginians were particularly careful to exclude the Romans from all the territories subject to them, as well as from the knowledge of what was transacted in them; as though, even at that time, they took umbrage at the growing power of the Romans. They seemed, even in these early times, to harbour in their bosoms the secret seeds of the jealousy and diffidence, which were one day to burst out in long and cruel wars, and which nothing could extinguish but the ruin of one of these two most potent republics.

Fifthly, The Carthaginians, according to Polybius, would not allow the Romans to sail beyond the promontory called the Fair promontory, lying to the north of Carthage, lest they should discover the fruitfulness of the land, and the happy situation of the cities, and consequently should be tempted to make a settlement there. This, it must be owned, was a wise precaution, and shewed, that the Carthaginians were not only a people of foresight, but likewise acquainted with the enterprising genius of the Romans, long before they came to blows with them.

The republic being delivered from the imminent danger that threatened it in the manner above related, chose Mago to succeed Machæus in all the high posts he filled. If we may judge of Mago's capacity from the good effects of his administration, he was a person of most consummate merit and abilities. Justin tells us, that he was the first who introduced military discipline amongst the Carthaginian soldiery; that in his time the dominions of Carthage were much enlarged, its commerce rendered more extensive, its riches encreased, its military glory raised to a high pitch, virtue alone countenanced both in the army and state; in short, that he left his country in a most flourishing condition. His two sons, Afdrubal and Hamilcar, succeeded him in all his high employments 1.

Asdrubal

1 Justin I. xix. sub. init.
Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

Asdrubal and Hamilcar being adorned with the same virtues that rendered their father so conspicuous, the people of Carthage thought they could not do better than confer upon them the command of the army that was to act against Sardinia; which island, it seems, had then revolted from them. Accordingly they landed their forces here, and for some time carried on a war against the Sardi; but with what success, is not said: only we are told, that towards the close of it Asdrubal was mortally wounded, by which melancholy accident the entire command of the forces devolved upon his brother. The Carthaginians made great lamentation for this general, as indeed they had good reason; for he had been eleven times one of the suffetes, and discharged the duties of that high function with great applause, and in his military capacity had triumphed no less than four times; nay, the enemy themselves looked upon his death as a blow given the Carthaginians equivalent to the cutting off of their whole army.

Somewhere near this period, the Carthaginians had a mind to shake off the African yoke, that is, to discontinue the tribute, which, by their original contract with that people, they were obliged to pay; in order to which they declared war against them. The Africans having justice on their side, success attended their arms; and notwithstanding the power of their enemies, a peace was concluded to their advantage, the principle article of the treaty being, that the tribute at first imposed upon them, for the ground on which their city stood, should be continued.

About this time, Darius Hyphasis, king of Persia, sent an embassy to Carthage, requiring the people of that city to abstain from human sacrifices, and eating dogs flesh; to burn their dead, and not bury them, as had always been the practice in their territories; and lastly, to furnish him with a body of auxiliary forces to serve in the war he was going to declare against Greece, for which he was then making vast preparations. Every thing was complied with, at least in appearance, for some time, till all apprehensions of feeling his resentment were vanished, except the last article, which the Carthaginians desired to be excused from paying regard to, because all their troops were then otherwise employed. Justin infinuates, that this monarch laid his commands upon the Carthaginians on this occasion; but this we can scarce believe, since it does not appear from history, that Carthage was

1 Idem ibid. 2 Idem ibid.

was ever subject, or even tributary, to the Persians; besides, this author, from whom the particulars here mentioned are drawn, affirms Darius to have sent embassadors to Carthage; which is a plain intimation, that the people of that city were not his subjects. That the Carthaginians, and consequently the Phœnicians, buried their dead antiently, may be collected from hence; but this is so clear from scripture, that it stands in no need of any other testimony to support it. Justin likewise here observes, that the Carthaginians at this juncture were much embroiled with their neighbours; which seems to suggest, that either the war with the Sardi and Africans above-mentioned, or some other, was then carried on. It is no wonder Darius should apply to the people of Carthage for assurance against the Greeks, since both the Persians and Carthaginians looked upon that nation as their common enemy.

Some few years afterwards, the Greeks of Sicily, being extremely harassed by the Carthaginians, solicited Leonidas to send some Lacedæmonian forces to their relief*. From Herodotus it appears, that they could not obtain their request; but that, however, Gelon, the tyrant of Syracuse, was so happy as to preserve his own dominions, and even to enlarge them. From the prodigious forces with which the Carthaginians invaded Sicily almost immediately after, it is probable they did not sustain any very considerable losses in that war. It cannot be inferred from Herodotus, as we formerly imagined, that the Carthaginians were driven out of Sicily by Gelon at this time; but only that the tyrant gained some advantages over them, extended his frontiers, and supported himself without the assistance of the Greeks, as the passage referred to implies. It is rather probable from thence, that both parties in the main kept what they were in possession of before the beginning of the war, though the Carthaginians might lose some particular districts, especially since, according to Justin, there was no considerable, much less decisive, action in it. The excellent character Herodotus has given us of Hamilcar, and the high encomium he has passed upon that general's conduct, seem likewise to determine in favour of our present opinion*

Notwithstanding the Carthaginians, by reason of the various wars they were then engaged in, could not supply Darius with any succours against the Greeks, as has been just observed; observed; yet it appears extremely probable from history, that an offensive and defensive league was made betwixt these two powers towards the close of that prince’s reign. At least it is most certain, that an alliance was formed between Darius’s successor Xerxes and the state of Carthage, not many years after the Persian embassy above-mentioned was sent to that city. By the treaty concluded with Xerxes, the Carthaginians were to invade Sicily with all their forces, and endeavour to drive the Greeks from thence, as well as the continent of Italy, whilst that prince should march in person with the whole strength of the Persian empire against Greece itself. But of this more hereafter.

Before we enter directly upon the transactions of the Carthaginians in Sicily, we shall beg leave to give a short account of the first footing this nation got in Spain. We are nowhere told in history precisely when this happened; nevertheless there is good reason to believe, from Diodorus Siculus and Justin, that it was very early, and before the times we are now speaking of. The former of these authors affirms, that the great nerve of the Carthaginian power were the mines of Spain; that by them they were enabled to equip such powerful fleets, and bring such formidable armies into the field; nay, that by their assistance they made such great conquests in Sicily and Africa. Hence it is apparent, that the first Carthaginian settlement in Spain must have long preceded, not only the reigns of Xerxes and Darius, but even that of Cyrus himself. But this is still rendered more evident by Justin, who intimates, that this happened when the city of Gades, now Cadiz, was but of late standing, or even in its infancy. The neighbouring Spaniards, finding this new city beginning to flourish, attacked it with all their forces; insomuch that the inhabitants were obliged to call in the Carthaginians to their aid. Both of them being originally colonies from Tyre, the Carthaginians readily granted their request; and furnishing them with powerful succours, not only repulsed the Spaniards, but likewise made themselves masters of almost the whole province in which the new city stood.

This happy beginning made that ambitious nation entertain thoughts of subduing the whole country, to which they were also strongly excited by the rich mines above-mentioned.

B 4 Diodor. Sic. I. xi. c. i, 2.
The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

'Tis probable they could not push their conquests far at first, because they had there to do with very warlike nations, who defended themselves with great courage and resolution. It appears from the accounts of Livy and Polybius, that the greatest part of Spain remained unsubdued till the wars of Hamilcar, Asdrubal, and Hannibal. Nay, 'tis very probable the Carthaginians could never have entirely reduced so many provinces there, as Strabo observes, had all the Spaniards formed but one state, or mutually assisted one another. But as every canton, every people, were entirely detached from their neighbours, and had not the least correspondence with them, they all by degrees fell a prey to the common enemy.

We are told by Diodorus Siculus, as has been taken notice of in the chronological table, that the Carthaginians planted a colony in the island Ebusus or Eresus, now Yvica, on the coast of Spain, an hundred and sixty years after the foundation of their city. The city Eresus, the capital of the island, built by this colony, was surrounded by a good wall, and had a commodious harbour for ships. The houses in it were for the most part built in an elegant taste, and inhabited by a variety of barbarous nations, as Diodorus calls them; but the most numerous of these were the Phœcicians or Carthaginians. 'Tis highly probable therefore, that about this time the Balearic islands, at present known by the names of Majorca and Minorca, were likewise either planted or reduced by the same people. This can scarce be doubted, if we consider, that the name itself is Phœcician or Punic; that Ebusus is but seven hundred stadia, i. e. not an hundred miles, distant from the Balearic islands; that the Carthaginians possessed these islands from so remote an antiquity, that their first arrival here is prior to everything related of them by any historian now extant, except their peopling the island Ebusus; and that, according to Vitruvius, Ebusus was reckoned to belong to the Balearic islands, which 'tis very natural to suppose. Now as we learn from Justin, that the first expedition the Carthaginians made to Spain was in order to assist the new city of Gades (A) above-mentioned; and as the Carthaginian fleet

(A) It appears from the word Gadir or Gaddir, the true Phœcician or Punic name of Cadiz, that the city received its name from the island on which it was seated, and therefore that the Tyrians fleet sailing from Carthage to Gades easily might, nay, almost naturally would, take Ebusus and the other Balearic islands, in its way, there is pretty good reason to believe, that Gades was succoured, and Ebusus, with the other Balearic islands, planted or reduced much about the same time. The particular periods likewise, in which Justin and Diodorus have related these events to have happened, seem nearly to correspond; which in some measure confirms our opinion. Let this be admitted, and it will follow, that the Carthaginians made their first descent in Spain about an hundred and sixty years after the building of their city, which we apprehend to be one of the most early foreign transactions they were concerned in. Farther, since Carthage was so potent when Gades was in its infancy, we must suppose the former to have been at least eighty or an hundred years older than the latter; and if so, Dido might have founded her city not far from the time of the Trojan war, since, according to Velleius, Gades was built by the Tyrians about that number of years after the destruction of Troy. This is an additional argument in favour of what rians were in possession of it some time before they built the city. For Gadir properly signifies an inclosure, or spot of ground separated from all other tracts, as this island was by the sea. It likewise denotes a fence or mound, as this island was doubtless considered by the Phoenicians, after their long and fatiguing voyages, against the rage and fury of the sea. According to Strabo, the Tyrians first failed to this island a considerable time after Hercules was deified; and made several fruitless expeditions, at considerable distances of time, before they could settle upon it; which, in conjunction with what has been advanced by Philostratus, renders it highly probable, that the city was, at least, of as late a foundation as we have supposed. The author of the etymology indeed infinuates it to have been built by Archaleus, the son of Phoenix, which will carry it back to a very remote antiquity; but this favours so much of fable, that but little credit is to be given to it. We shall only at present farther observe, that Cadiz and Tartessus were frequently mistaken for one another. A particular description and history of this city may be expected from us, when we come to the history of Spain (1).

what Sir Isaac Newton has advanced as to the time of that destruction, and seems to carry with it an air of probability. As to Velleius's assertion, that Gades was more antient than Carthage, he is plainly refuted by Diodorus and Justin, and the reason of the thing; neither had he asserted this, had it not been in consequence of an hypothesis. The Romans in his time generally followed the technical chronology of Eratosthenes, supposing it to be true: Velleius finding therefore in some good author, that Gades was absolutely affirmed to be built by the Tyrians eighty or an hundred years after the Trojan war; and by the Punic records, that Carthage was betwixt two and three hundred years later than that war, according to the artificial chronology of Eratosthenes, which he took for granted was true; he thence concluded, that Gades was older than Carthage. But that Eratosthenean chronology is now by some very learned men believed to have placed the destruction of Troy near three hundred years too high; and if so, no great stress is to be laid upon it. Velleius's authority therefore, when he asserts the city of Gades to have been built about eighty or an hundred years after the Trojan war, depends upon some good author, as is plain from Justin compared with Virgil, Servius, Apollodorus, and the marbles; but when he makes it older than Carthage, upon the chronology of Eratosthenes, which cannot be entirely relied upon, particularly in the point before us, as appears from Justin, Diodorus, and others; in the first case therefore it is pretty widely different from what it is in the other. Justin clearly intimates, that the inhabitants of the island of Gades had a temple there sacred to Hercules, before the city was built; so that nothing can be inferred from that temple's being erected either about or immediately after the time of the Trojan war, in prejudice of what has been advanced; which yet we are far from positively insisting upon as matter of fact, but only propose it to our readers as a point deserving farther consideration. On this occasion it may not be improper to remind our readers, that, according to the common computation, Troy was taken the twenty-fourth day of the month Thargelion, or April, 1184 years before Christ; whereas Sir Isaac Newton places it 904 years only before the commencement of the christian era.

Another

Another motive to the Carthaginians to make themselves masters of Spain, was the great number of brave recruits found in that country. The Spaniards were valiant, easily disciplined, and capable of enduring all kinds of labour and fatigue. With such immense treasure therefore as they annually drew from thence, and such bodies of the best soldiers as were continually formed there for their service, 'tis no wonder the Carthaginians should make such prodigious efforts, as we learn from history they did, to enslave all their neighbours.

As Diodorus Siculus has given us a description of Sicily, Sardinia, the Balearic islands, Corsica, &c. in the same chapter, we think this authorizes us to speak a word or two here concerning the first Carthaginian settlement in the island last-mentioned. Sardinia, as has been intimated above, was in the hands of the Carthaginians, and had been so for some time, when the first treaty was concluded between them and the Romans. Corsica likewise, we have reason to imagine, was possessed by them either wholly, or in part, in very antient times. This island, called by the Greeks Cyarus, by the Romans and natives Corsica, had a beautiful large harbour, according to Diodorus, named Syracusium, together with two considerable cities, Calaris, or Aleria, built by the Phocæans, and Nicæa by the Etruscans. Notwithstanding the defeat of the Carthaginian and Etruscan fleets by the Phocæans, in the reign of Cyclus abovementioned, the victory cost the latter so dear, that they were obliged to abandon Cyarus to the former. And we are farther informed by Herodotus, that the Cynrians, i.e. the Corsicans, were one of those nations, out of which the Carthaginians formed that vast army, with which they invaded Sicily in the days of Gelon. These, to omit many others, that might easily be produced, are sufficient proofs, that the state of Carthage had a footing, at least, in Corsica in very remote times.

The small islands of Melita and Gaulos, now Malta and Gozo or Gozzo, being conveniently situated for trade, and having commodious ports, were indisputably in subject like the other Carthaginians. It appears from Diodorus, that these islands were at first peopled either by the Carthaginians, or their ancestors the Phœcicians.

When the Carthaginians first carried their arms into Sicily unknown.

We have above observed, that part of the isle of Sicily was subject to the state of Carthage before the beginning of the Persian empire; but when the Carthaginians first carried their arms thither, for want of sufficient light from history, we cannot take upon us to determine. M. Rollin affirms Xerxes to have been the first who prompted that people to attempt conquering the island at present under consideration, which is contrary to the faith of history; and immediately after, almost in the same breath, declares the period, in which the Carthaginians first landed there in an hostile manner, not to be exactly known. This is a plain inconsistency, but not the only one in his system of antient history. As we have already given so particular a description of Sicily, as well as those heroic achievements and great transactions, of which it was for so many ages the theatre, we shall have occasion to refer our readers frequently to some of the preceding parts of this work; though after all, in order to preserve and continue the thread of our history, we shall find repetitions in many places unavoidable.

However, in order to render these the more tolerable, whenever we are obliged to them, we shall endeavour to diversify the narration with several fresh incidents, not mentioned in any of our former volumes, as not so immediately relating to the histories of the countries we were then upon, drawn either from the historians quoted by us there, or others which at that time had escaped us.

After the conclusion of the treaty with Xerxes, the Carthaginians, in pursuance of their engagements, made vast preparations for a war with the Greeks of Sicily, both by sea and land. The Carthaginians at this time were the most powerful people of all the west; and while the Persians invaded Greece, they were to fall upon the Greek colonies, both in Sicily and Magna Graecia, as above, that thereby the Greeks, of all countries and denominations, might be diverted from helping one another. The preparations for this war were so prodigious, that it was three years before they were completed, notwithstanding Xerxes sent them vast sums of money from Persia for that purpose. With these they hired great numbers of mercenaries in Spain, Gaul, Liguria, Corfica, &c. and raised what forces

forces they could in Africa. All things at last being in readiness, they set sail from Carthage with an army of three hundred thousand men, composed of different nations, and a fleet of above two thousand ships of war, with three thousand transports, not doubting but to make an entire conquest of Sicily the first campaign 1.

The general who commanded in this expedition was Hamilcar, the son of Hanno, according to Herodotus, or of Mago, as Juffin will have it, a person of great authority both in the army and the city, who had behaved himself with uncommon conduct and bravery on many occasions in the service of his country. In his passage from Carthage to Sicily, his horses and chariots, with the vessels they were on board, perished in a storm, which the Carthaginians doubted, being extremely addicted to superstitition, looked upon as ominous. However the general himself, upon his arrival at Panormus, now Palermo, endeavoured to dissipate all gloomy apprehensions, by declaring, that since they were happily arrived in Sicily, he looked upon the war as concluded, and that all the pain the late storm gave him was a fear of the Sicilians escaping the danger that threatened them 2.

After he had landed his troops, he halted three days to refresh them, and repair the damage his fleet had sustained in the late storm; and then marching to Himera, a city in the neighbourhood of Panormus, immediately caused it to be invested. To give some idea of the capacity of this general, Diodorus tells us, that, upon his sitting down before Himera, he disposed his army in two camps, the one defined for the land forces, the other for the ships and marines. He took care to secure his long ships or galleys, by drawing them on shore, surrounding them with an entrenchment, and placing all his marines there for their defence. The land forces were encamped in front, opposite to the city, extending themselves from the lines of the other camp to the hills overlooking the town. The place being thus blocked up on the west side, he unladed the ships of burden of their provisions, and sent away what vessels he had left to Africa and Sardinia for a further supply. After this he advanced with the flower of his army to the very walls of the city, routed a party of the garrison

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

Gelon defeats the Carthaginian foragers.

Gelon finds an opportunity of surprising the Carthaginians.

Gelon in a sally they made upon him, and thereby struck a great terror into the besieged.

Theron, tyrant of the Agrigentines, at that time commanded in the place, who, though his garrison was very strong, being intimidated by the late disaster, as well as the numerous forces of the enemy, dispatched an express to Gelon at Syracuse, with all possible expedition, for immediate relief. Gelon having got his troops in readines to march at an hour's warning, upon advice of what had befallen the Himeraeans, advanced to their city without delay, with an army of fifty thousand foot and five thousand horse. He first encamped near the city, and afterwards fortified his camp in such a manner as to put it out of danger of being insulted by the enemy. By this means he infused new life and vigour into the garrison, and freed them from all apprehensions of the Carthaginian power. He sent his horse in quest of the enemy, who were dispersed in small parties all over the country, in order to forage. These, meeting with the Carthaginians straggling about the country, without any discipline or order, fell upon them, took above ten thousand prisoners, and brought them triumphantly into the town. By this action Gelon's glory was raised to a very high pitch, and the Himeraeans inspired with a contempt of the enemy.

To demonstrate to the Carthaginians the high contempt he had them in, he caused the gates Theron had before built to secure him from their approaches, to be pulled down, and built others, more essential to the defence of the place, in their room. In fine, Gelon being an able warrior, and excelling in stratagems, set his head to work to find out some method of destroying the Carthaginian forces without any danger to himself or his army, which in strength was so much inferior to the enemy. Fortune favoured the project he was upon by the following accident, which brought on a battle, and occasioned the death of Hamilcar, and the total overthrow of his army.

A courier was brought to Gelon, having been intercepted by a party of his horse, carrying letters from the inhabitants of Selinus, confederates of the Carthaginians, to Hamilcar; whereby he understood, that Hamilcar was to offer the next morning in the camp of the marines a solemn sacrifice to Neptune, and that he had appointed the Selinuntine cavalry to join

1. Diod. Sic. ubi sup.
2. Idem ibid.
join him the same day in the said camp. Gelon, taking advantage of this intelligence, drew out an equal number of his own horse, ordering them to advance to the enemy’s camp about the time agreed on, as if they were the Selinuntines. Upon receiving these orders, by favour of the night, they conveyed themselves privately to certain posts close by the Carthaginian camp, of which they took immediate possession; and the next morning, approaching the said camp, were admitted into it about sun-rising, without the least suspicion. Hamilcar was then busy in sacrificing, and the greater part of the soldiery attending him without arms, according to Diodorus. But Herodotus intimates, that this general stayed in the camp during the whole time of the engagement, which continued from morning till the dusk of the evening, without intermission. Diodorus adds, that the Syracusans, without the least opposition, making up to Hamilcar, killed him, purfuant to their general’s orders, cut in pieces most of his marines, and set fire to the ships. Herodotus, on the contrary, gives us to understand, that Hamilcar was employed the whole day in throwing heaps of victims upon a flaming pile; but that seeing his troops put to the rout, he himself rushed into the fire, and was entirely consumed. Upon the firing of the ships, Gelon, who had notice of the success by a signal given him from the top of a neighbouring hill, drew out his army, and attacked the other camp. The Carthaginians at first made a gallant resistance; but when news was brought them of their general’s death, and at the same time seeing all their fleet in a blaze, they had no longer courage to stand their ground, but betook themselves to a precipitate flight; and then the slaughter was dreadful. As Gelon’s orders were, that no quarter should be given during the heat of the engagement, no less than an hundred and fifty thousand men were slain in the battle and the pursuit. The rest retired to an eminence, where they for some time defended themselves; but at last, for want of water, were obliged to surrender at discretion. This was the greatest blow the Carthaginians had ever received before that time; for they did not only lose their general Hamilcar, who was himself by his mother’s side a Syracusan, but had their whole army in such a manner cut off, or taken prisoners, that not a single man of it escaped to Carthage, to carry thither the news of this unparalleled defeat a.

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

Polyænus, in his account of the Carthaginian general’s death, differs something both from Diodorus Siculus and Herodotus. According to this author, Gelon, finding himself not strong enough to attack the enemy, sent Pediarchus, the captain of his archers, who much resembled him, dressed in royal robes, out of the camp, with orders to offer sacrifice upon some altars near the spot of ground on which Hamilcar used daily to sacrifice. Pediarchus was attended by a party of his archers, cloathed in white garments, with large sprigs of myrtle in their hands, as an evident sign of their going to perform so solemn an act of devotion. Under the myrtle each of them had concealed his bow, with several arrows, which were to let fly at the general as soon as he came within some distance. Hamilcar, suspecting nothing of violence, came as usual, with his attendants, to address himself to the Gods, and was immediately slain. However this may be, the Carthaginians and Syracusians, both of them ambitious of claiming so great a man to themselves, gave out, that Hamilcar, upon the defeat of his troops, vanished, and was never afterwards seen. The former, notwithstanding his misfortune, and their immediate resentment of it, in after-ages paid him divine honours, both in their capital city, and every other place where their colonies seated themselves.

We must not here omit observing, that Terillus, the son of Cricinippus, invited the Carthaginians at this time into Sicily, and therefore was, in some respect, as well as Xerxes, the occasion of this fatal war. Terillus was tyrant of Himera; but being driven from thence by Theron, the son of Æneas in the Cuthus, tyrant of Agrigentum, he meditated revenge. To gratify which, at the instigation of Anaxilaus, the son of Critineus, tyrant of Rhegium, who married his daughter Cylippe, he had recourse to the Carthaginians being well assured they would not let slip so favourable an opportunity of enlarging their dominions in the island of Sicily. Hamilcar, in order to secure his fidelity, obliged him to send his sons to him for hostages. This account Herodotus tells us he received from the Sicilian writers of his time, who made no mention, as far as we can find, of the alliance between the Persians and the Carthaginians

Herodotus farther informs us, that the battle of Himera was fought the same day with that of Salamis: but Diodorus Siculus will have the Carthaginians to have been defeated the same day that Leonidas, with his brave body of Spartans, perished at Thermopylae. Upon which he makes this reflection: "The gods on purpose seemed to have designed the Greeks at the same time a glorious victory in one place, and a most honourable death in another."

The first thing after the battle Gelon did was, amply to reward all those who had signalized themselves in the action, especially the body of horse to whom the victory was chiefly owing. The greatest part of the spoils, which were of an immense value, he offered to the gods, adorning with them the temples of Syracuse and Himera; what remained, together with the captives, he distributed amongst his soldiers, in proportion to the degree of bravery and valour they had shewn. Many of the last, to whatever city’s share they fell, were employed in public works for the common good; and so many were taken, that all Africa seemed to have been transplanted into Sicily. Some of the citizens of Agrigentum, in particular, who had distinguished themselves above the rest, had five hundred a-piece. The fugitives, upon the defeat of their army, being in the utmost consternation, fled into the inland provinces of Sicily, especially the territory of Agrigantum, where being taken alive, that city was in a manner filled with prisoners. The greatest part of them were put in irons, and set apart for the public service. The work they were chiefly employed in at first was, cutting and hewing of stone; of which afterwards they built the largest of the temples at Agrigentum, and made those conduits or aqueducts to convey water from the city, which were so much admired by the ancients, and called Pheaces, from one Pheax, who was the overseer of the work. The Agrigentines likewise, by their labour, sunk a fish-pond at great expense, seven stadia in circumference and twenty cubits deep. (B).

Vol. XVII. C
By the late victory, which was complete both in itself and its consequences, Gelon acquired great glory, and was justly celebrated by foreigners as well as his own subjects, as one of the most renowned and experienced generals any age or nation ever produced. The stratagem by which the Carthaginian army was overthrown he himself contrived, and conducted throughout, being the life and soul of the army in the execution of it. Some authors have not scrupled to prefer him to Themistocles, and the advantage accruing to the Greek nation in general from this action to that gained by the battle of Platea. However this may be, it is certain we find no account in history of any engagement, wherein the like carnage was made, and such a number of prisoners taken. Neither did the Carthaginian fleet, consisting of that vast number of ships of war and transports above-mentioned, meet with a much better fate than their land-forces had done. Only twenty long ships or galleys, which Hamilcar had occasionally drawn out for necessary services, happened to be out at sea, when the camp of the marines was taken, and consequently escaped the general conflagration. These failed directly for Carthage; but meeting with contrary winds and tempests, before they reached that place, they were all cast away, a few men only being saved in a small boat. These arriving at Carthage brought the dismal news of the entire defeat of their army, and the loss of their fleet. The Carthaginians, little expecting to hear of such a signal disaster, but on the contrary pleasing themselves with the imagination of reducing the whole island of Sicily almost without striking a stroke, were most strangely shocked at receiving this melancholy advice. As in all great reverses of fortune the nation we are discouraging of ever lost their courage, and abandoned themselves to despair, so in the present case they gave every thing up for lost. Nothing but outcries and lamentations were to be heard throughout the whole city; the enemy was already imagined to be at their gates, and all orders and for food and pleasure. Great numbers of swans likewise rested upon it, which afforded a most pleasant prospect to the eye. By the negligence of succeeding ages, it was gradually filled up with mud, and at last became wholly dry ground. The soil was so rich in Diodorus's time, that the Agrigentines planted vines and all kinds of trees there, which brought them in a very considerable revenue (1).

(1) Diod. Sic. in loc. citat.
and degrees of people amongst them were overwhelmed with inexpressible grief, despondency, and consternation.

In this deplorable situation, the Carthaginians thought they could have recourse to nothing but Gelon’s clemency; and therefore immediately dispatched embassadors to him for a Sicily, enjoining them to strike up a peace with him upon any terms.

Upon the arrival of these embassadors at Syracuse, Gelon afforded them an instance of great moderation and humanity. Notwithstanding by the late victory he was become the arbiter of peace and war, and had the Carthaginians entirely at his mercy, he received these ministers in a most affable and courteous manner. His prosperity had not in the least elated him, nor rendered him at all haughty or untractable. On the other hand, tho’ this deputation consisted of persons the most famed of any in Carthage for their merit and abilities, yet they behaved in a most mean and abrupt manner. They threw themselves at Gelon’s feet, with tears begged him to receive their city into favour, and grant them a peace upon what conditions he should think proper to prescribe. This plainly shews how void the Carthaginians then were of that true resolution and magnanimity, which supported the old Romans in all adversity, and carried them through all dangers; that resolution and magnanimity, which enabled them to lay the foundations of an almost universal empire, and even to destroy the dangerous rival of theirs we are now writing the history of; though it must be owned this heroic virtue and greatness of soul was much tarnished in their posterity, to say no worse, by some actions they were guilty of towards the decline of the Carthaginian state.

Gelon, like a good-natured prince, being touched with compassion for the miseries of the Carthaginians, granted them a peace upon the following easy conditions: First, that they should pay two thousand talents of silver towards defraying the expences of the war. Secondly, that they should build two temples, where this treaty of peace should be deposited, and at all times be exposed to public view. Thirdly, that for the future they should abstain from offering human sacrifices. This last article shews the great humanity of Gelon’s temper, and is a proof, that the people of Carthage were obliged a second time to abolish that barbarous practice for a certain period, at least in appearance; for it cannot be doubted, but they ratified this treaty, it being so advantageous to them, at a juncture when they were upon the very brink of destruction.

The Carthaginians, having recovered their spirits, by the happy turn their affairs had taken, through the conqueror’s great clemency and moderation, thought proper now to shew their gratitude to Damaretia, Gelon’s wife, who had forwarded an accommodation betwixt the two powers, and been chiefly instrumental in bringing it to an happy conclusion. They therefore, immediately after the peace, sent her a crown of gold, valued at an hundred talents of that metal. This crown Gelon turned into money, and coined pieces, called from his wife’s name Damaretia, each of them being worth ten Attic drachmas. The Sicilians gave them the name of Pentecontalitra, from their being fifty pounds in weight * (C).

We must not omit one circumstance, which may serve as a further instance of Gelon’s military capacity. Upon his first approach to Himera, to succour the besieged, a detachment of his forces defeated many of the Carthaginian parties sent to forage in different parts of the island. Besides what they killed, they took ten thousand prisoners, as above related. These probably were the worst troops in the

(C) These pieces seem to have been rather medals struck on occasion of Gelon’s victory over the Carthaginians, than common coins. The size of them supplies us with an argument in favour of this notion. The brae’s litra of Sicily was at first a pound weight, as the libra or As was amongst the Romans; and sixty such litrae made a talent. According to Pollux, Damaretia and the other Syracusan ladies of distinction brought all their silver utensils to the mint, and the coin formed from thence was called ψυ-χίσμα Δαμαρέτου. But Diodorus’s relation is more probable; since, if Gelon had been in great want of money, he would undoubtedly have stamped it in the smallest species, and not in pieces of such a magnitude, which seemed to allude to the great victory obtained over the Carthaginians, as well as the immense booty found in their camp (2).

the Carthaginian army; and therefore a stratagem Frontinus relates Gelon to have been the author of seems to bid fair for this particular period of time. This prince, having a large number of prisoners, picked out the weakest of them, who were auxiliaries, mostly tawny, and of a very despicable appearance; and exposed them quite naked before his soldiers, that they might have the most contemptible notion of the enemy. Something like this happened, if we mistake not, in the late war between the Turks and the Russians, when the former, to give their people at Constantinople the meaner opinion of the latter, led the most miserable of the captives they had taken from that nation in triumph through their capital.

Besides the public works above-mentioned, the Carthaginian spoils enabled Gelon to build two noble temples, the one to Ceres, and the other to Proserpina. A tripod of gold likewise, of sixteen talents, he caused to be made out of them, and sent it as a donation to the temple of Apollo at Delphi, as an acknowledgment of his gratitude to that deity. If an inscription given us by the scholiast on Pindar may be depended upon as genuine, there were more tripods than one sent thither on this occasion in the name of Gelon and his brothers, who had all of them a great share in the successes they gave thanks for (D).

(D) We are further assured by Paufanias, that Gelon sent several valuable presents to the temple of Jupiter Olympus at Olympia, as a grateful return to that pagan divinity for the good success that attended his arms, with which he was furnished from the booty found in the Carthaginian camp. Among the rest there were three curious vestments of fine Carthaginian linen, each of them representing a coat of mail, which undoubtedly were looked upon as something particularly rare, since Xenophon intimates the Carthaginian flax to have been of a very fine nature. A statue of Jupiter also, of a prodigious size, was sent to the same place in the name of Gelon and the Syracusans, when they were full of the most grateful sentiments for the signal victory obtained over the Carthaginians both by sea and land. The cell or apartment, in which these donations were deposited, was of exquisite workmanship, being made by those celebrated artificers Pothæus, Antiphilus, and Megacles, at Gelon's order. Besides the golden tripod above-mentioned, Gelon sent a golden statue of Victory to Delphi,
The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

The Carthaginians, incensed at Hamilcar, as imputing the late disaster entirely to his conduct, notwithstanding the great services he had done the state on other occasions, resolved, that his family should feel the effects of their resentment; and therefore banished his son Gisco, who, being thus obliged to leave his native country, retired to Selinus, where he died for want of necessaries. The Sicilian cities, that sided with the Carthaginians, upon their first application to Gelon, were received into favour, and had a confirmation of all their antient privileges granted them, though the conqueror, with a very good grace, might have treated them in a far different manner.

From this time for full seventy years, that is to say, till towards the close of the ninety-second, or the beginning of the ninety-third olympiad, we scarce find any mention of the Carthaginians, or their affairs, in the Sicilian history. The last blow they received in Sicily was so terrible, that a peace of some duration was absolutely necessary for the re-establishment of their affairs; and it is natural to suppose, that, of all places in the world, Sicily would be the last they would, for a considerable period of time, chuse for the scene of action. However, a fair opportunity offering at the time above-mentioned, moved by their ambition, they embarked in another war there, which, though pretty bloody and expensive, ended with much better success to them than the former.

However, in some part of this interval, several remarkable incidents, mentioned by Justin, Sallust, and Valerius Maximus, seem to have happened. The Carthaginians carried their arms against the Moors, Numidians, and other African nations, and greatly extended their frontiers in Delphi, which seems to have been the third offering of that metal ever brought thither. This we learn from Phanias Eresius and Theopompos, as cited by Athenæus, who inform us, that before the days of Gyges and Crefus, kings of Lydia, all the votive gifts sent to Delphi consisted of brats, and these not statues, but chaldrons and tripods. As this observation seemed to us curious, we could not prevail upon ourselves to omit it.

in Africa. They likewise shook off the tribute, which, for a long time, had given them so much uneasiness, and rendered themselves absolutely independent.

They had warm disputes with the people of Cyrene, a Mediterranean city, the capital of Cyrenaica, built by the Theræans under Battus, who were a colony of the Lacedæmonians, which arose from the want of a regulation of limits between the two states. As the Cyrenæans were very powerful, much blood was shed on this occasion; but at last the two nations, after having almost exhausted each other by a long and expensive war, accommodated their differences in the following manner:

Being so weakened, that they were both afraid of becoming a prey to some foreign invader, they consented first to a cessation of arms, in order to a pacification. Afterwards it was agreed, that each city should appoint two commissaries, who should set out from their respective towns upon the same day, and that the spot they met upon should be the common boundary to both states. Upon this, two brothers, called Philæni, were dispatched from Carthage, who advanced with great celerity, whilst the Cyrenæans proceeded more slowly. Whether this was to be imputed to the laziest of the latter, or to some accident intervening, is not certain. However, the last is not improbable, since in those sandy regions, at certain seasons of the year, there are as violent storms and tempests as upon the sea; which is not to be wondered at, considering that, in such countries, which are open and level, and have not so much as a shrub to break the force of the wind, sometimes boisterous weather must almost necessarily happen; and then the sand, being put into a violent commotion, is blown up into the air in great quantities, fills the eyes, mouths, nostrils, &c. of travellers, and by that means greatly retards at least, if it does not put an entire stop to, their journey. Valerius Maximus intimates, that the Philæni acted perfidiously, by setting out before the appointed time, and thereby imposed upon the others. Be this as it will, the Cyrenæans, finding themselves too tardy, and fearing to be called to an account for their conduct at their return home, accused the Carthaginians of breach of faith, by beginning their journey before the stipulated time; insisted, that the convention agreed upon between

between their principals was broken; and declared they would suffer all extremities, rather than submit to such a base and ignominious treatment. On the other hand, the Philæni, with much seeming calmness and moderation, desired the Cyreneans not to talk in so lofty a strain, but themselves to propose some expedient whereby their differences might be terminated, promising at the same time to submit to it, whatever it might be. The latter then proposed to them, either to retire from the place they had fixed upon for the limit of their dominions, or suffer themselves to be buried alive there, not in the least imagining they would comply with so hard a condition. But herein they were disappointed; for the Carthaginian brothers without hesitation, consented to it, laid down their lives, and gained a large extent of territory by that means to their country. The Carthaginians ever afterwards celebrated this as a most brave and heroic action, paid them divine honours, and endeavoured to immortalize their names, by erecting there two altars, with suitable inscriptions upon them. Strabo informs us, that no traces of these were to be seen in his days, though the place still retained the name of the altars of the Philæni. However 'tis not to be doubted, but the state of Carthage, as long as it existed, kept them up, this being ever their boundary on the side of Cyrenaica. Sallust relates, that there was a handy tract of ground betwixt the territories of Carthage and Cyrene, without hill, river, or spot in it, whereby to ascertain the borders of the two nations; so that they were obliged to have recourse to the method aforesaid. The love of one's country is certainly a most amiable virtue; but that any civilized nation should carry this so far, as to allow the building of it upon fraud, perfidy, and a violation of public faith, is very strange; yet this the Carthaginians did, if Valerius Maximus may be credited, by paying so high a regard to the memory of the Philæni. That author, however, runs out into a wild and frantic encomium upon them, and thereby discovers much of the Punic disposition. In short, this piece of history gives us a lively idea of the Carthaginian notion of bravery and heroism, as do several other incidents to be found in the course of this history.

Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

The Egestines, allies of the Athenians, after the conclusion of the Syracusan war, of which they had been the principal occasion, by inviting the Athenians into Sicily, entertained strong apprehensions of being called to an account by the Syracusans for all the acts of hostility they had committed against them. About this time also the Egestines had some disputes with the Selinuntines about a regulation of limits, which at last broke out into an open rupture betwixt the two states; but the former dreading the resentment of the Syracusans, and believing they would affright their enemy with a large body of forces, clapped up a peace with the latter upon their own terms. Though by this peace the Egestines gave up all the points in dispute, the Selinuntines, not contented herewith, made farther encroachments upon them; which greatly irritating the Egestines, they had recourse to the Carthaginians, imploring their protection, both against the Selinuntines, and their confederates the Syracusans. The affair meeting with great difficulties, it was for some time debated at Carthage what course it would be proper to take. On the one hand, the Carthaginians were very desirous to possess themselves of Egesta, a city which lay so convenient for them, and which would much facilitate the reduction of the whole island of Sicily, the favourite project that state always had in view. On the other, they dreaded the power and forces of Syracuse, which had so lately cut to pieces a numerous army of the Athenians, and was become, by so shining a victory more formidable than ever. At last their thirst after empire prevailed, and through the desire of getting the city into their hands, they promised the Egestines succours.

The general appointed to command in this war, if matters came to the last extremity, was Hannibal, the grandson of Hamilcar, killed at the battle of Himera, and son of Gisco, the exile above-mentioned. He was at this time invested with the highest dignity of the state, being one of the suffetes, and a person of very great consideration. As he bore a natural hatred to the Greeks, and was desirous to wipe off, by his own valour, the disgrace of that defeat, which he considered as a stain upon his family, he fought, by all means possible, to distinguish himself on this occasion for the service of his country. He was indefatigable, all that summer and the ensuing winter, in raising forces, not only in Africa, but in Spain and Italy, and making making the other necessary preparations; insomuch that, in the beginning of the spring, he had an incredible number of soldiers of different nations lifted under his standard. But, before he came to an open rupture with the Selinuntines, he had recourse to Punic policy, endeavouring, by a trick of his, to over-reach both them and the Syracusans their allies. Being apprised, that the Selinuntines were not satisfied with the tract of land ceded them by the Egestines in the last treaty of peace, but laid further claim to a great part of their territories, he desired the Syracusans to act as mediators in this affair, and endeavour to accommodate the differences betwixt the contending parties in an amicable manner. His view in this was, to sow the seeds of dissension betwixt the Syracusans and the Selinuntines, imagining, that if the latter should reject the mediation of the former, the confederacy betwixt them would of course be dissolved, and consequently that each of them would more easily fall a prey to the Carthaginians. But his scheme proved abortive; for though the Syracusans interposed their good offices, in order to bring about an accommodation betwixt the Selinuntines and Egestines, yet finding these ineffectual, they did not think proper to make use of any compellive methods, nor to renounce the alliance they had entered into with the former. The Carthaginians, finding their artifices thus eluded, upon the return of their embassadors, openly espoused the cause of the Egestines, and sent a supply of five thousand Africans, and eight hundred Campanians, to their assistance. The latter had been hired by the Chalcidians to assist the Athenians against the Syracusans; but, after their overthrow, failing back into Campania, laid there, in hopes that some state might soon stand in need of their assistance. Accordingly, the Carthaginians took them into their service, bought them horses, and placed them in garrison at Egefta; which place, at all events, they were determined to make themselves masters of. Notwithstanding this powerful body of Carthaginian auxiliaries, the Selinuntines, being both rich and numerous, held the Egestines in great contempt.

The Selinuntines, having drawn together a strong body of regular troops, ravaged all the country about Egefta, and despising the enemy, who were far inferior to them in number,

* Diod. Sic. ubi sup.

ber, dispersed themselves in parties, without order or discipline, all over the territory of the Egestines, for the sake of plunder. The Carthaginians and Campanians in garrion, observing this, took the first opportunity that offered, in conjunction with the Egestines, of surprising them, which they did so effectually, that they put them to flight, killed a thousand on the spot, and carried off all their baggage. Immediately after this action, both cities dispatched embassadors to solicit succours from their respective confe-derates, the Selinuntines from the Syracusans, and the E-gestines from the Carthaginians; which being readily a-reed to on both sides, a most dreadful war broke out between the Egestines and Carthaginians on one hand, and the Selinuntines and Syracusans on the other.

The Carthaginians, before they directly engaged in this war took care to make an estimate of the prodigious sums necessary to support it, and the numerous body of forces requisite to carry it on with vigour; and having impowered their general Hannibal to raise an army equal to the undertaking, as above-mentioned, and to equip a suitable fleet, they appropriated certain funds to the defraying all the expences of the war, intending to attack the island of Sicily with their whole power the beginning of the following spring.

Hannibal, at the time appointed, put his army on board sixty long galleys, and fifteen hundred transports, together with an immense quantity of provisions he had amal-ged for their subsistence, military engines, arms, and all else necessary for a siege. Setting sail with these as soon as the season would permit, he crossed the African sea, and arrived at Lilybæum, a promontory of Sicily, op-polite to the coast of Africa. Before he landed his troops, he was discovered by a party of Selinuntine horse who posted away with great expedition, to give their countrymen intelligence of the approach of the enemy. Upon this the Selinuntines dispatched couriers to Syracuse for immediate relief. Hannibal in the mean time, landing his army, marked out a camp, beginning at a place called The well of Lilybæum, where the city of Lilybæum was afterwards built. Here he staid a short time to refresh his troops, before he entered upon the operations of the campaign.

According to Ephorus the historian (E), the Carthaginian army consisted of two hundred thousand foot, and four

(E) Ephorus, an orator and historian, was born in the city (1) of Cumæ or Cyme in Æolia, and one of Isocrates's (2) scholars. His history contained chiefly the transactions of his countrymen the Greeks for the space of seven hundred and fifty years; that is, from the return of the Heraclide, to the twentieth year of Philip king of Macedon (3), in which year he besieged Perinthus. Plutarch intimates (4), that he wrote a particular history of Cumæ. He was a writer of flow parts, according to Tully, and much inferior, in point of genius (5), to his school-fellow Theopompus. Seneca says (6), he had little regard to veracity; which seems confirmed by most of the passages taken from him by Diodorus. His ignorance in geography is very apparent, from his making all the Iberians inhabitants of the same city; from whence Josephus rightly infers (7), that the knowledge of the western parts of the world came very late to the Greeks. Notwithstanding what has been said, Diodorus informs us (8), that he wrote with great accuracy, and in an elegant style; tho' in the last article he is contradicted by Duris Samius (9) and Dion Chrysostomus, whose testimony is of great weight in this particular. His grand history he divided into thirty books (10), to each of which he added a preface. Besides the performances above-mentioned, he composed a treatise de rebus inventis, of which Strabo (11) takes notice; another de bonis & malis, divided (12) into twenty-four books; another de rebus passim admirabilibus (13), divided into fifteen books; another de civitatibus Thraciae, of which Harpocrates quotes (14) the fourth book. Father Harduin ascribes to him a particular treatise (15) of the origin of cities, and another of the encrease of the Nile; but, according to M. Bayle (16), the authors alluded by him prove no such thing; and indeed this he makes out very clearly. Ephorus is complimented (17) by Polybius, four thousand horse, though Timæus Siculus (F) will not allow them to have been much above an hundred thousand. Hannibal, after landing his forces, caused all his ships to be drawn bius and Strabo; but notwithstanding Diodorus seems so fond of him, yet, in another passage, that writer tells us, he related so many falties (18) of Egypt, that we must not expect to meet with any thing of truth in him. Dionysius Halicarnasseus (19), as well as Diodorus, speaks favourably of his style. The two other historians this last author ranks with him, are Theopompus (20) and Callithenes. We find a valuable fragment of Porphyry preferred by Eusebius, from which it appears, that Ephorus was accused of being a plagiarist; nay, of stealing three thousand lines (21), word for word, from Daimachus, Anaximenes, and Callithenes. Lyfimachus is said to have written a piece, containing all his plagiarisms; and Alceus, (22) a satyrical poet, is affirmed by Porphyry likewise to have exposed them. He is ridiculed by Strabo (23) for the mention he makes of his native country. A son, called Demophilus, survived him, who, (24) being a scholar, was thought by some to have put the finishing hand to what his father left imperfect. A fuller account of him may be seen in Vossius (25) and M. Bayle, to whom we refer our readers.

(F) Timæus Siculus a Greek historian of good note (26), the son of Andromachus, a noble Sicilian, who, according to Diodorus (27), assembling the fugitives of Naxus, settled with them on a hill called Taurus, to which settlement the city of Tauromium owed its origin. Timæus flourished in the time of Agathocles, and Ptolemy Philadelphus. Sidues and Hefychius will not allow him to have been a judicious compiler of history; and Polybius accuses him of betraying too great credulity, a want of judgment, and a trifling genius, on several occasions (28). He was a person of violent passions, as appeared both from his shameful calumnies, and impious flattery, which prejudiced many writers, and some of these even too much, against him. Because he was banished by Agathocles, he gave that tyrant no quarter after his death drawn ashore, for fear of giving umbrage to the Syracusans, and then, being joined by the Egeleans, marched to Selinus, death, not only describing his crimes and ill qualities in the blackest manner, but loading him with fabulous calumnies. He was acted so much by a spirit of revenge on this occasion, that he contradicted himself in a most flagrant manner; for which (29) reason the five last books of his history, which treated of the actions of Agathocles, were undoubtedly very deficient in point of veracity. On the other hand, if we may believe Suidas, he exalted his hero Timoleon (30) to a superiority above the highest divinities; to which that author adds, that for this he deserved a greater punishment than Callisthenes, who suffered death for designing to deify Alexander, a prince infinitely more illustrious than Timoleon. He composed several pieces; one consisting of three books, de Syria, & ejus urbibus regibusque; another divided into sixty-eight books, de argumentis rhetoricae; another intitled olympionicae, seu acta chronicae; two more, whose titles were, Ἰταλικὰ καὶ Σικελικὰ, consisting of eight books; and Ἐλληnικὰ καὶ Σικελικὰ, whose number of books is not known. In the former of these two last works he wrote the history of Sicily, as far as it was coincident with the Roman history; and in the other he gave an account of the Sicilian transactions, as they were intermixed with those of the Greeks. His history of Pyrrhus was a distinct piece, as we are informed by Dionysius Halicarnassus and Cicero (31). Diogenes Laertius quoted no book of his history beyond the eighteenth, though Athenaeus (32) cited the twenty-eighth; which is a proof, that those authors paid no great regard to the division of his Greek, Roman, and Sicilian history, as given us by Vossius. Notwithstanding what has been offered by Suidas to invalidate the authority of Timæus in the five last books of his history, yet this author himself allows (33), that, in all other parts of it, he adhered strictly to truth; and even according to Polybius, though he blames our historian in several respects, particularly for truining too much to the reports of others, he laid it down as a maxim (34), that truth was the life and soul of his-try. However he might be imposed upon in what related to Africa, Corsica, and other countries that he was a stranger to, as Polybius intimates he was (35), yet we cannot help being of opinion, that he was an excellent and most faithful historian as to the Sicilian affairs, except when he discharges all the impetuous torrents

us, which city he immediately caused to be invested, and began to batter the walls with incredible fury. In his way he rents of his rage against Agathocles, which indeed could never be vindicated. In most of those passages of Diodorus, wherein Timæus and Ephorus are cited as differing in their relations, the former has apparently a much greater degree of probability on his side, of which we shall at present only give one instance, not having time to produce all the rest: Ephorus informs us, that the Carthaginian army, which reduced Selinus, consisted of two hundred thousand foot and four thousand horse; but, according to Timæus, it could not well have consisted of above an hundred and ten or an hundred and twenty thousand men. Now, it is evident from Diodorus, that upon Hannibal's marching to Himera, immediately after the reduction of Selinus, his army consisted but of an hundred thousand men; for he was joined by twenty thousand Sicani on his march, and, upon his arrival before Himera, his army, including both camps, amounted but to an hundred and twenty thousand men. Since therefore we cannot well suppose the Carthaginians to have lost above ten or twenty thousand men before Selinus, because the siege of that place was a very short one, it will follow, that when Hannibal first invested Selinus, his army, in all probability, consisted of about an hundred and ten or an hundred and twenty thousand men, nearly as Timæus related. It is certain Diodorus very well agrees with this historian; for that author tells us, Hannibal's army, upon his laying siege to Himera, amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand men, as above-mentioned. However therefore in words he may have extolled Ephorus, and depreciated Timæus, yet, in fact and reality, he, in this place, as well as several others that might be recited, preferred the latter to the former. Both Diodorus and Cicero (36) celebrated his learning and eloquence, the last of which was of the Asiatic kind. Plutarch (37) entertained different sentiments of his style; and Longinus censures him for his affectation and puellity therein, as well as the eager desire he shews to comprehend the vices of others, while he is blind to his own. However, Mr. Bayle has plainly proved, that the instances (38) produced by Longinus, in support of his criticism, do not come up to the point, and that he deserved censure in this particular, rather than Timæus. Longinus owned, that sometimes he came up to the lofty and sublime style, had a great share of knowledge, and expressed himself very judiciously; but still he seems to us to have been so much prejudiced against our historian, on he took Emporium, a town seated on the river Mazara (G), by storm; and having closely begirt Selinus with his army, which he divided into two parts, he formed the siege of that city. In order to push this on with the greater vigour, he erected six high towers, and brought as many battering-rams to the town. His flingers and darters likewise greatly annoyed on account of the numerous instances of ill-nature visible in the latter part of his work, that he had rather too strong a disposition to discover blemishes in him; which made him copy after Cæcilius in finding imaginary faults, and thereby fall into the very same crime he condemned Timeæus for. He lived to a very old age (39); some say, ninety-six years. According to Polybius (40), he lived a sedentary life, which, in the opinion of that historian, must have disapproved him for writing history. Plutarch informs us (41), that he fell into the follies of Xenarchus in several parts of his works, in drawing good or bad omens from the most minute, and even ridiculous, circumstances. Cicero (42) puts him on a level with Herodotus, Thucydides, Philistus, Theopompus, Ephorus, Xenophon, and Callithenes. That he was superior, in point of authority, to Ephorus, when he treated of the affairs of Sicily, we think pretty evident from what we have just advanced, which we remember not to have seen taken notice of by any other author.

(G) Rhodomanus, in his Latin version of Diodorus, calls this river Mazarus; but we choose rather to follow Ptolemy, Pliny, and Diodorus himself, who give it a feminine termination. Some believe the word emporium here not to be a proper, but a common, name; and we are inclined to come into this opinion. The name of this town, we believe, was Mazara; for Stephanus tells us, Mazzara was a castle or fortres of the Selinuntines. Nothing was more common than to give rivers, and the fortresses seated on them, the same names, and that even in Sicily itself. To wave all other instances at present, it may be sufficient to observe, that Gela, a city of great note in this island, had a river of the same name running close by its walls. On or near this spot there is a fine city, called Mazara, at this day, but no monuments of antiquity, according to Fazellus, are found near it. However, as it retains the old name of the river, and of Stephanus's Selinuntine castle, it seems to point out the true name of the town Hannibal took by storm on his march to Selinus.

noyed the besieged, by forcing them from many fortified posts. The Selinuntines, little expecting such a visit from the Carthaginians, as having been the only people of Sicily who sided with them against Gelon, and having long been diffused to sieges, were struck with great terror at the approach of so formidable an army, and the resolution with which they carried on their attacks. However, as they had good reason to expect, that the Syracusans and their other confederates would send them speedy succours, they defended themselves with great bravery. They all joined together as one man in their efforts to repel so barbarous and ungrateful an enemy; even the men worn out with age, women and children, regardless of danger, appeared on the ramparts, ready to sacrifice their lives in the defence of their country.

In order to inspire his troops with courage, Hannibal promised them the plunder of the place, by which they were greatly animated. The walls being incessantly battered day and night by the rams and other warlike engines, a breach was soon made, and the first who entered it were the Car-panians, out of an ambition of distinguishing themselves above the rest; but they were repulsed with great loss, as were the Africans and Spaniards, whom Hannibal sent to support them. The fight lasted from noon to night, when Hannibal founded the retreat. In the mean time the Selinuntines sent express to Agrigentum, Gela, and Syracuse, acquainting them, that, without speedy assistance, it would be impossible for the garrison of Selinus to defend itself against so numerous an army, provided with such a train of battering engines. The Agrigentines and Geleans held themselves in readines to march; but, however, thought it proper to wait for the Syracusan auxiliaries, that they might more successfully fall upon the enemy with their united forces. The Syracusans also, having certain advice, that Selinus was besieged, immediately struck up a peace with the Chalcideans, with whom they were then at war, and drew together what forces they could; but as they did not think them sufficient to relieve effectually the besieged, whom they apprehended to be in no imminent danger, they put off their march for some days, till they had got together a stronger force. In the mean time, the Carthaginians pressed the siege with the utmost vigour. Hannibal, as soon as it was light, renewing the assault, possessed himself of the breach which had been made the day before, and of another, which his rams had opened near it; and, after removing the rubbish, with the flower of his troops charged the Selinuntines with such fury, that he obliged them to give ground; but could not put them in disorder, nor enter the city, they fighting like men in despair. Many fell on both sides; but the Carthaginians were constantly supplied with fresh men; whereas the Selinuntines had none to reinforce them, being all employed at once in defending the breaches. Thus the assault was daily renewed for the space of nine days with great courage and resolution, and with incredible slaughter on both sides. At length the besieged being quite tired out, the Iberians, after a sharp dispute, lodged themselves on the ramparts, and from thence advanced into the body of the town; upon which the women from the tops of the houses filled all places with cries and lamentations. The Selinuntines, now giving up everything for loft, barricaded all the streets and passages, being determined to defend themselves to the last drop of blood; which occasioned a long and bloody contest. The women also, notwithstanding their first panic, sorely galled the Carthaginians with showers of tiles and stones thrown by them from the tops of the houses, which kept the fate of this city for some time in suspense; but the Carthaginians returning to the charge with inexpressible ardor, and continually pouring fresh men into the town, the poor Selinuntines were at length forced to give way, and having abandoned the narrow streets, were pursued by the conquerors into the market-place, where making a stand, they were all to a man cut in pieces.

An instance of the Carthaginian barbarity.

Selinus being thus taken by storm, and the plunder of it given up to the soldiers, it is impossible to express the misery to which the poor inhabitants were reduced, and the cruelties exercised upon them by the Carthaginians, who, it must be owned, on such melancholy occasions as these, generally shewed themselves to be most savage barbarians. They raged in all parts of the town without restraint, rifled the houses and then set fire to them, and either threw into the flames the women and children they found in them, or dragging them into the streets, put them all, without distinction, to the sword.
Neither did their inhumanity rest here; they carried it so far as to mangle in a barbarous manner even the dead bodies, some of them carrying about with them numbers of hands tied round their girdles, and others, out of ostentation, bearing the heads of the slain on the points of their swords and spears. The women indeed, who fled with their children to the temples, escaped the common destruction; but this was owing to the avarice, not compassion, of the victors; for believing that these poor wretches would, if excluded all hopes of mercy, set fire to the temples, and by that means consume all the treasure and valuable effects they expected to find in those places, they did not judge it proper to drive them to a state of desperation. The ravages in the city continued most part of the night, insomuch, that every place was full of blood, horror, and confusion. The surviving matrons had the mortification to see their daughters forced to be subservient to the brutal lust of the barbarians, which, with a sense of the dismal servitude prepared for them in Africa, made them with they had not survived their friends and relations. In fine, after sixteen thousand miserable wretches had been cruelly maffacred, and two thousand six hundred escaped to Agrigentum, the city was razed, two hundred and fifty years after its foundation. The women and children, about five thousand in number, who outlived this fatal day, were carried away captives.

The body of Selinuntines that retired to Agrigentum, made their escape by the favour of the night, having found an opportunity of abandoning the city, before the enemy had forced the narrow passages. Upon their arrival at Agrigentum, they were received with great humanity and tenderness; corn was distributed to them out of the public stores; and every private person, out of his own generous disposition, liberally supplied them with all kinds of necessaries for their subsistence.

A few days after the city was taken, three thousand Syracusans arrived at Agrigentum, on their march to Selinus; but understanding that the city was taken, they sent embassadors to Hannibal, to treat of the redemption of the captives, and to beg of him, that he would at least spare the temples. Hannibal returned answer, that since the Selinuntines untines had not been able to defend their own liberty, they deferved to be treated like slaves; and that the gods, provoked at their wickedness, had forsaken both the city and the temples; whence it would be no sacrilege to strip them of their ornaments. This answer is a clear demonstration of the Punic genius at that time, and exactly corresponds with what Diodorus has related of the Carthaginians in this particular: "These barbarians" says that author, "exceed all men in impiety; for whereas other nations spare those who fly into temples, out of a principle of religion, not daring to be guilty of any act of violence there, left they should offend the deity; the Carthaginians, on the contrary, moderate their cruelty to these persons, that they may have a better opportunity of pillaging the temples themselves." The Syracusans however, not acquiescing in this answer, sent an other embassay, and at the head of it one Empediones, a Selinunte, who had always been in the interest of the Carthaginians, and even advized his countrymen to open their gates to Hannibal at his first appearing before the town. The Carthaginian general received him with great demonstrations of kindness, restored to him his estate, pardoned all the prisoners related to him, and even permitted the Selinuntines, who had fled to Agrigentum, to rebuild and repople their city, and manure their lands, upon paying an annual tribute to the Carthaginians.

After the reduction of Selinus, Hannibal marched Hannibal at tack of Himena.

AFTER the reduction of Selinus, Hannibal marched with his army to attack Himera, which above all things he desired, in order to revenge the death of his grandfather Hamilcar, who had been slain there by Gelon, with above an hundred and fifty thousand Carthaginians, and almost as many taken prisoners. Besides, as he had already punished the Selin-untines for the insults they had offered his father Gisco in his banishment, he now resolved to take vengeance of the Himereans, for being the occasion of that banishment. On his march he was joined by twenty thousand Siculi and Sicani, whom he sent, with the main body of the army, to lay siege to the city, while he, with a body of forty thousand men, encamped on a rising ground at a small distance from it. His troops being flushed with their late success, he pushed on the siege with the utmost vigor, battering the wall with his engines in several places at once; but finding this not fully z Idem ibid.

to answer his intention, he undermined it, and by supporting it with large pieces of timber, which were afterwards set on fire, laid great part of it flat on the ground. Upon this a warm dispute ensued, the Carthaginians making all possible efforts to enter the town; and the Himereans, having the fate of the Selinuntines always before their eyes, their parents, children, country, and every thing dear to them, to defend, and being moreover reinforced by four thousand Syracusan auxiliaries, with some troops from their other allies under the command of Diocles, distinguished themselves on this occasion in a most extraordinary manner; and repulsing the enemy with great bravery, immediately repaired the wall. In fine, the Carthaginians, having been constantly repulsed in their attacks for several days successively, were obliged for the present to desist from all further attempts to storm the town; which mortified them extremely, especially as they had not hitherto been able to gain an inch of ground.

The Himereans, animated by this advantage, resolved not to be any longer cooped up in the city, as the Selinuntines had been, but to endeavour, by one strenuous effort, entirely to dislodge the enemy. Having therefore posted detachments of their garrison at proper distances on the wall, to repel any assault that might be given, they made a sally on the besiegers with their whole remaining force, consisting of ten thousand men. The Carthaginians, little dreaming that the besieged were capable of such an attempt, at first imagined, that the confederates of the Himereans had drawn together all their forces, to oblige them to raise the siege; which throwing them into a very great panic, the Himereans for some time easily bore down all that opposed them; and tho' the Carthaginians afterwards not only rallied, but collected their whole force before the town, to make head against them, yet their great number, an impediment to them at the present juncture, throwing them into disorder, they incommode one another more than the enemy. The besieged, taking advantage of this, and being moreover inspired with fresh courage at the sight of their parents, children, and friends, who, for this purpose, exposed themselves on the ramparts, charged them with such intrepidity, that they put their whole army to flight, pursuing them to the very hill where Hannibal was encamped. That general, seeing his army army in confusion, hastened to their relief; upon which the battle was begun anew, and continued for some hours, victory inclining to neither side. At length the Himereans being overpowered with numbers, gave ground; but three thousand of them kept their posts, and covered the retreat of their companions, sustaining the shock of the whole Carthaginian army, till they all died upon the spot.

The Carthaginian army, though victorious, was yet rudely handled, the Himerean troops being much more active, and better disciplined (H), and, by reason of the cruel treatment they expected from the enemies, if conquered, inspired with a much greater degree of resolution. Ephorus says, the Carthaginians lost twenty thousand men in the first action, before they were pursued to Hannibal’s camp; though Timeæus Siculus reduces this number to six thousand. As there was a very sharp engagement afterwards betwixt the Himereans and Hannibal, many more must undoubtedly have perished, though the precise number of them is not given us by any historian. According to Diodorus Siculus, the Carthaginian army, that laid siege to the town, exclusive of Hannibal’s camp, consisted of eighty thousand effective men.

After this action, five-and-twenty galleys, which had been sent by the Sicii some time before to the assistance of the Lacedæmonians, and were now returning home, appeared b Diod. Sic. ubi supra.  c Idem ibid.

(H) Though the native Carthaginians were well armed and good troops, yet the Africans and Numidians were, for the most part, a disorderly rabble, very little acquainted with military discipline. These last troops always made up a considerable part of the Carthaginian armies, and frequently permitted themselves to be surprised by the enemy; which sometimes produced dismal effects. Plutarch, in his life of Timolcon, shews us how they were posted, and the order they observed, when the Carthaginian forces were in full motion to attack the enemy, and even when they engaged them. It is probable, a great part of the army besieging Himera, consisted of these troops, whilst that under the command of Hannibal, which covered the siege, was composed of the national forces (20).

ed off of Himera; upon which a report was spread all over the city, and the enemy’s camp, that the Syracusans, with all their forces and allies, were coming to the relief of the city. This was so far from discouraging the Carthaginians, that it put Hannibal upon a new enterprise; for imagining that the Syracusans had sent all their strength to support their confederates, he doubted not but the city must be left in a manner defenceless; and therefore, immediately embarking with the flower of his troops in the galleys which lay at Motya, prepared to sail for Syracuse, in order to surprize that city. In the mean time, Diocles, commander in chief of the Syracusan troops in Himera, a man of great foresight and penetration, advised the captains of the Sicilian vessels to fail with all possible expedition to Syracuse, lest Hannibal should make an attempt upon it; and this he was the more strongly induced to, since, in another action the besiegers should cut off the best of his men, he plainly perceived, that their own city must of course fall a prey to the Carthaginians. He therefore thought it advicible to leave Himera for a while, and with one half of his forces to return to Syracuse on board the galleys, leaving the other half behind him, which he thought sufficient to hold out, till he, after putting his own city in a state of defence, should return. This the besieged took very ill; but not being able to prevail upon Diocles to alter his measures, the greatest part of their wives, children, and other effects, they took care to send on board the galleys by night, in order to have them transported to Messana.

As Diocles and his men embarked in a great hurry, they were obliged to leave the bodies of their companions slain in the siege uninterred. However, they carried off with them many of the Himereans, with their wives and children, who could not find room in the other vessels. Upon his departure, the Carthaginians redoubled their attacks, and battered the walls night and day without intermission. On the other hand, the besieged, believing the ships would return speedily, were indefatigable in defending the walls, repairing the breaches, and repulsing the enemy. Thus they held out against the repeated assaults and utmost efforts of above an hundred thousand men, till the very day the fleet appeared, when the Carthaginians, summoning all their courage and resolution, gave a general assault, and with their numbers bearing down all before them, drove the garrison from the ramparts, and, in spite

...spite of their utmost efforts, entered the city sword in hand. The Iberians signalled themselves greatly on this occasion, being the first that forced the besieged from the walls, and entered with them pell-mell into the town. There is no sort of cruelty which the barbarous Carthaginians and Iberians did not practise on their carrying the place; all they met, without regard to sex or age, were inhumanly butchered, till the general himself put a stop to the slaughter. The houses were plundered, the temples pillaged and burnt, after they had taken out of them those wretches who had fled thither for refuge; and the city itself levelled with the ground. Hannibal caused the women and children, that survived the first fury of the soldiers, to be preserved; neither durst any one offer the least injury to them; but the men, to the number of three thousand, he commanded to be carried to an eminence near the city, where his grandfather Hamilcar had been defeated and killed by Gelon’s cavalry, and there first exposed them to the insults of his barbarians, and then caused them to be cruelly massacred.

Thus ended this campaign, one of the most prosperous the Carthaginians had ever met with in Sicily; after which Hannibal, dismissing the Siculi and confederates, and disbanding the Campanians, embarqued with the rest of his forces, and set sail for Africa. The Siculi, upon their dismissal, went home, as did likewise the Campanians; but the latter complained bitterly of the Carthaginians, because they looked upon themselves as flighted by that nation, tho’ they had remarkably distinguished themselves in their service at the siege of Selinus, and indeed through the whole course of the campaign. Himera had stood, at the time it was razed by Hannibal, two hundred and forty years c.

HANNIBAL, upon his quitting Sicily, left a small body of troops with his confederates, that they might not be too much exposed to the resentment or ambition of their neighbours. After a short passage, he arrived safe at Carthage, loaded with the plunder he had carried off from Selinus and Himera. The whole city went out to meet him on his arrival, and received him with loud and joyful acclamations, as a general that had performed greater things, in so short a time, than any ever before him f.

ANIMATED by the late success in Sicily, the Carthaginians resolved now in earnest to pursue the design which they

they had ever entertained of reducing the whole island. With this view they began to make new preparations, and raise another army, committing the whole management of the war to the same Hannibal. But as by reason of his great age he endeavoured to get himself excused from taking up on him the command in this new expedition, they joined in commissio with him Imilcar the son of Hanno, one of the same family. These two generals being plentifully supplied with money, and empowered to raise what forces they thought necessary for so great an undertaking, not only made great levies at home, but sent officers with large sums into Spain, Libya, Sardinia (1), and the Balearic islands, to hire numerous bodies of mercenaries. They received likewise large succours from the princes and states with whom they were in alliance, viz. from the Mauritanians, Numidians, and even the nations bordering on Cyrenaica. Besides all which, they took a body of Campanians out of Italy into their pay, which by experience they had found to be good troops, and such as they could entirely depend upon, especially when intermixed with those of other nations. When all their forces were mustered at Carthage, the army was found to consist of three hundred thousand effective men, as Ephorus informs us; but Timeaus Siculus, with more probability, says, that

(I) Livy tells us, that the Carthaginian armies were generally made up of a great variety of barbarous nations, of different habits, different laws, different religions, and different languages, inomuch, that they did not understand one another. As the Carthaginians applied themselves wholly to naval affairs, they employed most of their own hands on board their ships; and the most opulent citizens did not care to expose their persons in the wars, but contented themselves with enabling the state to hire foreigners in their room. They might likewise have some political views in this conduct; for by it they might imagine their state to be rendered more secure, than if their armies consisted wholly of Carthaginian citizens, since these could not be so entirely trusted, on account of the different powerful factions prevailing at Carthage; besides, such an army as we have mentioned could not easily mutiny, or revolt, since 'tis impossible so many different nations should act in concert, or form any dangerous scheme against their principals. However, Polybius condemns this practice, and not without reason, since it not a little contributed to the decline of the Carthaginian state, and once brought it to the very brink of destruction (2).

that they did not much exceed an hundred and twenty thousand: a force, however, sufficient, as it should seem, to ever-run Sicily in one campaign.

The Carthaginians, in the interval betwixt the first beginning of their preparations and their embarking for the Sicilian expedition, drew together, out of Carthage and other cities in Africa, all persons who were willing to transplant themselves, and with them peopled a new city they had built near the hot-baths in Sicily, which was from thence called by the Greeks Therma.

Before the grand fleet, which was composed of a thousand transports, beides a numerous squadron of galleys, with the forces on board, set sail for Sicily, Hannibal sent forty galleys to reconnoitre the coasts, and get intelligence of the enemy. These fell in with a Syracusan squadron of equal force off of Eryx, and immediately engaged them. The dispute was long and obstinate, but at last victory inclined to the Syracusans. Of the Carthaginian galleys, fifteen were sunk, and the rest, by the favour of the night, made their escape. When the news of this unexpected defeat reached Carthage, Hannibal failed immediately with fifty galleys, designing both to prevent any ill consequences from thence to the Carthaginians, and to secure the passage and landing of the army.

Upon Hannibal's arrival, the whole island was alarmed, and every city of consequence, having been before apprised of the great preparations of the Carthaginians, expected to be attacked first. Soon after, the whole fleet arriving safe in Sicily, the troops landed on the coast of Agrigentum, and marched strait to that city.

The Syracusans, and their confederates, had sent embassadors to Carthage to complain of the late hostilities practised upon them by Hannibal, and persuade the senate to forbear sending any more troops into Sicily. But the Carthaginians returning a doubtful answer to this embassay, the Syracusans had put themselves in a posture of defence, and were prepared to give the enemy a warm reception. They had sent to the Greeks of Italy and the Lacedæmonians to solicit succours, and dispatched express to all the Sicilian cities in their interest, desiring them to unite their forces in defence of the common cause. But of all the people of Sicily, none none were under such apprehensions as the Agrigentines; they seemed fully satisfied, that this great storm would first discharge itself upon them, and had therefore carefully provided all things necessary for the sustaining of a long siege, following therein the directions of Dexippus the Lacedæmonian, an officer of great courage and experience. The Carthaginians, upon their investing Agrigentum, divided their army into two bodies, one of which, consisting of forty thousand Africans and Iberians, encamped on certain eminences at some distance from the town; the other carried on the siege, and fortified their camp with a wall and an intrenchment, that they might be the better enabled to repulse the fallies of the besieged. When they first set down before the town, they invited the Agrigentines either to join them or stand neutral, declaring they were well satisfied with either point of conduct, and forbore all hostilities, if they only agreed to a treaty of amity and friendship. Both proposals being rejected, they attacked the town in form, expecting to meet with a vigorous resistance. And this indeed was not without reason; for the Agrigentines had obliged all who were capable of bearing arms, to assist in the defence of the place, and had moreover received a reinforcement of five hundred men from Gela, under the conduct of Dexippus the Lacedæmonian, who was in high esteem at that time, on account of his country, according to Timæus Siculus. Eight hundred Campanians also, who had formerly served under Imilcar, were taken into the service of the Agrigentines, and defended the hill Athenæum, which commanded the city, and was therefore a post of the utmost consequence. But notwithstanding these precautions, Imilcar and Hannibal, after having viewed the walls, and found a place, where they thought it would be no hard matter to make a breach, began to batter them with incredible fury. The machines chiefly made use of on this occasion were of surprising force; and two towers (K) were brought against the city of a monstrous

(K) Soon after the Carthaginians had invested a town, they raised a mount of equal height with the walls, if not superior to them; and thereon erected moveable towers, which overtopped the highest battlements and towers of stone, either upon the walls or within the town. These moved upon wheels, and with them the besiegers gradually made their approaches towards the body of the place. They were very large, and capable of containing...
The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

The first day out of these they made an assault; and after having cut off many of the besieged, founded a retreat. However, the next night the Agrigentines made a sally, burnt the engines, destroyed the towers raised against them, and, after having made a great slaughter, retired in good order into the town. Hereupon Hannibal, intending to form the place in different parts at once, commanded all the tombs and stately monuments, standing round the city to be demolished, and mounts to be raised with the rubbish as high as the walls. But whilst they were executing the general’s orders, a religious panic seized the army, occasioned by Theron’s monument being destroyed by a thunderbolt, which, by the advice of theoothayers present, put a stop to the design. Soon after, the plague broke out in the army, and in a short time carried off a great number of the soldiers, and the general Hannibal himself. The Carthaginian toothayers above mentioned interpreted this disaster as a punishment inflicted by the gods in revenge of the injuries done to the dead. Nay, some of the soldiers upon guard affirmed, that they saw in the night-time the ghosts of the deceased. Wherefore Imilcar, in whom the whole power was now vested, ordered supplications to be made, according to the practice of Carthage, and the demolition of the tombs to be entirely discontinued. A boy was also sacrificed to Saturn, in compliance with a custom which had from remote antiquity prevailed amongst the Carthaginians: by his orders Neptune likewise was appeased, and several priests thrown into the sea, as the most pleasing victims to that deity. Imilcar having, as he imagined, by these cruelties atoned for the sacrileges of Hannibal, and pacified the gods, renewed the assaults with more vigour than ever, filled the river with rubbish close to the walls, by which means he brought up his engines nearer the place, and played with them considerable numbers of men, and some of the smaller engines of battery, whereby the besieged were greatly annoyed. From these towers they made their assaults, and frequently stormed towns, or at least opened breaches in the walls, in order to facilitate that operation. Juftus Lipfius gives us a minute and particular account of them (3).

them upon the town in such a manner as reduced the besieged to great frights.

In the mean time, the Syracusans taking into consideration the deplorable condition of Agrigentum, and fearing it would undergo the same fate that Himera and Selinus had done, began to think in earnest of marching to its relief. Having therefore drawn together the forces of their confederates from Italy and Messana, and being joined by the Carthaginians, Geleons, and others out of the heart of the country, upon a review of their troops, they found them to amount to above thirty thousand foot and five thousand horse. These judging sufficient for their purpose, they gave orders to Daphneus, their general, to advance at the head of them immediately into the territory of the Agrigentines, a fleet of thirty galleys, which sailed close by the shore, at the same time keeping pace with him. Imilcar, upon intelligence of their approach, detached all the Iberians and Campanians, with forty thousand Carthaginians, enjoining them to engage the enemy in the plains of the river Himera. Pursuant to his orders, the Syracusans were attacked a few hours after they had passed the river, as they were advancing in good order towards Agrigentum. The dispute was sharp and the victory a long time doubtful, the enemy being far superior in number to the Syracusans. But at length the latter carried the day, and pursued the Carthaginians to the very walls of Agrigentum. Daphneus fearing, left Imilcar should take advantage of the confusion his troops were thrown into by their eagerness in the pursuit, and thereby wrested the victory out of his hands, as had formerly happened to the Himerians on the like occasion, rallied them, and marched after the fugitives in good order to the spot they were before encamped upon, which he took immediate possession of. The Carthaginians lost six thousand men in this action. (L).

The Syracusans fend an army to oblige him to raise the siege.

Which assaulted by the Carthaginians, but defeats them.

(L) We are told by Polyænus, that Daphneus defeated the Carthaginians by the following stratagem: The armies being engaged, the general heard a great noise in the left wing, where the Italian forces were posted; and hastening thither, he found them almost defeated; upon which immediately repairing to the right wing, composed of Syracusans, he told them, that the Italians had routed.
The Carthaginians escaped a total defeat, either through the fear or corruption, as it should seem, of the Agrigentine commanders. For the besieged, seeing them fly to that part of their camp that lay next to the town in the utmost confusion, immediately concluded, that they were routed; and therefore pressed their officers to fall out upon them without loss of time, that they might complete their ruin. They were, however, deaf to these solicitations, and would not permit a man to fall out of the town. To what motive such an unaccountable procedure was to be attributed, is hard to say; however, the fugitives were hereby saved, and arrived safe in their other camp. This fatal step could never afterwards be retrieved, but was followed by the loss of the city.

Upon Daphneus’s arrival, a great part of the garrison, with Dexippus at the head of them, waited upon him, and a council of war was immediately held. Every one here shewed himself highly dissatisfied, that so fair an opportunity had been lost of taking a full revenge of the enemy, and destroying so many myriads of them. Hereupon great disputes arose, in so much, that four of the Agrigentine commanders, at the instigation of one Menes, a Camarinaean, were stoned by the enraged multitude, and a fifth, called Argaeus, only by reason of his youth, escaped. Dexippus himself was highly reflected upon, and lost much of the reputation he had before acquired, by concurring with the rest. After the council broke up, Daphneus formed a design to attack Imilcar's camp; but finding it strongly fortified, he altered his resolution. However, he guarded all the avenues leading to it with his cavalry, intending by that means either to oblige the enemy to perish with famine, or come out of their lines and venture an engagement. Accordingly, all the passageways being blocked up, and the convoys intercepted, that numerous army was soon brought to such straits, that the Cam-routed the enemy; and therefore, to render the victory complete, entreated them to exert themselves on the present occasion. Animated by this good news, they immediately cried out, Let us fall upon the enemy with the utmost fury. Upon which, charging them with incredible bravery, they soon put them to flight (4).

Campanians and other mercenaries began to mutiny; and going in a body to Imilcar's tent, threatened to join the enemy, if they had not their usual allowance of bread. The general, with much ado, prevailed upon them to bear patiently their present want for a few days, assuring them they should be very soon plentifully supplied with all sorts of provisions, and in the mean time pawned to them the drinking vessels of the Carthaginian soldiers. He had been informed, that the Syracusans were then loading many ships with corn, to be sent to Agrigentum, and did not in the least doubt but he should intercept the convoy; the Syracusans not suspecting, that he would attempt any thing by sea. Accordingly, he dispatched messengers to Panormus and Motya, where his fleet lay, enjoining the commanders to man the galleys with all possible expedition, and lie in wait, at an appointed place, for the ships that were to bring the provisions. His orders were put in execution; and forty galleys being speedily equipped, the Syracusan fleet, consisting of three score transports, laden with corn and all sorts of provisions, was intercepted. Of their convoy, eight ships were sunk, and the rest driven on shore. This changed the face of affairs on both sides; for as such an unexpeeted relief gave the Carthaginians fresh courage, so it greatly disheartened the Agrigentines, who, having already held out for the space of eight months, were in great want of all things, and without hopes of being relieved so quickly as their present necessity required. Besides, at the beginning of the siege, when bad success attended the Carthaginians, they had squandered away their corn and other provisions in a very profuse manner, by which they were now reduced to the greater distress. The Campanians in the service of the Agrigentines, observing the desperate condition the city was in, upon receiving fifteen talents from Imilcar, went all over in a body to the Carthaginians. Dexippus the Lacadæmonian also, according to Diodorus, was said to have been bribed with the same sum; for he on a sudden advised the Italian commanders to withdraw their troops out of the town, insinuating, that they were likely to be starved there, without the least prospect of rendering any service to those who had hired them: whereas, by returing in time, they might carry on the war to greater advan-tage.
tage in some other part: with which advice complying, they left the Agrigentines to shift for themselves (M).

The mercenaries thus falling off, and the inhabitants desponding for want of necessaries, a council of war was summoned, when it was judged absolutely impossible to hold out any longer, there not being provisions enough in the public stores to support the soldiery and people two days. It was therefore resolved, that the city should be abandoned, and the inhabitants conveyed to some place of safety; and the following night was fixed upon for their departure. The people, being apprised of this resolution, were thereby thrown into the utmost consternation. Lamentable outcryes were heard in every house; and the grief and dread they were all seized with in seeing themselves obliged to abandon their native country, their goods and estates, or else expose themselves to the fury of a merciless enemy, were inexpressible. However, though their riches were immense, yet they esteemed life still more valuable; and therefore, as they expected no mercy from such cruel barbarians, the greatest part of them gave way to unavoidable necessity. We shall not here expatiate upon the scene of horror now before us, Diodorus Siculus having done this in a most affecting manner, but only observe, that the place appointed for these miserable wretches to retire to was Gela, where, when they arrived, they were received with great kindness and humanity;

1 Diod. Sic. ubi sup.

(M) Polyænus tells us, that Imilcar (whom he calls Himilco) gave private orders to his men to fly before the besieged whenever they made a sally, in order to draw them into an ambuscade. There happened to be a wood just before the town, in which he posted a detachment of his troops, with orders to set this on fire as soon as the enemy were got a considerable distance from the town. This stratagem had the desired effect; for the Agrigentines pursued the Carthaginians with great ardor for some time; but at last looking back towards the city, they perceived the wood all in a blaze; which they imagined was a fire issuing out of the city itself. Upon this they retired with great precipitation towards the town; but falling into the ambuscade, and being hotly pursued by the party that drew them out, they were all either killed or taken prisoners (3).

humanity, and plentifully supplied with all necessaries at the expense of the public. What happened to them afterwards may be seen in a former part of this history m.

The garrison was no sooner withdrawn, and the Syracusan army retired, but Imilcar, marching out of his trenches, entered the city, not without some fear and jealousy, and put all those he found in it to the sword, not sparing even such as had fled to the temples. Among these was Gellias (M), a citizen famous for his wealth and integrity, who, seeing that the Carthaginians, without respecting the gods, plundered their temples, and murdered those who had taken sanctuary in them, set fire to the temple of Minerva, and con-

(M) The munificence of Gellias may be learned not only from Diodorus Siculus, but Valerius Maximus and Athenæus (1). He entertained the people with spectacles and feasts, and, during a famine, prevented the citizens of Agrigentum from perishing with hunger. He gave portions to poor maidens, and rescued the unfortunate from want and despair. He had built houses in the city and country, purposely for the accommodation of strangers, whom he usually dispensed with handomely presents. In short, Gillias’s riches, immense as they were, were surpassed by his greatness of soul, his treasures being, as it were, to use Valerius Maximus’s phrase, the patrimony of the public. No wonder then that the inhabitants of Agrigentum, and all the neighbouring provinces, should so ardently pray for his health and prosperity. No greater loss could have happened to that part of Sicily than the fatal end of so excellent a person, but the death and destruction of all those poor wretches, who should have regretted him. Athenæus, in all the present MSS. calls him Tellias; but Nicolaus Sturio has discovered this to be a fault of the transcribers, though it must have been a very antient one, since Eustathius oftener than once calls him likewise Tellias. What Athenæus has concerning him is taken almost word for word out of the eleventh book of Timæus’s history, and possibly Diodorus’s may have been deduced from the same source. The great resemblance between the capital tau (T) and gamma (γ) might possibly occasion the mistake above-mentioned; for that it is a mistake, the printed copies and MSS. of Diodorus Siculus and Valerius Maximus sufficiently evince.

consumed in the flames both himself and the immense riches of that stately edifice. Gellias, according to Diodorus, was induced to this action in order to prevent three evils: first, the impiety of the enemy to the gods; secondly, the sacrilegious carrying off of the vast treasure lodged there; and, thirdly, the abuse of his own body.\(^a\)

Imilcar having pillaged every part of the city, both sacred and profane, found himself master of an immense treasure. Nothing less could be expected from the spoils of a city, which was one of the most opulent in Sicily, containing two hundred thousand inhabitants, and had never before been plundered, or even besieged. An infinite number of pictures, vases, and statues, done by the greatest masters of those times, fell into the enemies hands, the Agrigentines having an exquisite taste for the polite arts. To give our readers some idea of Agrigentum, it will be sufficient to observe, that the very sepulchral monuments shewed the luxury and magnificence of this city, they being adorned with statues of birds and horses, famous for their elegance. Empedocles, the philosopher, born in Agrigentum, has a memorable saying concerning his fellow-citizens; "That the Agrigentines squandered away their money so excessively every day, as if they expected it could never be exhausted; and built with such solidity and magnificence, as if they thought they should live for ever." The most valuable part of the plunder Imilcar sent to Carthage; every thing else he caused to be sold under the spear. Among other curiosities, the famous bull of Phalaris was sent to Carthage.\(^b\)

The people of Syracuse, being prodigiously alarmed at the reduction of Agrigentum, had a decree passed for the raising a numerous body of troops to oppose the progress of the Carthaginians, who with a mighty army hovered over the frontiers. Imilcar, having gained the city, after eight months siege, a little before the winter solstice, did not presently raze it, but there took up his winter-quarters, to give his army the necessary refreshment. The Sicilians in general, as well as the inhabitants of Syracuse were struck with terror at the Carthaginian conquests, and many of them fled to Syracuse for protection, whilst others transported themselves, with all their effects, to the continent of Italy.

Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

Those who took sanctuary in Syracuse, were treated with extraordinary kindness, and the chief men among them made free of the city. Among them were many Agrigentines, who filled the city with their complaints against the Syracusan commanders, as if they had betrayed Agrigentum into the enemies hands. This raised such disturbances in Syracuse as at last gave Dionysius an opportunity of seizing upon the sovereign power. Imlcar, after laying it entirely in ruins, towards the beginning of the spring, left Agrigentum p.

The Geleans, receiving intelligence that the Carthaginians intended to open the campaign with the siege of their city, and in the mean time falling out among themselves, implored the protection of Syracuse; upon which Dionysius immediately marched to their assistance with two thousand foot and four hundred horse. The Geleans were so well satisfied with his conduct, that they treated him with the highest marks of distinction, and even sent embassadors to Syracuse to return their thanks for the important services that city had done them in sending him thither. Soon after, he was appointed generalissimo of the Syracusan forces, and those of their allies, against the Carthaginians. This enabled him to give many proofs of his great capacity both in civil and military affairs, as has been already shewn, and will further appear in the sequel of this history.

The Carthaginian forces under the command of Imlcar, having, on the return of the spring, razed the city of Agrigentum, made an incursion into the territories of Gela and Camarina; and, after having ravaged them in a dreadful manner, carried off such an immense quantity of plunder from thence as filled their camp. Imlcar, then marching with his whole army against Gela, took post on the banks of the river Gela, and ordering his men to cut down all the trees about the town, fortified his camp with a ditch and a wall (N), not doubting, but Dionysius would come to the relief of Gela.

(N) It will be proper in this note to mention some particulars relating to the Carthaginian camps. which we have hitherto not had an opportunity of doing. When the Carthaginians were apprehensive, that the enemy would attempt to raise the siege of any place they had formed, they fortified their camp with a ditch and relief of the besieged with a powerful army. The Geleans, in the beginning of the siege, were determined to send away their wives and children to Syracuse, as a place of greater safety; but they all, running to the altars in the forum, could not be prevailed upon to retire, but protested that they would undergo the same fate as their husbands and parents. This resolution encouraged the Geleans to exert themselves in the defence of persons so dear to them, and to whom they were so dear. They made several fallies with good success, cutting great numbers of the enemy in pieces, and bringing many of them prisoners into the town. No sooner was a breach opened in the wall by the Carthaginian rams (O), but the

and a wall, as we learn here from Diodorus. Their camps seem to have been formed in a regular manner, resembling a town, and had gates to them. The Numidian camp was always separated from the Carthaginian; the reasons of which seem to have been, that the Carthaginians were generally foot, but the Numidians horse, and that the latter could not permit themselves to be confined to the rules of military discipline so easily as the former. The general’s tent was, for the most part, fixed on an eminence in the middle of the camp, being much more magnificent and superb than the others. Hither the officers repaired to receive their respective orders; and a strong guard, Polybius intimates a thousand horse and as many foot, were generally posted before it. Near this stood the sacred tabernacle, and the altar, where the general, and officers of distinction, performed their devotions. The Carthaginian tents seem to have been raised in a regular manner of wood, faucines, &c. resembling so many cottages; but the Numidian were the reverse, consisting only of reeds, straw, stubble, and other such-like light materials (2).

(O) The ram was a battering engine used in sieges by the ancients. Pliny tells us it was found out by Epeus, a Greek, at the siege of Troy; but this is not very probable, because we find no mention made of it in Homer, who, if such a wonderful machine had been then known, could not possibly have omitted taking notice of it. ’Tis therefore much more likely, that the Carthaginians invented it, as Vitruvius and Tertullian believe, with whom Lipsius agrees. The ram was a large beam, equal to the mast of a ship, the citizens repaired it, being indefatigable night and day on the ramparts, where their wives and children cheerfully shared with them the labour and danger. The young men were continually in arms, and engaged with the enemy, and the reft employed in working and other necessary services. In fine, they defended themselves with such courage and refolution, that, though their city was but very indifferently fortified, they held out a long time against a most formidable army,

a ship, with an head of solid iron, resembling that of a ram, from whence it derived its name. This was fastened in the middle to another beam, supported by a large piece of amber on each side, by ropes, in such a manner as to be pendulous like a balance.
This being drawn backwards by a great number of hands as far as possible, was then pushed forwards with as great an impetus as they could give it, so that the iron head beating against the walls of a city with inconceivable force, easily shook them; neither was there any wall or tower but what this, by repeated blows, capable of battering down. As these blows, in some respect, resembled the butttings of a ram, this was a further reason for giving the machine the name of that animal. Appian relates, that the Romans battered the walls of Carthage with two rams of an immense size, one of which was played by a body of six thousand foot, and the other by a vast number of rowers, which may serve to give us some idea of this terrible engine. 'Tis mentioned by the prophet Ezekiel in two passages, and Nebuchadnezzar made use of it at the siege of Jerusalem. Whether the Carthaginians, or their ancestors the Tyrians, (for both sometimes went by the same name) first discovered it, cannot be certainly determined, nor at what time the discovery was made; but we take Ezekiel to be the earliest author in whom any mention of it is to be seen. Our learned readers will find a particular and full description of the various kinds of this machine in Vitruvius and Lipsius, whom at their leisure they may consult (2).

Now we are upon this subject, we shall here, once for all, give a short account of the catapulta and the balista, two other engines frequently taken notice of by the ancient historians. The catapulta was a machine out of which the Carthaginians, and other nations, sent volleys of darts and large arrows, made on purpose, upon the enemy, particularly upon those parties of garrisons posted army, without receiving the least assistance from their allies.

In the mean time Dionysius, by the junction of his mercenaries, and succours from Magna Graecia with the Syracusans, almost every one of whom capable of bearing arms he obliged to lift under his standard, formed an army of fifty thousand foot, according to some, though Timæus Siculus makes them only thirty thousand, and a thousand horse; with which, and fifty sail of ships, he advanced to the relief of Gela. Upon his arrival before the city, he encamped near the sea, that his fleet and army might act in concert. With his light-armed troops he proposed to prevent the enemy from foraging, whilst his horse and shipping should intercept all provisions coming to their camp from any part of the Carthaginian dominions; which he doubted not would greatly distress them. However, for twenty days he effected nothing; which much chagrining him, he resolved to attack the enemy’s camp, and, in order to this, made the following disposition of his forces: The Sicilian foot had orders on the ramparts, to prevent the enemy entering the breaches made by the rams. Diodorus intimates, that this engine was but of late invention at the siege of Motya. Some authors confound this with the baliitha, which was an engine out of which stones of a vast weight were discharged; for Diodorus writes, that the Carthaginians filled Lilybaeum with catapults, out of which they threw stones; and Appian relates the fame of the Roman catapults. But Lipius (and he has reason on his side) makes them different machines, though he allows, that the catapult discharged both stones and arrows. That author says, there were two sorts of catapults, the majores catapultae, and the minores; the first sent forth showers of darts and arrows of three cubits long, the other of half that length. At the taking of new Carthage in Spain, an hundred and twenty large catapults were found there, and two hundred and eighty one of the smaller size. The Carthaginians always abounded with these engines: when Pyrrhus attacked Lilybaeum, there was such an abundance of them at that place, that the walls would scarce contain them; and, a little before the destruction of their city, they delivered up to the Romans two thousand of them, according to Appian, or, as Strabo will have it, three thousand. The baliitha, as just hinted, was an engine out of which the antients threw stones of a prodigious magnitude:

* Idem ibid.
ders to move towards the left, and attack the enemy's trenches; the troops of the confederates were to file off to the right, and marching to the shore, attempt the camp in the weakest place; the mercenaries, under his conduct, were to advance through the town, to the spot where the Carthaginian engines were placed, in order to destroy them; the horse he commanded to pass the Gela, upon a signal given by the foot, to join them, if superior to the enemy, or, if repulsed, to support them; and lastly, the sea-officers received orders to approach as near the enemy's camp as possible with the ships, when the Italian troops came up. As Imilcar had sent a strong detachment towards the shore, to oppose the enemy's landing, and defend that part of the camp which lay most exposed, the Italian auxiliaries met with great resistance. However, they behaved with such bravery, that they routed this body of troops, cut a great number of them in pieces, and advanced to the Carthaginian camp in good order, which they attacked with incredible fury. Had they been duly supported, they must have carried it, and thereby totally ruined the enemy. But Dionysius, at the head of the mercenaries, not finding himself able to advance with sufficient expedition through the streets of the city to their relief, the Siculi being too remote to afford them timely succour, and the garrison: this was also used at sieges, and in many respects answered to the battering cannon of the moderns, only the balista, if we may depend upon the relations of the antients, seems to have been a machine of much greater force. According to Lippius, the balista likewise was either major or minor; the major threw stones of three hundred and sixty pound weight, and the minor those of an hundred. Hegesippus relates several surprising effects of this engine, which we have not time to take notice of. Livy tells us, that the Romans found at Carthage twenty-two of the larger balistae, and of the smaller fifty-two. Ammianus Marcellinus, as explained and illustrated by Lippius, gives an accurate account of the antiquity, use, form, and, in short, of every thing relating to these terrible engines, to which authors, for their further satisfaction, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers (3).

The History of the Carthaginians. Book III.

Rison not daring to make an effectual sally by way of diversion, left they should leave the walls too naked; the Carthaginians resuming their courage, and being relieved by a powerful supply of fresh troops, soon broke them, killed a thousand on the spot, and forced the rest into a narrow pass within the lines. Here they must all have been inevitably cut off, had not a shower of darts, and other missive weapons from the fleet, favoured their retreat. The Sicilian foot, in the mean time, charged a large body of Africans with such resolution, that they put them to flight, and pursued them to their very trenches with great slaughter; but these Africans being soon reinforced by the Campanians, Iberians, and Carthaginians, who had routed the Italians, and thereby were at liberty to march this way, returned to the charge with greater fury than ever, and overpowering the Siculi, drove them back to the town, with the loss of fix hundred men. The horse finding the foot not able to withstand the efforts of the enemy, and seeing thefe advance on all sides in order to surround them, retired likewise to the city with precipitation. Dionysius, with his mercenaries, perceiving the greatest part of his army thus rudely handled, thought proper also to retreat, and take shelter within the walls. After this unsuccessful attempt he summoned a council of war, consisting of his particular friends, the result of whose deliberations was that, since the enemy was so much superior to them in strength, it would be highly imprudent to put all to the issue of a battle; and therefore, that the inhabitants should be persuaded to abandon their country, as the only means to save their lives. In consequence of this, a trumpet was sent to Imilcar, to desire a cessation of arms till the next day, in order as was pretended, to bury the dead, but in reality to give the people of Gela an opportunity of making their escape. Towards the beginning of the night, the bulk of the citizens left the place, and he himself, with the army, followed them about midnight. To amuse the enemy, he left two thousand men of his light-armed troops behind him, commanding them to make fires all night, and set up loud shouts, as though the army remained still in the town. At day-break, these took the same rout as their companions, and pursued their march with great celerity. By these stratagems, Dionysius preserved the inhabitants of Gela from all insults, and secured the retreat of his army.

Imil-

Imilcar finding the city deforeted by the greatest part of the citizens, the garrison, and Syracusan army, immediately entered it, and either put to the sword or crucified all he met with in it. He likewise thoroughly plundered it in the same manner as Agrigentum, and then moved with his forces towards Camarina. Dionysius had before drawn off the Carthaginians with their wives and children to Syracuse, by apprising them of Imilcar’s speedy approach. Their city underwent the same fate with that of Gela. The manner in which it was abandoned, Diodorus Siculus describes in a most moving manner, but this, as well as what happened to Dionysius hereupon, may be seen at large in a former part of this history.

Imilcar, in the mean time, finding his army extremely weakened, partly by the casualties of war, and partly by a plague broken out in it, and not thinking himself in a condition to continue the war, sent an herald to Syracuse to offer terms of peace to the conqueror. His unexpected arrival was very acceptable to Dionysius, and a treaty of peace was immediately concluded with the Carthaginians. The articles of it were; that the Carthaginians, besides their ancient acquisitions in Sicily, should still possess the countries of the Sicania the Selinunites, the Himeranes, and Agrigentines; that the people of Gela and Camarina should be permitted to reside in their respective cities, which yet should be dismantled, upon their paying an annual tribute to the Carthaginians; that the Leontini, Messanians, and all the other Sicilians, should live according to their own laws, and preserve their own liberty and independency, except the Syracusans, who should continue in subjection to Dionysius. These articles being ratified by both parties, Imilcar returned to Carthage, having lost above half of his army. The plague afterwards made dreadful havoc in Africa, carrying off vast numbers both of the Carthaginians and their allies.

Before the Carthaginian army retired from Sicily, Imilcar separated the Campanians from the other troops, and left them to defend his conquests in that island. It happened soon after, that Dionysius was reduced to such extremities by his subjects the Syracusans, that he was advised by his more intimate friends either to kill himself, or by one desperate effort to regain the sovereignty of Syracuse.

fort force his way through the enemy's camp, and escape to those places which were subject to the Carthaginians. But Philillus (E) the historian, who, for a considerable time had support-

(E) This Philillus was, according to Suidas (1), the son of Archonides, or, as Paufanias calls him, Archomenidas, and scholar to the elegiac poet Euenus. He was particularly intimate with Dionysius, and above any other person instrumental in establishing that tyrant's power at Syracuse; for which reason he obtained the government of the citadel there. It is suggested by some, that he enjoyed too great a degree of familiarity with Dionysius's mother, tho' with his privy. However this may be, upon his marrying the daughter of Leptine, brother to Dionysius, without imparting his design to that prince, he was banished by him, and retired to Adria. He was not permitted to return as long as the tyrant lived; but in the time of Dionysius the younger, those who opposed Dion had him recalled; for they were afraid, left Plato, by his eloquence and philosophy, should change the tyrant's mind, which they believed (2) so learned a man as Philillus would be able to prevent, especially as he was perfectly well acquainted with the manner of adapting himself to the tyrant's disposition. He answered their expectations; for, as soon as he was in favour, he opposed Plato, and persuaded Dionysius to expel Dion. Soon after, Dion made war upon Dionysius, and besieged him in the castle of Syracuse. Philillus hastened to his assistance from Iapygia, with a strong squadron of (3) galleys, but had the misfortune to be defeated. Euphorus says, he fell by his own hands, and is followed herein by Diodorus Siculus. But Timonides, who lived with Dion from the beginning of these commotions, informs us, that he was taken prisoner, and put to death; with whom Timæus Siculus in the main agrees. Diodorus Siculus says, he was denied burial. He may justly be esteemed to have been a man of merit, if we consider his wit, his learning, his writings, and even his bravery, which will, in some measure, appear from the account of him in the history of Syracuse. Suidas (4) ascribes to him a treatise concerning oratory; Αἰγυπτιακα, or the history of Egypt, in twelve books; res Siculae, or the Sicilian history, in eleven books; some orations, and one amongst the rest against Tricaranus, concerning the city of Naucratis; the history of Dionysius the tyrant; three books about the theology of the Egyptians; and a treatise concerning Libya and Syria. Cicero (5) highly celebrates his learning and diligence. His Sicilian his-supported Dionysius, opposed this advice, telling him, that he ought to resume his courage, and either maintain himself on the throne, or die in the attempt. The tyrant, falling in with the sentiments of Philistus, resolved to part with his life, ra-story was the work in greatest esteem, of which, according to Diodorus Siculus (6), there were two parts. The first consisted of seven books, including the transactions of eight hundred years, and concluding with the third year of the ninety-third olympiad, when the Carthaginians took Agrigentum. The other begins where the first left off; that is, at the time when Dionysius the elder began his reign over the Syracusans, which was the year after the taking of Agrigentum. According to Cicero (7), he took great pleasure in imitating Thucydides; and, if Quintilian (8) may be credited, exceeded him in perspicuity. Dionysius Halicarnasaeus (9) made him too much inferior to Thucydides. However, all are agreed, that he much resembled him in the conciseness of his style. He affected this so much, that, if Theon (10) may be believed, he avoided digressions to an excess. Timaeus abused him; but Ephorus extolled him up to the skies; for which they are both cenured by Plutarch (11). His works, as well as those of Ephorus and Timaeus Siculus, are all entirely lost. Had Philistus's Sicilian history, and his treatise concerning Libya, been extant, we should undoubtedly have met with many curious particulars relating to the building of Carthage, the first formation, growth, and decay of the Carthaginian state; in short, of all the principal transactions in which it was concerned, from its earliest ages to his time. This is not only probable from the titles of those pieces, but likewise from an hint given us by (12) Eusebius and Appian. Notwithstanding he wrote an history during his banishment, he did not shew any resentment against Dionysius in it, but, on the contrary, flattered him, and concealed his vices. This conduct Pausanias (13) endeavours to excuse, or at least to palliate, by saying, that the motive to it was a desire to be recalled to Syracuse. Some believe Philistus to have been born at Naukratis, others at Syracuse, and lastly, others believe there were two historians of that name, one of whom was born at Naukratis, and the other at Syracuse. It is not very material which of these is in the right.

rather than the power he had acquired. In consequence of this resolution, he dispatched an express privately to the Cam-panians, and by large offers prevailed upon them to march to his relief. By their assistance he soon extricated himself out of the difficulties in which he was before involved, and afterwards became a scourge both to his own subjects and the Carthaginians.

HAVING disarmed the inhabitants of Syracuse, and by that step fixed his sovereignty there, he began to make the necessary preparations for renewing the war with the Carthaginians; for he had struck up the late peace with Imilcar so suddenly, with no other view, than to amuse him till he had established his authority, and found himself in a condition to attack the Carthaginian conquests in Sicily with a powerful army. The motives, that seem immediately to have prompted him to this war, were two: First, to prevent the future desertion of his subjects, many of whom retired every day with all their eftects to the Carthaginian garrisons, as well as to recover those he had lost, since he imagined, that, upon the breaking out of a rupture, the cruel treatment of the Carthaginians would drive them from thence. And secondly, the great prospect of success he had at that particular juncture, by rea-sion of the deplorable ravages the plague then made in the Carthaginian territories. As he knew the Carthagians to be the most potent nation in the west, and that, if an opportunity offered, they would most certainly besiege Syracuse, he thought proper, by way of precaution, to fortify the hill Epipolae, which commanded the town. This he did at a vast expense, with the assistance of sixty thousand freed-men and six thousand yoke of oxen. Diodorus tells us, that on this occasion the tyrant did not only superintend every part of the work, but frequently worked himself, enduring as much hardship and fatigue as the poorest labourer; by which means the workmen were inspired with such a spirit of emulation and alacrity, that they laboured all day and part of the night, and, which is almost incredible, in twenty days finished a wall thirty furlongs in length, and of a proportionable height, which being flanked with high towers, placed at proper distances, and built of hewn stone, rendered the place almost impregnable.\(^v\)

Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians.

Having thus put his own city in a state of defence, he made preparations suitable to the undertaking he was going upon, being very sensible with how formidable a power he was soon to cope. His first care was to bring to Syracuse from all parts of Sicily, Greece, and Italy, great numbers of workmen, whom he employed in forging all sorts of arms. As he found, that mercenaries came flocking in to him from all parts, his intention was to have them all armed after the manner of their respective countries, imagining that by this means they would be more capable of distinguishing themselves, and of striking a terror into the enemy. Not only the porches of the temples, but the schools, walks, piazzas about the forum, and every public place, nay even private houses, were filled with workmen. The great wages which Dionysius paid them, induced the best artificers every where to offer him their service. He himself directed them in every thing relating to the form of the weapons they were to forge, and appointed the chief of the citizens to superintend them, with orders to promise great rewards to the diligent for their future encouragement. The art of making engines to batter walls was, according to Diodorus, now first brought to Syracuse; but the artificer's name to whom Dionysius was obliged for this, is nowhere told us. As he was ambitious of being superior to the Carthaginians by sea, he caused a vast quantity of timber for building his galleys to be brought from Italy, where it was drawn on carriages to the sea-side, and then shipped for Syracuse. Mount Ætna also supplied him with many fir and pitch trees, with which it then abounded. Having provided the necessary materials, he employed such a prodigious number of hands, that a fleet of two hundred sail was soon ready to put to sea; to which he added an hundred and ten old galleys, that were refitted. He likewise caused an hundred and sixty distinct receptacles to be made round the harbour, for sheltering his fleet from the weather, which would contain two ships a-piece; and after he had repaired an hundred and fifty old useless vessels covered them with planks. The Syracusans themselves manned half of the long ships, and the foreigners, who had entered into Dionysius's service, the rest. In order to have his troops completely armed as soon as possible, Dionysius animated the artificers by his presence, by the applauses he gave them, and by his bounty, in which all the diligent part of them shared. But his popular and winning behaviour excited excited more strongly, than any other circumstance, the industry and ardor of these people; for those who distinguished themselves, either by their ingenuity or application, were not only sure of receiving some particular marks of his favour, but even sometimes had the honour to dine or sup with him. It is no wonder therefore, that in a shorter time than can easily be conceived, besides an immense quantity of other arms, he had got ready an hundred and forty thousand bucklers, the same number of swords and helmets, and fourteen thousand cuirasses, all of excellent workmanship. He had also prepared for service a large train of battering engines of all kinds, and an infinity of darts. As for land-forces, besides his own subjects, many soldiers came from Italy, Greece, and other countries, to lift in his service. We must not omit observing here, that Dionyfius is said by Diodorus to have invented the quinqueremes about this time, to which he was induced chiefly out of a desire, that the Syracusans should be thought to rival their ancestors in ingenuity; for being apprised, that the triremes, or three-oared vessels, were first made at Corinth, he was deftious the number of oars should be first enlarged by the Syracusans, a colony of the Corinthians. The tyrant having finished his military preparations both by sea and land, and finding his army in a condition to take the field, thought proper now to open his design to the Syracusans. In order to which he convened the senate, and communicated his intention to them of attacking the Carthaginian territories instantaneously, and even without any previous declaration of war. In vindication of his conduct on this occasion, and to spirit up the assembly, he urged, that the Carthaginians were of all others the most implacable enemies to the Greek nation; that they had then nothing less in view than the conquest of Sicily, and consequently the ruin of all the Greek cities therein; that they would have even been at the gates of Syracuse before that time, had not the plague obliged them to continue in a state of inaction; that as they were then in a most deplorable condition, no finer opportunity could ever offer itself to the Syracusans of driving them out of the island than the present; and that lastly, if this was let slip, upon their recovering themselves, they would most certainly put their favourite scheme in execution, and deprive the Syracusans, as well as their neighbours, of every thing that was dear and valuable.

* Diod. Sic. ubi fup. c. 7.

valuable to them. The assembly, moved by so pathetic a speech, and influenced by the views of policy more than the dictates of justice, readily concurred in his opinion. The antient hatred they bore the Carthaginians, their rage against them for having brought their city under the power of a tyrant, and the hopes they entertained of finding some opportunity of recovering their former liberty, united them in their suffrages, and war was unanimously resolved on. If they were victorious, they doubted not carrying their point; and if worsted, the tyrant would be so much afraid of a foreign enemy, that he would learn to treat his subjects at home with more moderation. In short, as they fancied themselves to have a prospect of bettering their condition, however the war might turn out, they were for pushing matters to extremity without delay.

Upon the breaking up of the assembly, Dionysius, in conformity to the disposition of the Syracusians, gave up the fury of the populace the persons and possessions of the Carthaginians, who then resided in Syracuse, and there traded on the faith of treaties. As there were many of their ships at that time in the harbour, laden with cargoes of great value, the people immediately plundered them, and, not contented with this, ranfacked all their houses in a most outrageous manner: and this horrid example of perfidiousness and inhumanity was followed throughout the whole island of Sicily; nay, the Greeks inhabiting the cities under the jurisdiction of the Carthaginians, not satisfied with stripping them of their effects, thought themselves sufficiently authorized to treat the bodies of those miserable wretches with the utmost ignominy and barbarity, to inflict every kind of punishment upon them, in return for the cruelties they had formerly exercised on the natives of the country. This was the bloody signal of the war that Dionysius now entered into with the Carthaginians.

It has been above observed, that great numbers of mercenaries flocked to Dionysius from Greece, Italy, and several other countries. The great pay he offered, drew them over in crowds; but no foreign power contributed so much to his support as the Lacedæmonians. From Sparta he received as many recruits as were necessary for the completing of his troops, which, because he apprehended the war... with Carthage would be long and bloody, he resolved should be very numerous. That he might be entirely at liberty to act against the common enemy with all his forces, he concluded a peace with the Rhegians and Messanians. To engage the latter the more firmly in his interests, he ceded to them a large extent of territory. This he judged not ill bestowed at such a critical juncture; for the Messanians, being a seafaring people, and pretty powerful, would have given no small diversion to his arms, had they joined with the Carthaginians.

Dionysius, thus backed by his subjects, mercenaries, and confederates, and finding the vast project he had formed now ripe for execution, dispatched an herald to Carthage, with a letter to the senate and people, notifying to them, that if they did not forthwith withdraw their garrisons from all the Greek cities in Sicily, the people of Syracuse would treat them as enemies. This letter being read first in the senate, and afterwards in the assembly of the people, occasioned a general alarm at Carthage, which the plague had reduced to a miserable condition. However, though in want of all necessaries, they were not dismayed, but sent officers into Europe, with considerable sums, to raise troops with the utmost diligence. In the mean time, they dispatched orders to their garrisons in Sicily, to observe the motions of the Syracusan army; and appointed Himilco commander in chief of all their forces.

Dionysius, without waiting for the answer of the Carthaginians, agreeably to the plan he had laid down, advanced with his army towards Mount Eryx, near which stood the city of Motya, a Carthaginian colony of great eminence. This town was defended by a citadel of great strength, and might be justly looked upon as the key of Sicily. The reduction of it therefore, the tyrant very well knew, would be a considerable blow given to the Carthaginians. He was joined on his march by the Greeks of Gela, Camarina, Agrigentum, Himera, and Selinus, out of the ardent desire they had to recover their liberties, and shake off the Carthaginian yoke. With this accession of strength, his army amounted to eighty thousand foot and above three thousand horse. The fleet consisted of two hundred long galleys, and five hundred transports, laden with warlike engines and all sorts of provisions. The Motyans, by reason of their attachment to the Carthaginians, expected the storm would fall upon them; but, in hopes of relief from Carthage, they were resolved to defend themselves to the last drop of blood. The city stood on a small island, about half a league from shore, to which it was joined by a small neck of land, which the Motyans cut off, to prevent the approaches of the enemy on that side. In it the Carthaginians kept all their stores and provisions. Dionysius therefore opened the campaign with the siege of this place; and after having taken a view of it with his engineers, commanded the canal between the city and the shore to be filled up with rubbish, and his galleys to anchor at the mouth of the harbour. Having given these orders, he left his brother Leptines, commander in chief of the fleet, to carry on the siege, while he with the land-forces went to reduce the cities in alliance with the Carthaginians, which terrified at the approach of so formidable an army, all submitted, except five, viz. Ancyra, Solas, Egefta, Panormus, and Entella. The territories of the Solantines, Panormitans, and Ancyreans, he destroyed with fire and sword, and cut down all their trees. Egefta and Entella he besieged, endeavouring, by repeated attacks, to take them both by storm; but not being able to reduce them in so short a time as he expected, he returned with his whole army to Motya, not doubting, but all other places would fall of course, as soon as he had made himself master of this.

In the mean time, Himilco (F), who was busy in raising men and making other preparations for the war in Sicily, ordered his admiral to set sail from Carthage with ten galleys, and making strait to Syracuse, to destroy all the vessels in the harbour of Syracuse.

(F) This general we have constantly called Imilcar in the history of Syracuse, through mistake; for we are now convinced, that his true name was Himilco. This appears not only from Diodorus Siculus, but likewise from Livy, Polyænus, Frontinus, and Orosius. In some editions of Justin he is called Amilco; in other Imilcos; but that author is certainly guilty of a mistake, when he makes him the son of Hamilcar, who was killed by Gelon, and skips over a long interval of time, when he will have the destruction of this general's army by the plague immediately to have succeeded the death of Hamilcar above-mentioned. Besides veffels he should find in that harbour. What he proposed by this was, to divide the enemy's forces, and oblige Dionysius to fend part of his fleet to the defence of Syracuse. The admiral, pursuant to his orders, entered the harbour in the night, without being discerned by the enemy; and having sunk most of the ships he found there, returned to Carthage without the los of a single man (G).

Dionysius, on his return to Motya, having set more hands at work, speedily filled up the canal with heaps of stone and rubbish, so that he could make his approaches as on dry land. He then perfected the rampart, brought forward his engines, battered the place with his rams, advanced to the walls towers six stories high, rolled upon wheels, of equal height with their houses, and from thence galled the besieged with continual vollies of arrows and stones discharged from his catapults (H), an engine at that time of late invention. The place was attacked and defended with the sides, that this was not the same Imilcar who commanded in the preceding war, is probable from hence, that Imilcar there imagined his colleague Hannibal to have brought the plague into the Carthaginian army, by demolishing the tombs and monuments of the dead, which he considered as an impious action, and therefore discontinued that demolition; whereas we find, that this Himilco beat down the tombs which flood round the city, in order to fortify his camp, and facilitate his approaches. They were therefore probably different persons from this circumstance; but the authorities produced, without this, put the point beyond dispute (1).

(G) Polyænus tells us, that the admiral ordered the lights to be all placed abaft, or in the sterns of the ships, that no suspicion might be given of their approach; by which means he entered the port in the night undiscovered by the enemy, and easily destroyed the vessels he found there (2).

(H) To what has been lately observed of the catapultæ and bal-liæ may be added, that from the latter stones of a prodigious size were generally thrown; that the Greek word πέλτη, of which with the preposition κατά, the word καταπέλτης or catapulta is composed, signifies, according to Hefychius, a dart, a spear, o javelin the utmost vigor. The Motyans, tho' despairing of any relief, resolved to sell their lives at as dear a rate as possible, knowing they had no quarter to expect from so incensed an enemy; and therefore opposed the besiegers, notwithstanding the imminent danger they were in, with incredible bravery. They posted soldiers armed in coats of mail upon the masts of their ships, having hoisted up their main-yards, who threw down burning firebrands, and tow dipped in pitch upon the engines, which immediately set them on fire; but the Sicilians, presently advancing, not only extinguished the flames, but opened several large breaches in the walls, and made a general assault upon the town with such fury, that they bore down all before them. The contest now was extremely bloody; for the besiegers thinking themselves secure of carrying the place, and being vastly desirous of taking vengeance of the enemy for the barbarous treatment their nation had formerly received from them, fought like lions; and on the other hand, the besieged, knowing they must fall victims to an implacable and enraged enemy, if the town was taken by storm, resolved to die valiantly in the defence of the place, and therefore behaved like men in desperation. At last, however, the Sicilians prevailed, and entered the city sword in hand, thinking they should now speedily accomplish their design; but herein they found themselves deceived, for the Motyans had finished a fortification at the foot of the walls, of equal strength with the walls themselves, which there was a necessity of carrying, before Dionysius could make himself master of the place. The besieged therefore, after javelin; and consequently gives us to understand, that these were the missive weapons discharged most frequently out of that machine. This is confirmed by an allusion to be found in Plautus. Both the catapultae and balistae were of Syrian or Phoenician invention, and from those nations the Jews had them, as may be learned from Pliny, in conjunction with scripture. The Sicilians introduced them into Greece, in the time of Agesilas. Upon the first fight of the telum catapartarium, Archidamus, the son of that prince, is said to have cried out, 'O ye gods, all valour is now destroyed' (3).

after having been obliged to abandon the walls, betook themselves to the defence of this, and gave the Sicilians a warmer reception here than they had met with before, destroying vast numbers of them from the top of the fortification, and the roofs of the houses adjoining to it. However, the Sicilian towers being of a vast height, by their assistance the besiegers advanced their scaling ladders to the neighbouring houses, and by this means fought hand to hand with the besieged. The dispute now was extremely sharp and obstinate; for the Motyans having new life and vigor infused into them by the sight of their wives and children, who, in case of any disaster, they knew would be treated in the same barbarous manner, as their countrymen taken prisoners by the Greeks had already been, resolved either to conquer or die. They rushed therefore with a fury little inferior to madness into the midst of their enemies, threw infinite numbers of them headlong from the scaffolds they had erected, and, in fine, repulsed Dionysius with such slaughter, that he was at last obliged to found a retreat.

The attack was repeated for several days successively in the same manner, but without any effect; for the Motyans, being accustomed to this way of fighting, constantly repulsed Dionysius, obliging him every evening to draw off. At last Archylus the Thurian, at the head of a choice detachment, in the dead of the night, getting over the shattered houses without noise, possessed himself of a very commodious post, where he made a lodgment, till Dionysius sent another strong body of troops to support him. The Motyans, seeing themselves surprised, made their utmost efforts to dislodge the enemy, so that a fierce encounter ensued. But at last the Sicilians, overpowering them with numbers, gave Dionysius an opportunity of breaking into the city like a torrent with his whole army. Every part of the town was in a moment covered with dead bodies; for the Sicilians, enraged at the obstinate defence of the besieged, and to retaliate the former cruelties of the Carthaginians, put all the inhabitants to the sword, without distinction of sex or age, those only excepted who took sanctuary in the Greek temples. For Dionysius, being devisors of selling them for slaves, in order to bring money into his coffers, and not being able to restrain the violence of his soldiers, ordered the public crier by proclamation to declare, clare, that he would have the Motyans fly for refuge thither. This put a stop to the slaughter; however the army thoroughly plundered the town, carrying off from thence an immense quantity of wealth and treasure. This Dionysius thought proper to permit, that he might ingratiate himself with the troops, and that they might hereby be the more readily induced to signalize themselves on all future occasions.
Chap. 37. The History of the Carthaginians

As many therefore of the Motyans as were left alive, he sold for slaves, but commanded Diamenes and all the Greeks, who had joined the Carthaginians, to be crucified. As for Archylus, to whose bravery and conduct the taking of the place was in a great measure owing, he rewarded him with an hundred minas, and all the rest in proportion to their merit. Having thus reduced the strongest city in Sicily subject to Carthage, he placed a numerous garrison in it, under the command of one Bito a Syracusan. Afterwards ordering Leptines, with an hundred and twenty galleys, to watch the Carthaginians at sea, and to make incursions into the territories of Entella and Egefla, which it was his intention to have done himself, would the season and the exigence of his affairs have permitted, summer now drawing to an end, he returned with his army to Syracuse.

The Carthaginians having been surprised by Dionysius, in contempt of the faith of treaties, as above related, found it impossible to oblige him to raise the siege of Motya; however, they were willing to attempt, not only this, but even to carry the war to Syracuse. In order to which, Himilco, receiving advice, that Dionysius with his fleet was entered into the harbour, gave orders to have an hundred of his best galleys manned without delay; with which, as the Syracusans had no squadron out at sea to obstruct his design, he entertained hopes either of destroying or making himself master of the tyrant's whole naval force by surprisle at one single blow. Could this have been effected, he would not only have relieved the place, but likewise changed the seat of the war.

Setting sail therefore from Carthage, after a short passage, he arrived in the night on the coast of Selinus, and the next morning by break of day, at the port of Motya, where the Syracusan galleys were then riding at anchor. These he immediately attacked, burning and sinking several of them.

Leaves a garrison there, and returns to Syracuse.

Dionys—

Idem ibid.
Dionysius, not a little alarmed at this unexpected visit of the enemy, and seeing, by the dispositions they were making, his whole fleet in danger of being destroyed, advanced with his army to the mouth of the harbour; but finding the Carthaginians had possessed themselves of the passage, he looked upon it as too hazardous an attempt to bring his ships out of port, because the mouth being strait and narrow, a few galleys there might engage a much superior number with great advantage. Commanding his land-forces therefore to draw them over land into the sea, at a farther distance from the harbour, he by this means preserved them.

In the mean time, Himilco, pressing upon those galleys that lay next to him, made all possible efforts to take or destroy them; but was vigorously repulsed, and lost many of his men by showers of darts thrown from the decks. The Syracusan army likewise greatly annoyed him by repeated volleys of arrows from their engines of battery; which being a new kind of weapon, and doing considerable execution, struck a great terror into the enemy. Himilco therefore, finding that he could not bring his enterprise to bear, as judging it by no means advisable to venture an engagement with a squadron so much superior to him in strength, left the Motyans (I) to themselves, and returned to Africa.

The following spring, Dionysius, drawing his forces out of Syracuse, made an inroad into the Carthaginian territories.

(I) Polyænus intimates, that, upon the approach of the Carthaginian fleet, Dionysius drew off his forces from before the town, and advanced at the head of them to the shore, as near the enemy’s vessels as possible. By this motion he endeavoured to encourage his soldiers and mariners. Under the promontory that formed the port, there was a tract of twenty stadia in breadth, perfectly level, and full of mud. Over this his soldiers and mariners drew eighty triremes in one day, which threw the Carthaginians into a great consternation. The admiral therefore, fearing the Syracusans would first block up his fleet in the mouth of the harbour, and then destroy it, immediately set sail, and left the Motyans to the mercy of the enemy (4).

provinces, ravaging and destroying the country in a dreadful manner. The Halicyæans, terrified by this irruption, sent embassadors to his camp to implore his protection; but the inhabitants of Egefta, remaining firm in their fidelity to Carthage, set him at defiance. Upon this, advancing with his army, he laid siege to the place; but the Egeftines making a vigorous and unexpected sally upon the besiegers, put the advanced guards in disorder, and set fire to their tents, which occasioned a great consternation throughout the whole camp. Several soldiers, in endeavouring to quench the flames, lost their lives, and many horses were burnt. Dionyflus, soon after, raising the siege, roved about the country in the same hostile manner as before, and whilst Leptines was observing the motions of the enemy by sea, continued his depredations without opposition.

Soon after the reduction of Motya, the news of that melancholy event arrived at Carthage; and the year following Himilco was appointed one of the suffetes there. The progress of Dionyflus alarming the senate, they resolved to surpass him in number both of men and ships; to which end they dispatched officers into all parts of Africa and Spain to raise forces. When the preparations were completed, the Carthaginian army amounted to above three hundred thousand foot, four thousand horse, and four hundred armed chariots. The fleet, under the command of Mago, consisted of three hundred galleys, and upwards of six hundred ships of burden laden with provisions and engines of war. This is the account given by Ephorus; but Timæus Siculus affirms, that not above an hundred thousand men were transported from Africa into Sicily, who, upon their landing there, were joined by three thousand Sicilians. The troops being embarked, and the fleet ready to set sail, Himilco delivered his orders to the commanders of the fleet sealed up, enjoining them not to open them till they were out at sea, and then to observe them with all strictness. This precaution he took (and it is the first time we find it used) to prevent spies from informing the enemy of his designs. The orders were, that they should make strait to Panormus, which was appointed the place of the general rendezvous, and thither they steered their course with a fair wind. The transports, getting out into the open sea, outfailed the galleys, which kept close to the coast. of Africa; but being destitute of a convoy, were attacked off of Panormus by Leptines, whom Dionyfius had sent out with thirty sail against them. After a short dispute, he sunk fifty of them, in which five thousand men and two hundred chariots were lost; the rest, tacking about, had the good luck to escape. As soon as the galleys appeared, Leptines retired; and Himilco, having landed his troops at Panormus, marched directly against the enemy, commanding the fleet to sail along the coast near the army. On his march he took Eryx by treachery; and hastening from thence to Motya, reduced that important place before Dionyfius, who was then besieging Egesta, could send any forces to its relief.

The Sicilian troops were very eager for venturing a battle with the Carthaginians, in order to decide the fate of Sicily as soon as possible; but Dionyfius thought it more advisable to abandon the open country to the enemy, because he was at a great distance from his confederates, and began to be in want of provisions. He exhorted the Sicani to leave their cities, and join the army, promising them, after the conclusion of the war, a richer and more fertile country than their own, and to permit as many of them as would chuse it, to return to their former habitations. Some few, for fear of being plundered, listened to this proposal; but the greatest part of them deserted to the enemy, together with the Halicyæans, who sent embassadors to Carthage, to renew their antient alliance with that state. Dionyfius, not meeting with a sufficient reinforcement, and in consequence of the resolution he had taken, marched with great precipitation to Syracuse, plundering and laying waste the country all along as he passed. Himilco, flushed with his success, advanced towards Messana, of which city he was very desirous to possess himself, on account of its situation; for being once master of it, he could easily intercept all succours sent to the enemy, either from Italy or Greece; and besides, the haven was capable of receiving his whole fleet, which consisted of six hundred sail and upwards. Before he invested the city, he concluded a treaty with the people of Himera and Cephalædium, and reduced duced the city of Lipara (K), the capital of the island of that name, putting it under contribution, by which he exacted

(K) Lipara was the principal of the Æolian islands, in number seven, not far from the north coast of Sicily. The names of these islands were Strongyle, Evonymos, Didyme, Phoenicus, Hiera, Vulcania, and Lipara (1). According to Diodorus, both the island Lipara and its capital city received their name from Liparus, the son of Aulon (2), king of these islands, who built the city Lipara, and cultivated all of them. The Liparese were antiently formidable, had a good fleet, and grew very rich, by reason of the great revenue brought them in by alum, with which mineral their island (3) abounded. Their capital city, according to Diodorus, was beautified with large and fair harbours, and famous for the baths in its neighbourbhood, which were medicinal, and of singular service to the people of Sicily, when seized with any strange and unusual disease. Pliny makes Æolus to have preceded Liparus in this island; but Diodorus tells us, that Æolus married Carne, the daughter of Liparus, and, in right of his wife, succeeded that prince. About the fiftieth olympiad, a colony of Cnidian (4), under their captains Gorgus, Thestor, and Epithersides, entered into a league with the antient inhabitants, and incorporated themselves with them. Lipara was noted amongst the antients for the great quantity of delicious fruit it produced, and is at this day remarkable for the excellent raisins it supplies several parts of Europe with, particularly England. That the inhabitants were pretty opulent in the times we are now speaking of, is evident from the contributions which Dionysus exacted of them, amounting to about five thousand four hundred pounds sterling. It must be observed, that Diodorus, not only here, but in other passages, where he mentions a talent, means the Attic talent, which was worth above an hundred and eighty pounds (5) of our money, and not the Sicilian, amounting not to above three Roman denarii, or a two thousandth part (6) of the Attic. The island is now called Lipari, and has its capital fortified, that it stood a short siege in the year 1719, when it was taken by an imperial detachment under the command of general Seckendorf; as was likewise the castle, whole garrison of four hundred men thought proper to surrender the next day at discretion.

acted from the inhabitants thirty talents. From thence moving with his forces towards Messana, his fleet at the same time attending him, he encamped upon the promontory of Peloris, now the Capo di Faro, about an hundred stadia from that city. When the inhabitants heard of the approach of the enemy, they could not agree among themselves about the measures to be taken on that occasion. Some, alarmed at the great strength of the Carthaginians, seeing themselves deserted by their confederates, as well as in great want of their horse, which were then at Syracuse, and knowing that the walls were in a ruinous condition, and that they had not time then to make the necessary preparations for their defence, were for submitting to the enemy. Others were resolved to hold out to the last, and cheerfully sacrifice their lives in the maintenance of their liberties. They were encouraged to this resolution by an antient prophecy, whereby it was foretold, That the Carthaginians should be one day carriers of water in that city. This they interpreted, as if the Carthaginians should be slaves in Messana; and being thereby greatly animated, were determined to undergo all extremities, rather than surrender themselves to the common enemy. Their wives and children, with all their treasures, they sent to the neighbouring towns before the place was invested.

In order to prevent any incursions of the enemy, they sent a strong detachment of the flower of their troops towards the promontory of Peloris, who for some time defended the frontiers. But Himilco, rightly concluding, that the garrison must be greatly weakened by the absence of this detachment, and that the city was thereby left so very much exposed on the sea-side, that it would be no difficult matter for his fleet to enter, commanded two hundred galleys to advance towards the town. His orders were instantly obeyed, and, a north wind at that time blowing fresh, they were carried with a full gale directly into the harbour. The Messanians, being now sensible of their mistake, recalled their detachment; but it was too late, for the fleet had already entered, and having a great number of engines on board, battered down the walls on that side; upon which the inhabitants hastened in crowds thither to defend the breaches, leaving the other parts of the wall quite quite unguarded. Himilco took advantage of this confusion, and attacking the city on the land-side, entered it without opposition. All those who were on the ramparts died valiantly on the spot; the others either fled to the neighbouring cities, or fell into the hands of the enemy, or, getting into narrow creeks about the harbour, threw themselves into the sea, imagining they could reach the opposite shore; of which, however, not above a fourth part made their escape to the coast of Italy. Himilco entered Messana with his whole army, and, in order to render his conquest complete, proposed reducing all the forts and castles in the neighbourhood of that city; but upon taking a view of them, and finding them extremely strong, he altered his measures, and returned back to Messana. Here he halted a short time to refresh and recruit his army, and then marched at the head of all his forces against Syracuse.

Himilco, considering that Messana was very remote from the cities held by the Carthaginians, and the most commodious port in Sicily on account of its situation, had, before his departure, ordered it to be razed, that it might be of no advantage to the enemy. His orders were executed with the utmost severity, insomuch, that there was not left one house standing in the whole city; nay, Diodorus tells us, that scarce any traces of it remained, the very rubbish being carried away, and thrown into the sea; which sufficiently discovered the implacable hatred Himilco, as well as the whole Carthaginian nation, bore to the Greeks.

The Siculi having Dionysius in perfect detestation, and a fair opportunity now offering of shaking off their allegiance to him, all of them, except the Affairs, revolted to the Carthaginians. Dionysius, being hereby deprived of the means of raising recruits, was obliged to present all the slaves and servants of the Syracusans with their liberty, and with them he manned sixty galleys. He received likewise a supply of a thousand men from the Lacedaemonians, his antient and faithful allies. Expecting that the enemy would advance into his territories, he took care to fortify the castles and forts of the Syracusans, and the cities in their dependence, and to store them with provisions. Those of

of the Leontini, which were his principal magazines, he rendered extremely strong, and persuaded the Campanians to leave Catana, the place he had given them to reside in, and remove to the city of Ætna, a fortress of great strength, for their farther security.

DIONYSIUS, upon a review of his land-forces, found them to amount to thirty thousand foot, and above three thousand horse. With these he took the field, and encamped near a place called Taurus (L), about an hundred \[k\] Idem ibid.

(L) This Taurus was undoubtedly the mountain of that name, upon the declivity of which stood the famous city of Taurominiun. According to Diodorus (1), a great number of Sicilians had fixed their habitations here before the time of this war. Dionysius had given the country of the Naxians to these Sicilians; but they, induced by the promises of Himilco, now dwelt upon this hill, which was naturally fortified. The same author adds, that, as they had settled here in times antecedent to this war, so they continued there after it, and inhabited the city called Taurominium, from its situation upon mount Taurus. We learn farther from this historian (2), that Andromachus, the father of Timæus Siculus, about forty years after the commencement of this war, assembled all the fugitives of Naxos, a city which Dionysius the tyrant had destroyed, and settled them on this hill, and that this was the origin of Taurominium. These two accounts seem to clash, since the first makes the foundation of Taurominium to have happened in the first year of the ninety-sixth olympiad, whereas the latter fixes it in the third of the hundred and fifth. The learned Dr. Bentley (3) takes the former to be nearer the truth, though he endeavours to make them both consistent with one another. Cluverius indeed prefers the latter, but in this he seems to have Diodorus against him; for that author calls the place Taurominium three several times, before he makes the least mention of Andromachus, viz. at olymp. XCVI. an. 1. (4) olymp. XCVI. an. 3. (5) and olymp. XCVII. an. 1. (6) However this may be, that the Taurominites were descended from the Naxians, cannot be disputed. Pliny and Solinus say expressly, that Taurominium was the city which was formerly called Naxos.

and sixty stadia from Syracuse. His fleet by the accession of the sixty galleys above-mentioned, consisted of an hundred and eighty galleys. Himilco, upon advice of his march, advanced to meet him; his land army being attended by the fleet, which kept near the coast. When the Carthaginians arrived at Naxos, they could not continue any longer their march by the sea-side, but were obliged to take a long compass round mount Aetna, which by a violent eruption, had covered all the neighbouring country with burning ashes, and rendered the roads impassable by its flaming

The medals of the Taurominities clearly evince the same thing; for there are five several pieces in Paruta, that have on one side TATROMENITAN, and on the reverse Apollo’s head with this inscription, ἈΡΧΑΓΕΤΑ, and that Apollo ἈΡΧΑΓΕΤΗΣ was a deity of the Naxians, we are informed by Thucydides (7) and Appian (8). To conclude, our author Diodorus himself, in the place we are now upon, just after mentioning the city Taurominium, observes that “Himilco marched with great expedition to the aforesaid place of Naxia.” Probably Naxia here is a corruption of Naxos, since, if we remember right, Naxia, as the name of a place, is not to be met with in any other author, nor any-where else in Diodorus but here. This passage seems fully to prove, not only that the Naxians were the progenitors of the Taurominities, but likewise that, in the first year of the ninety-sixth Olympiad, the city, or spot where it afterwards stood, was called Naxos or Naxia. As therefore it appears from another place (9) in Diodorus, that the city was but just built in the third year of the same olympiad, it seems clearly to follow, that Taurominium was founded in the first year of the ninety-sixth olympiad. This is an additional argument in favour of what Dr. Bently has advanced, and, to all appearance, entirely fixes the point. We must not omit observing, that Taurominium stood at a considerable distance from the antient Naxos, the one being situated either on the declivity or top of the hill, and the other much lower towards the southern foot of it (10). ’Tis likely there might have been a town of the same name with the hill, either upon it, or somewhere near the foot of it, as we find Aetna was the name both of a mountain and a town in its neighbourhood. If Dionysius did not ascend any part of the mountain, we may suppose him to have encamped near this town, flaming inundations. Himilco therefore ordered Mago to fail to Catana, and there wait, till he, marching through the heart of the country, should rejoin him with the land-forces. Dionysius, apprised of this, hastened with all speed to Catana, with a design to attack Mago, before Himilco's army came up; he hoped that his land-forces drawn up on the shore would greatly encourage his own mariners, and discourage the enemy's: besides, if his fleet were worsted, both ships and men had a place of safety to retire to. This was what Himilco had foreseen, when for the reason above-mentioned, his fleet and land forces were obliged to separate 1.

Dionysius, having therefore drawn up his army on the shore, sent out Leptines with the whole fleet against the enemy, commanding him to engage in close order, and not to break his line upon any account whatsoever. And indeed such a salutary order could not have been too punctually obeyed at that juncture, on account of Mago's great superiority; for his fleet was composed of no less than five hundred ships of burden, besides a vast number of galleys with brazen beaks. The Carthaginians, seeing the Greek troops drawn up on the shore, and the navy advancing in good order against them, were struck with terror, and tacking about, began to make to the shore, with a design to save themselves over land, and join Himilco; but recollecting that this was equally, if not more, dangerous, they resolved to try their fortune by sea; and accordingly drawing themselves up in a line, they waited for the enemy. Leptines, inconsiderately advancing with thirty of his best galleys, contrary to the express command of Dionysius, fell upon Mago's first squadron, and, after a brisk action, sunk several of the ships of which it was composed; but Mago, coming up with the whole fleet, immediately surrounded him, upon which, notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, a most sharp and bloody engagement ensued.

The Carthaginian and Syracusan galleys grappling with one another, (for they were so close together, that there was no room for them to strike with their beaks) the forces on board fought hand to hand, as if in a battle on land. On both sides they made the utmost efforts to board their enemies, and consequently on both sides many were thrown over-over-board and slain. In fine, Leptines, though for several hours he defended himself perfectly well, being at last over-powered, was obliged to fly, valour being forced to give way to numbers. The flight of the admiral disheartened the Syracusans, and gave the enemy fresh courage; the former therefore fled to the shore, where their land-forces were drawn up, but were closely pursued by the Carthaginians. Many, abandoning their ships, threw themselves into the sea, hoping to save their lives by swimming to the shore; but the Carthaginian transports, which lay near the shore, having manned their boats, made a dreadful havoc of those unhappy men, when they were not in a condition to make any resistance; so that the land-army saw them perish, without being able to give them the least relief. The Carthaginians sustained great losses in this action; but above an hundred of the Syracusan galleys were either sunk or taken, and more than twenty thousand of their men killed in the battle or pursuit. After the action was over, the Carthaginian fleet anchored at Catana, where they refitted the Syracusan ships they had taken. This was done to regale the eyes and ears of the Carthaginians and their confederates, who could not but be highly delighted with such a trophy, as enabled them to form some sort of an idea of the great victory they had obtained.

Upon this misfortune, the Sicilians apprehending they should be reduced to great straits by returning to Syracuse and there sustaining a siege, solicited Dionylius to fight Himilco, alleging that an unexpected attack at the present juncture would strike terror into the Carthaginians, and give them a fair opportunity of retrieving their late losses. This project seemed the more feasible, as the enemy could not but be extremely fatigued with their long and hasty march; and therefore Dionylius at first not only listened to it, but ordered his forces to be ready to march at a minute’s warning. But when he was just upon the point of putting it in execution, some of his friends remonstrating to him, that Mago in the mean time with his victorious fleet might pounce himself of Syracuse, he altered his resolution, and hastened with his whole army to the defence of that Metropolis. To this he was likewise strongly induced.

duced by the fate of Messana, which had lately been left by such a point of false conduct as the Sicilians proposed to him. However, many of these, being displeased at his not falling into their measures, deserted, and either retired to the neighbouring garrisons of the Carthaginians, or withdrew to their respective homes.

HIMILCO, in two days march, arriving at Catana, ordered his ships there to be drawn into the harbour, that they might be sheltered from the weather, which was then very boisterous and stormy. Here he halted some time to refresh his troops, and sent embassadors to the Campanians at Etna to excite them to a revolt, promising them large posseions, and that they should be equal sharers in all the spoils taken from the Sicilians. That his promises might make the deeper impression, he took care to inform them, that the Campanians of Entella had declared for the Carthaginians, and joined them with a considerable body of forces. In fine, he desired them to consider, that the Greeks of every denomination bore an implacable hatred to all other nations whatsoever. The Campanians were not a little moved by these promises and suggestions; but as they had given hostages to Dionysius, and sent the flower of their troops to Syracuse, they were obliged, contrary to their inclination, to adhere to the treaty concluded with them.

The Carthaginian general, animated with the good success that attended his arms, marched straight to Syracuse, with a design to besiege it; while his fleet under the command of Mago, sailed along the coast, carrying great plenty of provisions for the subsistence of so numerous an army. The arrival of the enemy threw the city into the utmost consternation. Two hundred and eight galleys laden, and richly adorned, with the spoils of the enemy, and advancing in good order, entered in a port of triumph the great haven of Syracuse, and were followed by above a thousand transports with more than five hundred soldiers on board; so that the harbour, capacious as it was, could hardly contain so great a navy, consisting in the whole of near two thousand sail. The fleet had scarce cast anchor, when the army appeared on the other side, amounting, according to some authors, to three hundred thousand foot, and three thousand horse, besides an additional squadron, of two hundred long ships,

† That there is a mistake in the numbers in this place is manifest. How few are 500 soldiers on board 1000 transports? Nay, the words 'more than' seem to intimate, that the number following was very considerable. But as this error is also in the present copy of Diodorus, we know not how to amend it.

ships, attending them. Himilco took up his quarters in the temple of Jupiter, and the rest of the army encamped round it, above twelve stadia from the city.

Before he directly formed the siege, he advanced with his army in battalia to the very walls of the city, and offered the Syracusans battle. But finding they were prudent enough to decline accepting the challenge, he returned to his camp, well satisfied at his having extorted from them a tacit confession of their own weaknesses, and his superiority. At the same time he ordered an hundred of his best galleys to enter the two other harbours, viz. the little port and that of Trogillus, to strike more terror into the enemy, and convince them, that the Carthaginians were likewise masters at sea. In order to gain the affection of his troops, as well as to diffuse the enemy, he ravaged and laid waste the country many miles round for thirty days together, cutting down their groves, and doing infinite damage to the inhabitants. He took by assault the quarter, or suburb, of the town called Acradina, where he plundered the rich temples of Ceres and Proserpina, and, in short, succeeded in every measure he pursued for straitening the besieged. Elated with this run of good-fortune, he looked upon himself in effect as master of the place, though he was apprehensive, that the entire reduction of it would be the work of a considerable time. He erected therefore three forts near the sea, at equal distances from each other, one at Plemmyrion, another about the middle of the port, and the third near the temple of Jupiter, in which he laid up vast stores of provision, and all other necessaries, that might enable him to push on the siege. In order to facilitate his approaches, and fortify his camp in the most commodious manner, he ordered all the tombs, which stood round the city, to be demolished, and amongst others that of Gelon and his wife Damareta, which was a monument of great magnificence. Being very intent on the preservation of his troops, he took care they should want nothing that was proper for their subsistence, and therefore sent transports to Sardinia and Africa for a fresh supply of corn and other provisions. In the mean time, the Syracusans, though greatly dejected by their late misfortunes, did not despond, Diony-

Dionysius being in daily expectation of receiving a considerable reinforcement from his foreign allies 9.

Before the storm fell upon Syracuse, Dionysius had sent his (M) kinman Polyxenus to implore the assistance of the Italians, Corinthians, and Lacedæmonians, against the power of Carthage, which alone he found himself unable to withstand. He likewise had dispatched several officers with large sums to Peloponnesus, to raise a body of mercenaries there. All these, returning some time after Himilco had cut down before Syracuse, brought with them, besides some land-forces, a supply of thirty galleys under the command of Pharácles the Lacedæmonian. Soon after Dionysius and Leptines went out upon a cruise, intending, if possible, to intercept some of the Carthaginian transports laden with provisions, of which the city then stood in great need. They were scarce out of port, when the Syracusans from the city spied one of the transports coming up to Himilco’s camp, upon which venturing out with five galleys they took it. As they were falling away with their prize, the Carthaginians gave them chase with forty sail, against which they advanced with their whole fleet, and engaging them with great resolution, took the admiral galley, besides several others, and funk or damaged twenty more. The rest they pursued to the place where their whole fleet rode, offering them battle a second time. The Carthaginians, terrified with this unexpected disaster, kept within the harbour, though their fleet was three times more numerous than the enemy’s who challenged them. The Syracusans, fastening the galleys they had taken to the poops of their ships, brought them off triumphantly to the town.

(M) The Greek word κυριακός, which Rhodomanus has falsely translated focer or father-in-law, is a general term, and denotes any person who is related to another by marriage. Sometimes, however, it is equivalent to the Latin focer, and sometimes to gener, as we learn from Stephanus and Budaes, who produce instances of both those significations. But that it is to be used in a general sense here, is evident from Diodorus himself, who tells us elsewhere, that Polyxenus was uncle to Dionysius’s wife, and that that tyrant gave him his own sister in marriage. Such a complex relation as this cannot be expressed by any one particular word in our language, and therefore we have rendered it by the general term kinman. We mention this only to have an opportunity of suggesting to our readers, that many faults and inaccuracies are to be found in Rhodomanus’s edition of Diodorus Siculus, which yet is the best we at present have: so that it were to be wished some able hand would give us a new edition of that useful and entertaining historian (1).

What happened now to the Carthaginians verified the observation, that misfortunes seldom come alone. Himilco, who, from his first arrival in the island to this time, had been successful in every measure, and the constant favourite of fortune in all his undertakings, was soon to be reduced to the lowest degree of ignominy and disgrace, and his people to the extreme misery. All the splendor of his anticipated triumph vanished in a moment, and served only to enhance his future misfortunes. This, according to the judicious reflection of our historian, may serve as a lively lesson to mankind, to teach them, that the proudest mortal, how great soever he may be, is but an inconsiderable creature, and may be blasted in an instant by a superior power. Here we may behold the Carthaginians from the summit of human felicity hurled down into the abyss of calamity and woe; from the most potent and formidable state in all the western parts of the world, become the most weak and contemptible of all nations, and that, as it were, in an instant. However, Providence did not so far favour the perfidious Syracusans, but that their enemies, though treacherous and cruel in many respects, recovered themselves, and came off with reputation at the conclusion of this war.

Himilco, now master of almost the whole island of Sicily, and expecting with great impatience to crown his other conquests with the reduction of Syracuse, was obliged to desist from all further operations against that city by the plague, which, breaking out in the camp, made great havoc amongst his soldiers. This infection was looked upon as a punishment inflicted upon them by the gods for plundering the temples, particularly those of Ceres and Proserpina above-mentioned, and demolishing the tombs round the city, which was considered as a violence offered offered to the dead. But, without having recourse to the extraordinary interposition of the gods, they might have ascribed it, as Diodorus insinuates, to natural causes; for the heats that summer, in the midst of which that pestilential distemper first broke out, were more excessive than they had ever been known in the memory of man; and the adjacent country abounded with fens and marshes, whose unwholesome exhalations, especially at that hot season, which of itself was almost sufficient to have occasioned the plague, must have had a very ill effect upon the camp, where such an infinite number of people were crowded together: and that these in fact were the two principal concurring causes of that dire malady, is apparent from hence, that the Athenians, who spared both temples and tombs, had been, not long before, afflicted with the same calamity. It began among the Africans, and soon spread through the whole army. As this plague was attended with some uncommon symptoms, carried off above an hundred and fifty thousand men in a very short time, and may be looked upon as one of the most malignant distempers to be met with in history, we shall beg leave here to give a brief account of it, believing that such a short digression will not be unacceptable to our curious readers.

Before sun-rising, the patients were seized with a convolutive shuddering, pretty nearly resembling that attending the rigor or cold fit in agues, which happens in the beginning of the paroxysm. This was in part occasioned by the fresh breezes coming off from the sea, which at that time of the morning were very piercing. As the sun advanced nearer the meridian, the cold remitted and the heat grew more intense; so that by noon they found themselves almost suffocated with heat; which made them excessively weak and faint, but gave fresh force and malignity to the disease. The south wind moreover greatly encreasing the infection, they died in such numbers, that, after some time it was impossible to inter them; nay, the persons attending the sick were cut off in such a manner, that no one durst approach the infected. In the first stage of the distemper, they were afflicted with catarrhs, swellings of the throat, &c. These were succeeded by violent dyenteries, raging fevers, acute pains in all parts of the body, loathsome ulcers,

cers, &c. Some were even seized with madness and fury, falling upon all those that came in their way, and tearing them to pieces. No relief could be had from the physician (A), this terrible malady eluding all his art; so that those infected with it expired the fifth or sixth day in exquisite torture. Justin seems to intimate, that almost the whole Carthaginian army perished by it, and that in a manner all at once, as it were in an instant; which may serve to give us an idea of the great malignity of it. Diodorus, however, informs us, that a considerable body of Africans and Iberians survived this dreadful calamity; though he at the same time affirms, that an hundred and fifty thousand carcasses of those who perished did not meet with any interment, and consequently infinuates, that a greater number died, since, according to the same author, the dead were buried for some time after the breaking out of the infection. It is worthy observation, that not a single person of those who attended the sick escaped it.

Dionysius, being apprized of the deplorable condition to which the Carthaginians were reduced, resolved not to let slip so favourable an opportunity of attacking them. Having therefore manned eighty galleys, he ordered Pharacidas and

(A) It appears from the antient historians, that the plague raged pretty frequently amongst the Carthaginians, especially in their African dominions: and it is worthy observation, that those parts are still often visited by that terrible malady, particularly Algiers, Tunis, &c. It is probable, that the Carthaginians brought the seeds of the distemper with them out of Africa, since the pessilence had made great havoc there just before the breaking out of this war; which Dionysius (1) urged as a reason to the Syracussians for his attacking the Carthaginians, whom he supposed to have been thereby extremely weakened. It may be inferred from this passage, that the Carthaginians had physicians with them in their camps, and consequently that the art of physic was not unknown to that people. This likewise in some measure appears from the worship of Æsculapius (2), which prevailed in the territories subject to the state of Carthage, though at what degree of perfection herein the students arrived, we cannot pretend to say.

and Leptines to fall upon the enemy's fleet at break of day, while he attacked the land forces in the camp. With this view, having assembled his troops before the moon was up, he advanced to the temple of Cyane, and setting out from thence about midnight, without being discovered, arrived at the enemy's camp by the time appointed. He then detached a strong body of cavalry, and a thousand of the mercenary foot, with orders to fall upon that part of the camp, which lay at the greatest distance, pretending, that the enemy there kept no guard; but his real design was to get rid of that body of mercenaries, they having a great aversion to him, and being ready to mutiny on all occasions. Accordingly he gave private instructions to the officers of the horse to retire as soon as the infantry was engaged. His orders were obeyed, and the mercenaries, being surrounded on all sides, were cut off to a man. Dionysius, upon the return of the cavalry, at the same time attacked the enemy's camp, and the forts in their possession. The suddenness of the attack so surprised the Carthaginians, that they were some time before they could put themselves into a posture of defence, which gave them an opportunity of taking the fort called Polichna by storm; and the horse at the same time advancing in good order, with some galleys, to that near Daccon, likewise carried it. By the reduction of these forts, the Syracusans were enabled to enter the great haven with all their fleet, and to fall furiously on the enemy's galleys anchored there. The Carthaginians in the camp for some time defended themselves with great bravery; but seeing their navy now in imminent danger of being utterly destroyed, many of them, abandoning the defence of the camp, hastened to the shore, to the relief of their companions on board the vessels. But all their endeavours were ineffectual; for the Carthaginian ships, not being able to sustain the shock of the Syracusan galleys, many of them were sunk at the first attack, others quite disabled, and a great number burnt and taken. The slaughter on this occasion was so dreadful, that the shore was covered with dead bodies; which afforded a melancholy spectacle to Himilco, and filled all the Carthaginians with great horror, who, bewailing their unhappy fate, were now reduced to a state of desperation. In the mean time, the camp, being deserted by the body of troops above-mentioned, was left very much exposed; which Dionysius taking advantage of, redoubled his efforts, and finding but a feeble resistance, soon broke into it, putting all to the sword who opposed him. After this, he moved with his forces towards the gulf of Dascy, where finding forty Carthaginian ships of fifty oars a-piece, with a great number of transports, and some galleys, he immediately set fire to them. This completed the destruction of the enemy's fleet; for the wind being at that time very high, and the cables of many of the ships burnt, they were all, excepting a few that were afterwards taken, either consumed by the violence of the flames, or falling foul one upon another, broken to pieces. Diodorus says, that when the ships were all in a blaze, and the flames ascending above the masts, a most dreadful scene was exhibited, the gods themselves seeming to destroy the enemy with lightning from heaven; which punishment, he insinuates, they deserved, on account of their great impiety. Such a spirit of joy and gladness diffused itself over the whole city on this happy occasion, that old and young, women and children, in fine, almost all the inhabitants of Syracuse, posted to the walls and eminencies in the greatest hurry, to be spectators of so glorious a victory: at the sight of which, lifting up their hands to heaven, they thanked the tutelary gods of the city, for revenging in so signal a manner the many sacrileges, which the Carthaginians had committed since their arrival in Sicily. Night putting an end to this action, Dionysius, with his troops, retired, and encamped near the enemy at the temple of Jupiter, with a design to renew the fight early the next morning (B).

(B) Polyænus seems to intimate, that Dionysius amused the Carthaginians with some proposals for an accommodation, and at the same time offered to deliver into their hands a great number of castles and fortresses, if they would put garrisons into them. The Carthaginians, closing with this offer, posted great numbers of their troops, according to our author, in those places; but hereby so weakened their army, that Dionysius found himself strong enough to attack them; which he did, and gained a complete victory. If we admit this story to be true, which perhaps our readers may scruple doing, since Diodorus Siculus, Jujtin, and Orophas, have passed it over in silence, it is probable the stratagem was made use of after the plague had made great havoc Though Dionysius penetrated into the Carthaginian camp, put great numbers of the enemy there to the sword, and even entirely ruined their fleet, yet he could not, by this last effort, oblige them absolutely to raise the siege: this he referred to the day following. But Himilco, taking the opportunity of this short respite, sent embassadors privately to him, offering him three hundred talents (C), all the ready cash he had then with him, if he would permit the remains of his shattered army to return to Africa. Dionysius was unwilling utterly to destroy the Carthaginians, left the Syracusans, when free from the apprehensions of so formidable an enemy, should seek to regain their antient liberty, and thereby give him fresh disturbance; but, on the other side, he knew, that neither the Syracusans, nor their confederates, would suffer him to grant the enemy such terms: he therefore replied, that it was not in his power to permit them all to retire; but that he would allow Himilco, with all the citizens of Carthage, to depart in the night, upon his paying three hundred talents. This being agreed to, Dionysius retired with his forces into the city, whither Himilco privately sent him the promised sum, and then began to make the necessary preparations for his departure. The fourth night after the agreement, Himilco, with forty galleys full of the citizens of Carthage, was ready to set sail, leaving the rest of the army behind him. But the Corinthians, who served under Dionysius, discovering, from the noise and motion of the vessels, that Himilco and his friends were making off, sent to acquaint the tyrant with their flight, who immediately ordered some galleys to be manned, as if he designed to prevent their retreat.

in the Carthaginian camp; for Himilco’s forces were at first so vastly superior in strength to Dionysius’s army, even according to Polyænus himself, that he might have garrisoned all the fortresses belonging to the Syracusans, and yet have been much more than a match for Dionysius (1).

(C) According to what we have lately observed, that was about fifty-four thousand pounds sterling; which was no extraordinary sum for the military chief, considering what a numerous army Himilco commanded.

treat; but as his orders were but slowly executed, they grew impatient, and, without his permission, gave them chase; and coming up with the rear, by piercing them with the beaks of their vessels, sunk several of them. Upon the defeat of the Carthaginians, the Siculi, who joined them, dispersed, and, flying through the heart of the country, retired to their respective homes. In the mean time, Dionysius posted detachments at all the avenues leading to the enemy's camp, that none of those left behind might make their escape; and marching by night with his forces, took possession of it. This he met with no opposition in doing; for the Africans, finding themselves betrayed by Himilco and the Carthaginians, and that the Sicilians had deserted them, were thrown into such a consternation, that they immediately dispersed, taking a great variety of routes. Being therefore incapable of making any resistance, they either fell into the hands of the above-mentioned detachments, or surrendered to Dionysius himself at discretion. But the Iberians, keeping together in a body, sent an herald to capitulate with Dionysius, who took them into his service. All the enemy's baggage and valuable effects left in the camp were delivered up as plunder to the soldiery.

This victory was the more extraordinary, inasmuch as, before the plague broke out in the Carthaginian camp, Dionysius found himself reduced to the last extremity, and actually consulted with his friends about the most proper method of making his escape. In this melancholy situation, his friend Ellopides advised him to resume his courage, and by no means to renounce the sovereignty, telling him, that the royal title would be the greatest ornament of his sepulchre. The tyrant cloathed with this advice, and, notwithstanding the Siculi had joined the enemy, by the incident above-mentioned, became victorious. Diodorus and Plutarch both omit this circumstance, though the former of those historians mentions something of this nature to have happened to the tyrant upon the revolt of the Syracusan army, when he was shut up in his capital city. However, Ifocrates, an author of undoubted credit, who lived at the time of the transaction, has furnished us with this fragment of history, which has likewise been transcribed by Aelian; so that we shall make no scruple to insert it here.

Thus ended this campaign, one of the most remarkable, for the variety of incidents and vicissitudes of fortune observable in it, to be met with in history. A large field for reflections here opens itself; but as these have been already in some measure anticipated, and as our province is chiefly confined to facts, we shall be obliged at present to supersede them. In general, however, we may remark, that all human grandeur is vanity; that Providence frequently makes use of some wicked men as its instruments in scourging others, and consequently that villainy must be frequently triumphant; and lastly, that a strict attachment to the dictates of justice and humanity is not only laudable, but politic, in all states, how elevated soever, since a deviation from these cannot be secured by the most formidable and extensive power from a retaliation.

Advice being brought to Carthage of the terrible fate that both the land and sea-forces of the republic had met with in Sicily, the whole city was overwhelmed with sorrow. Every part of it was filled with outcries and lamentations, and the people were under the same dismal apprehensions, as if the enemy had actually made themselves masters of the town. All the houses in the city, as well as the temples, being shut up, an entire stop was put to every kind of business, and even to their religious worship. This happened when the Carthaginians were seized with the first impressions of terror; for soon after, recovering themselves, they began to entertain hopes, that, upon the general's arrival, things might possibly turn out better than they had been represented. They did not, however, continue long in a state of suspense; for in a little time the poor remains of their shattered troops landed near Carthage, and confirmed the melancholy account they had before received. Upon this, all the wretched inhabitants abandoned themselves entirely to despair, and, giving a full vent to their grief, made the shore ring with their groans and lamentations. In short, a greater scene of horror, except the spot of ground where the Carthaginian army encamped before Syracuse, than Carthage now was, cannot well be conceived.

Himilco in the mean time, landing at Carthage, appeared in mean and forlorn attire. He was immediately met met by a vast concourse of people, bemoaning their sad and inauspicious fortune. Joining with these forlorn wretches, and lifting up his hands to heaven, he bitterly bewailled his own hard fate, but most of all that of his country. Afterwards impiously taxing the gods with partiality, and making them the sole authors of his misfortune, he told his countrymen, they ought to esteem it as a singular happiness, that their present calamitous condition was not brought upon them by their own ill conduct, and that the enemy could assume to themselves no merit from it:

"The enemy," said he, "may indeed rejoice at our misery, but have no reason to glory in it. The troops we have lost did not fall by their valour, nor did they oblige those that are now arrived safe here to abandon their island by force. We return victorious over the Syracusans, and are only defeated by the plague. As for the baggage found in our camp, this ought not to be looked upon as the spoils of a conquered enemy, but as moveables, which the casual death of the owners has left the Syracusans in possession of. No part of the disaster, continued he, touches me so much, as my surviving so many gallant men, and my being reserved, not for the comforts of life, but to be the sport of so dire a calamity. Since therefore I have brought back to Carthage the remaining part of the army under my conduct, I shall speedily follow those brave men, who perished in Sicily, and thereby demonstrate to my country, that it was not out of a fondness for life, but merely to preserve the troops, which had escaped the plague, from the fury of the enemy, to which, by my more early death, they would have been exposed, that I survived them." After this going directly to his house, and shutting the doors against the citizens, and even his own children, he gave himself the fatal stroke. This violent death Diodorus interprets as a signal punishment inflicted upon him, for his having so frequently violated the sanctity of temples and tombs at Syracuse, which, according to our author, was a crime of a most flagrant and enormous nature.

The fame of Dionysius's success being spread all over the Carthaginian dominions, and those of their confederates in Africa, the affairs of this state there were soon almost in as bad a situation as in Sicily. The Africans bore a natural hatred to the Carthaginians, and this was much heightened, when it came to be publicly known in Africa, that Himilco had faved only the citizens of Carthage, leaving the confederates behind to the mercy of the enemy. Incensed therefore to the last degree, and moved with a thorough contempt of the Carthaginians, who now were become despicable to all their neighbours, the cities and states, which had sent them auxiliaries, took up arms, intending to take signal vengeance of them, for the late affront offered them in the persons of their countrymen. They despatched express to all parts notifying the ill usage they had met with in the most aggravating terms; by which means, supplies coming from every quarter, they soon assembled a considerable body of troops, with which they encamped in the fields. And now their design being publicly known, and that they had forces likewise to put it in execution, the whole country rose; so that their army in a short time amounted to above two hundred thousand effective men. With this formidable body they immediately took their rout towards Carthage a.

On their march, they took Tunis, a city in the neighbourhood of Carthage, which surrendered at the first summons. This gave a dreadful alarm to the citizens of Carthage, who now gave up every thing for lost. However, upon the approach of the enemy, they engaged them, but were defeated in a pitched battle, and obliged to retire within their walls. As the Carthaginians, in all public calamities, carried their superstition to a very great excess, their first care was to appease the offended gods, particularly Ceres and Proserpina, whose temples they had violated at Syracuse, and therefore considered this fresh melancholy incident as the effect of their resentment. Before, these deities had never been heard of in Africa; but now, to atone for the outrage that had been offered them, magnificent statues were erected in their honour; priests selected from amongst the most distinguished families of the city for their services; and all their sacrifices ordered to be offered after the Greek manner, those Greeks amongst them, who were versed in the rites and ceremonies peculiar to the worship of these goddesses, being appointed to officiate in this service.

service. Having by this means sufficiently, as they apprehended, atoned for past offences to these deities, they equipped a fleet, and made all necessary preparations to reduce the rebels, and those who supported them, to reason.

Though the African forces were very numerous, yet, happily for the Carthaginians, they wanted a general, as well as subordinate officers, of experience, and neither had war-like engines to carry on a siege, nor provisions to support so vast a multitude; whereas the Carthaginians being matters of the sea, were supplied with every thing in great plenty from Sardinia. Such an army as this was like a body uninformed with a soul. As there was no discipline or subordination in it, every person might set up himself for a general, and claim an independence on the rest; which would soon cause numberless factions and divisions amongst them, and consequently soon dissolve the whole. Thus in fact it happened with this rabble of an army; for divisions arising therein, the famine daily increasing, and many of their leaders being bribed by the Carthaginians to desert, the individuals of it withdrew to their respective homes, and by this means delivered Carthage from one of the most imminent dangers that had ever threatened it.

After the late disaster in Sicily, Himilco had left Mago to take care of the Carthaginian interest there, and settle their broken affairs in the best manner possible. In order to this, he treated all the Sicilians subject to Carthage with great mildness and humanity, and granted his protection to all those who were persecuted by Dionysius. He also entered into alliances with several Sicilian cities, which had an aversion to that tyrant. Strengthened by these alliances, and receiving great reinforcements from Carthage, he formed an army, and made an incursion into the territory of Messana. Having ravaged this in a dreadful manner, he carried off the plunder, and retired to Abacænum, a city of his confederates, where he encamped. Dionysius, advancing to Abacænum with his army, offered him battle; which challenge Mago accepted, but was driven out of the field, with the loss of above eight hundred men. Upon this defeat, the Carthaginian general, with his broken troops, entered Abacænum; and Dionysius returned to Syracuse.

Notwithstanding the great losses the Carthaginians had sustained in the course of this war, they could not forbear making new attempts upon the island of Sicily. Their officers were therefore sent, as usual, to levy forces in Africa, Sardinia, and some of those parts of Italy not inhabited by Greeks. As they had hitherto had such bad successes with their fleet, they proposed determining the fate of Sicily by a decisive battle in the field; for which reason they fitted out a much weaker squadron of long ships, than in any of the former expeditions. The Carthaginians armed all their troops on this occasion in the completest manner, and appointed Mago, who was defeated the year before at Abacenum, commander in chief, hoping the face of affairs in the island above-mentioned would soon receive a very considerable alteration.

Mago, assembling his land-forces, found them to amount to eighty thousand fighting men, with which he landed in Sicily. On his march through the territories of the Siculi, many cities fell to him; which gave him great encouragement. At last he encamped on the river Chryfas in the country of the Agyrinæans, and attempted to bring over that people to his party; but his endeavours proving ineffectual, and receiving intelligence, that Dionysius was advancing against him at the head of twenty thousand men, he thought proper to continue some time in his camp, and put himself there into a posture to receive the enemy. In the mean time the tyrant, being arrived in the neighbourhood of the Carthaginian camp, sent to Agyris, prince of the Agyrinæans, to join him with all his forces, and supply his troops with some provisions. This tyrant was next to Dionysius in power of all others in the island, his city containing no less than twenty thousand inhabitants. His coffers at that time were full of treasure; for he had lately put to death some of his principal subjects, and confiscated their estates. Dionysius therefore making him a visit, with some of his particular friends, prevailed upon Agyris to come into his measures; in consequence of which he received a supply of provisions and a strong reinforcement of troops. What induced Agyris to fall so readily with the Syracusan tyrant's views was, the promise of a large extent of territory adjoining to his own, in case their arms were attended with success in this war.

In the mean time, Mago, finding himself in an enemy's country, and reduced to great straights for want of provision, began to be very uneasy. The Syracusans were for coming to a battle immediately with him; but this Dionysius opposed, telling them, they might ruin the enemy's whole army without striking a stroke, by starving them to a surrender. And indeed he had good reason for what he advanced; for the Aegyptiarchs, being well acquainted with all the paffes and by-ways of the country, every day surprized the Carthaginian parties, and, after cutting them to pieces, intercepted all the provisions they were carrying to their camp. However, the Syracusans, being disgusted at Dionysius's refusal to comply with their motion, directly quitted his camp. This threw the tyrant into a great conterna-tion, and obliged him to manumit all the slaves, as he had done once before. Soon after, the Carthaginians, moved by the dreadful prospect of a famine, thought proper to send embassadors to him, to propose an accommodation. This being as necessary for Dionysius in his present circumsta-ces as the Carthaginians, a peace was concluded to the fatisfaction of both parties, without any further effusion of blood. The new treaty agreed in all particulars with the former; only by an additional article the city of Taurominium was given up to Dionysius, who, driving from thence the Siculi, placed the choicest of his mercenaries in their room. As for Mago, as soon as the treaty was signed, he returned to Carthage, leaving his allies in Sicily to shift for themselves. Thus this war ended, notwithstanding the terrible blow they received before Syracuse, very little to the disadvantage of the Carthaginians.

From this time, for nine years, the Carthaginians enjoyed an uninterrupted repose, at least history is silent as to any military transactions they were concerned in during that interval. But, in the second year of the ninety-ninth olympiad, Dionysius, meditating a war against them, formed a project of putting his finances upon (A) such a footing,

And concludes a peace with Mago.

(A) Aristotle and Polyænus affirm, that Dionysius, in his expedition to Etruria, had an hundred galleys, as likewise a large ship with a body of horse on board, with which making a descent, he plundered the temple of Leucothea, from whence carrying off.

as might enable him to carry it on with a prospect of success. This, by the slightest of that good fortune, which had always attended him through the different scenes of his life to off seventy talents in money, besides other valuable effects, he immediately put to sea again. The same authors relate, that, upon his re-embarking, he was informed, that the soldiers and seamen had privately conveyed on board the fleet a thousand talents of silver; whereupon he issued out an order before he landed in Sicily, requiring every person to bring to him half of his treasure, upon pain of death, promising each of them the other half for his own use, in case of a compliance herewith. When the landmen and mariners brought him in their respective halves, he knew what riches remained still in their possession, and obliged them to refund those likewise (1). Ælian takes notice of this expedition, telling us (2), that Dionysius impiously carried off all the treasuries of Apollo and Leucothea, and amongst other valuable moveables a silver table, placed near the statue of Apollo; and that the men who took it out of the temple, at the same time drank, or offered, to the god, the cup of the good Genius; which they did by way of joke or ridicule, that cup or health going round the company amongst the antients, after the conclusion of their meals, when the tables were taken away. We must not omit observing, that the learned Perizonius imagines Aristotile's text here to have been corrupted, and thinks it may be corrected by Ælian, viz. by inserting τυφήμ:αν or τυφήμ:αν instead of τυφήμ:αν, and this in contradiction to the manuscripts. But we must beg leave to dissent from that great man in this particular; for that this very passage of Ælian is corrupted, he himself allows; nay, so corrupted, that it has embarassed most, if not all, of those learned men, who have endeavoured to translate and explain that author, particularly Gellner, Scheffer, and Julius Vulteius, none of whom have been able to come at his meaning. Besides, all the manuscripts of Polyzenus, an author who did not occur to Perizonius, and who lived within a very few years of Ælian, if he was not contemporary with him, in the passage referred to, which was most certainly taken from Aristotile, have τυφήμ:αν. This authority is of much greater weight than the testimony of Pausanias, in proof of there having been in antient times a temple sacred to Apollo at Tæzena; which, we cannot help thinking, is little, if any thing at all, to the purpose.

(2) Ælian. var. hist. I. i. c. 20. & Jac. Perizon. com. in loc. Vide & Athen. in deipnosoph. I. xii. l. b. sin. that time, he easily put in execution. Having fitted out sixty galleys, under colour of clearing the seas of pyrates, he made a detent in Etruria, and plundered a rich temple in the suburbs of Agylla, carrying away, besides the rich moveables and furniture, above a thousand talents in money. Five hundred talents more he raised by the sale of the spoils, and with this money, set on foot a numerous army. He now wanted nothing but a plausible pretence to break with the Carthaginians, for which he was not long at a loss. Observing, that the Carthaginian subjects in Sicily were inclined to a revolt, he took as many of them under his protection as would accept of it, and entered into a league with them; the consequence of which was an admission of his troops into their cities. The Carthaginians, being apprised of this, first remonstrated against such a proceeding, as a manifest infraction of the treaties then subsisting between them, by ministers sent to the tyrant for that purpose; but this not availing, they declared war against him.
